Editors' Notes.

WITH regret we learn of the recent illness in the West, of our friend and brother, G. L. HENDERSON. He went out to close up his business in Minnesota, and remove his family to this city. He was taken suddenly ill with bilious fever and erysipelas. He was reduced very low, and for several days his life was despaired of. From his usual weight of 150 lbs. he was reduced to 97 lbs. At last advices, though very weak, he was materially better, and hoped in a short time to start on his journey east.

We ardently hope his health will be restored, and that many years of usefulness are still before him. He cannot well be spared from the Liberal ranks just now. He has plans matured for the organization and progression of the Liberals of America, and we sincerely hope he may live to see his fondest wishes in this direction realized.

American Labor Reform.

The fifth Annual Convention of the American Labor Reform League will be held in Masonic Hall, 13th street, New York city, Sunday, May 9th, at 10 1-2, A. M., and 2 1-2 and 7 1-2, P. M., and Monday, May 10th, at 2 1-2 and 7 1-2, P. M.; the Monday forenoon session being given up to the American Anti-Usury Society. S. P. Andrews, J. K. Ingalls, E. H. Heywood, Mary A. Leland, Wm. Hanson, L. K. Joslin, E. M. Davis, H. H. Day, Edward Palmer, and other speakers are expected.

WE WOULD advise every one of our readers to send the small sum of ten cents to EHRICH & Co., 287 8th avenue, in this city, and subscribe for their elegant Quarterly of fashion and miscellany, as advertised on last page of THE TRUTH SEEKER. The firm is a most reliable one; the Quarterly contains sixteen pp. of fashion-plates and entertaining reading matter. A single copy is worth twice the price of the entire year. Those who send the ten cents for it will not regret it.

KIDDER'S SECRETS OF BEE-KEEPING.—We would call the attention of our readers who are engaged in Bee culture, to a little work of 200 pages by this title. It is well filled with practical instruction upon the Bee subject in all its branches. Those who want to know all about bees and how to succeed with them in all the various emergencies that arise in the course of the year should have a copy of this book. The author is a reader and admirer of THE TRUTH SEEKER and we will be glad if every patron of this paper who needs a work on Bees, will buy Mr. Kidder's. Price, by mail, in paper, 25 cts, in boards, 40 cts. We have it for sale.

Obituary.

It will be seen by the following letter that Brother C. A. Zamzow, whom we mentioned in No. 15, has ceased to suffer from disease and closed his earthly existence. His widow tells a pitiful story truly, and we hope those who are able will open their hearts toward her.

Since our announcement, we have received the following donations and forwarded to her: John Keay and friends, $2.35; S. P. Bingham, $1; T. B. Johnson, $1; Isaac L. Rice, $1; William McDonnell, $1. We will cheerfully forward any other amounts that may be sent us for the purpose.

D. M. BENNETT.

My Dear Sir:—I just received your letter, and return many thanks for the money enclosed. I trust you will excuse me for not having written before, but I have had so much trouble that I could not fix my attention on anything. Even to-day, when I sit and pen you these few lines, it almost breaks my heart, for I have sad news to tell you of your late friend. When I wrote you the last time, I knew that my dear husband would not live more than three or four weeks, but I dreaded the hour, and did not get reconciled to the thought that he must die; so, when the unhappy moment came, I was no more prepared than if it had been sudden and unexpected. But, alas! we all must die. It is a debt we owe to Nature, and I suppose his time had come. But it is hard, yes, very hard, to lose a husband that one loves as I did him, after being married a short year and three months. At times I seem disposed to rebel against the giver of life, that he made my cross so heavy and hard to bear, but when I think that my dear, departed husband is free from suffering and care, I thank, in my inmost heart, he who has taken him to the home where there is no suffering or trouble. He bore his sickness with the greatest patience, and he suffered very much the last three or four weeks that he lived. He was conscious to the moment of his death, and died as peacefully as if he were going asleep, without a single struggle. He said he was ready and willing to die, as he knew that he would never get well, and it was better to die than to suffer any longer. We buried him last Sunday, and a friend of mine was kind enough to give me credit for the coffin, and I am in debt for hacks, and doctors and medicine; the whole amounts to about $80.80. It is a large sum, and I do not know what I shall do with all the debts. I suppose they will have to wait 'till I get it, but they are pressing me very hard, and if I ever stood in need of money, I do now.

If you meet any Liberal who has a large heart, and also purse, I hope you will not forget me, and I shall be most thankful. I received $2 from one, $1.50 from another, and 50 cents from a third, which is all I have received since you sent me the check. I have sold all my jewelry and everything else that I could find to sell, so I must work, and what I shall do with a baby, is more than I can tell. I cannot write any more. I am nearly crazy, and till I hear from you again, I remain, as ever, your solicitor.

Letters to a Preacher.

NO. VI.

FRIEND B.:—Thou says that I "oppose the Church because it is Christian, and that hateful Mormonism has in it more of truth to-day, more of justice and humanity than any Pagan nation that ever lived." But I say I oppose Christianity because it is founded in error. I never said it did no good, for we all know that combined organizations of people must do some good, else they could not exist. But so much more good might be done by teaching morality without dogmas and creeds to act as stumbling-blocks, that we call the Church on the whole a nuisance and a parasite upon society. I believe the Grangers, Odd-Fellows, Masons, and even the Y. M. C. A. have all done much good; yet these bodies are a means of great evil also, especially such as have secret sessions. What is good, needs no hiding; what is evil, had better be open also, so that it may be exposed, criticised and exterminated.

If Mormonism has more of truth than any Pagan nation ever had, it is not because of the Christian influences in and around it, but because it exists in a civilized nation and in the Nineteenth Century. The world moves onward and upward always, and that, too, in spite of the Christian's creed, that would bind down all thought to the confines of an old Jew-book literature.

W. H. H. Murray, one of the star preachers of orthodox Christianity, says, Buddhism, which is the religion of more than one-half of the world, "has already developed more of art and science than we shall in five hundred years! That the basal idea of this religion is 'the infinite capability of the human intellect.' It always appeals to reason, and seeks to win converts only by argument and persuasion, and for twenty-three hundred years has never known but one religious war, and that so small that nothing definite can be learned about it." He also says, "missionaries who have spent years among them, testify that they are kind, polite almost universally, temperate, and that indecencies of word or act are almost never seen." Can your boasted Christianity claim one of these facts to be true of it? Nay, it has been almost directly contrary in its influence, and instead of appealing to the intellect, it always uses every means to excite the feelings and passions; love, hate, fear, jealousy, pride, every passion is appealed to by turns to induce people to join the Church, pay in tythes, be baptized and saved (?) from damnation and Hell-fire! And rivers of blood have been shed in its religious wars! It has not existed as a religion of any moment half as long as Buddhism, and as for the morality of its followers, their temperance and decency, you haven't much to boast of in that line, considering your opportunities! For will you have as long as you take the sacred (?) volume as your guide in these matters. Respectfully, ELMINA D. SLENKER.

LYNCHING A MINISTER FOR PREACHING HELL.—A man died recently at Sutter Creek who had never adhered to any particular belief in any specified system of religion, but who bore the reputation of being a liberal, kind-hearted man and good citizen. A minister was requested to conduct the funeral service, and the good man during his discourse said in effect that the deceased had not the least chance of salvation, but had made a bee-line for the hot place. Those who heard him were indignant, and that evening a party of men went to the minister's house, dragged him out of bed, put a rope around his neck, declaring they would hang him. He begged hard for life, and finally retracted the aspersions he had cast upon the deceased, and promised to leave the place at once. He was then released, and the next day he packed up his effects and left.—California Paper.

Radical Fragments.

III.

BY TRUTH TELLER.

What is "Conversion," or the so-called "Change of Heart" among Christians?

It is nothing more nor less than the new views which "sinners" are, by dogmatism, persuaded, or frightened to take of themselves. The dogmatist, who takes it upon himself to stand as a "medium" between God and man, says to you "God is a consuming fire, that burns down to the lowest hell, and he will consign you to hell, if you do not take the same views of him that I do!" And you admit the medium's authority there to dogmatise over you; then you believe what he says with such intensity that you create in your own mind the "evidence" that you are bound straight to hell! Then the minister tells you to have faith, that Jesus does now forgive your sins; and you take this new view of yourself, and in this manner you are pronounced by Christians "soundly converted to God."

What are the noblest lessons of humanity?

Those lessons which teach man to love the truth, for the truth's sake; to love righteousness, and to practice it, for its own sake; and to love goodness, for goodness sake. The highest good of humanity is the love of virtue, for its own sake.

Hence I own up to a little regret, on finding in so good a paper as the Golden Age, of December 26th, 1874, the following statement:

"Jesus taught the tenderest, the truest, the noblest lessons of humanity that have ever fallen from human lips."

Did he, indeed! Let us see:

1. Jesus, in his teachings, ignored the Relations of Life, where we find the source of happiness, and the paramount authority for virtue. See Luke xiv:26.

2. Jesus taught vindictive punishment, when he said: "But those, mine enemies, bring hither, and slay them before me." Luke xix:27.

And the account he has given of his final destiny of the human race, represents Jesus as dooming all his enemies, including the largest number of the human family, to the flames of an eternal hell. Mark xvi:15.

3. Jesus evinced his utter ignorance and his incompetency as a public teacher, when he told Peter that the ideas which Peter uttered were not evolved by his own mind. Mathew xvi:17. The human brains, in each case, manufacture the ideas, all of them, that are uttered. And, for the life of me, I cannot see any thing very "tender," or "enobling," in these teachings of Jesus. A good man, he may have been, but he was a fanatic of the first water, when he saw the devil like lightning fall from heaven. Luke x:18.

And when those, of the present day, thought to be liberal men, express such an estimate of this fanatic's teachings, it only shows the force and habit and education, which control very many, otherwise good men. Quincy, Mass., Jan. 8, 1875.

AN EPIC IN FOUR CANTOS.

CANTO I.

One little baby girl a sighin' for her love;
One tall baby boy a callin' her his dove;
One big baby boy a smilin' on the two,
And all of them so happy that they don't know what to do;
While they're a smilin' and a callin' and a sighin' all the day,
And oh! the gush of innocence when they begin to play.

CANTO II.

One little baby girl a goin' to Sabbath-school;
One tall baby boy a callin' her a fool;
One big baby boy a prayin' for the two,
And all of them so very mad they don't know what to do;
While they're prayin' and a callin' and a goin' all the day,
And oh! the gush of penitence when they begin to pray.

CANTO III.

One little baby girl a keepin' from her love;
One tall baby boy a worryin' his dove;
One big baby boy a weepin' without end,
And all a makin' statements to a very "mutual friend,"
While they're weepin' and a worryin' and a keepin' all the day,
And oh! the gush of lively times while they keep up the play.

CANTO IV.

One little baby girl a wanderin' in the street;
One tall baby boy a callin' her a cheat;
One big baby boy a lookin' at the sky,
And all of them a sayin', "How horribly you lie,"
While they're a lookin' and a callin' and a wanderin' all the day;
And oh! the gush of public scorn at the saintly little play.

Friendly Correspondence.

MRS. ELMINA D. SLENKER, Snowville, Va., writes: I like THE TRUTH SEEKER better and better.

S. M. BRINGHAM, Albany, Oregon, writes: Don't fail to send THE TRUTH SEEKER. I can't keep house without it.

JOHN MAHARA, Charles City, Iowa, writes: I think your paper comes up to the times, better than any paper I have seen.

CLARENCE JOHNSON, South Wolfsboro, N. H., writes: Please send me No. 5 of Vol. II. I have lost that number and I cannot do without it. It is the best paper I ever read.

MR. R. NICHOLS, West Winfield, N. Y., writes: Friends here consider your paper not only the cheapest but the best radical organ issued to-day, and trust that it will become the most popular. It is just the thing for the reading masses—radical enough, and yet offensive to none, save bigots.

J. HOKE, M. D., Cordova, Ill., writes: I am taking more papers than I get time to read, but you are battling error, bigotry, and superstition so manfully, that if a year's subscription, or more, will help you make the blows more effective, I do not feel like withholding it from a so much needed work.

W. H. KISER, Winterset, Iowa, writes: I send you to-day six more trial subscribers, which makes fifty-two in all I have sent you. Your paper is causing much alarm among the priests, and their supporters. Some of them are praying God to stop the mouths of these infidels, and advise their followers to keep clear of infidels and infidel papers, saying they wield a great influence against God and the Church.

SYLVESTER BARNHART, Springville, N. Y., writes: Your paper just suits my mind, for it cuts right and left, and seeks to elevate the standard of intelligence among mankind. It is what Liberal thinkers want, and I believe it the means of agitating thought upon many subjects little understood. I wish your noble efforts good success. Let us all do our best to augment the happiness of the human family.

PHILIP F. WISLAR, Newportville, Pa., writes: I am anxious to congratulate you upon the good style of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I have had Christianity bred in my bones, and still am partial to it, yet I would like to see the great mystery of our existence better explained, and subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER in view of that object. I was pleased with your reply to Snode, and other pretending Christians, whose bigotry has taken away all their good manners. I certainly wish your paper much success.

WM. M. BRONSON, Streator, Ill., writes: I would like to tell you what a great change of thought on theology has come over me since I have been reading your paper. I am sixty-one years of age, was born in Connecticut, and, of course, brought up under religious superstition. If I could have read your TRUTH SEEKER twenty years ago, and taken the same change I now have, what a great benefit it would have been to me. I love to read what you write, and admire your boldness in hitting old orthodoxy. You hurt them bad.

H. A. TURTON, Ottawa, Kansas, writes: The first number of your valuable paper addressed to me as a trial subscriber has come to hand, and I am more than satisfied. I was for ten years a member and an officer in an orthodox church, but have laid aside the dogmas of superstition and am glad to enroll myself among the Freethinkers of the age. Your paper pleased two of my neighbors so well that both wish to become subscribers. Enclosed find the pay for them. May the day speedily come when the scales of bigotry may fall from the eyes of all intelligent beings, and the teachings of THE TRUTH SEEKER be exemplified around every hearthstone in our land.

J. F. BROWN, Eugene City, Oregon, writes: Your paper has a larger circulation in this locality than any Liberal paper published in America. It is always brimful of the choicest reading matter, and its size is just the thing for fireside reading. My TRUTH SEEKERS are like a circulating library; they go from house to house, and I believe our city contains more Liberals, according to its size, than any other town in the United States. May THE TRUTH SEEKER always be found to advocate the truth and expose the folly of priestcraft and superstition. Before a quarter of a century has past may the Freethinker's Church contain more members than the whole combination of Christianity numbers to-day.

ALMON MALTBY, Brighton, Mich., writes: I have never written you saying "I like your paper first-rate," but I think you have observed by my actions (which speak louder than words) that I do like it, and will not be without it, so long as it is printed and continues to advocate the doctrines it does at present, whether it is issued monthly, semi-monthly, or weekly. You sent me the first number you issued when in Illinois. I sent you my own subscription and five others. I have sent you some eight other subscriptions, and besides have bought several books of you. I now take two copies of the paper, one to give my Christian friends to read. This, I think, is the kind of praise that helps, and the kind you need.

J. W. GIBSON, Gentryville, Mo., writes: Please send me THE TRUTH SEEKER for six months. I like the style of the paper and its fearless onslaught on the strongholds of superstition. You stand on the skirmish line in the advance guard of the Liberal army. We of the Liberal army may view the "promised land" from Pisgah's lofty heights, with tear-dimmed eyes, though we may not live to enter it.

"My soul anticipates the day,
When error shall be slain;
And heaven-born truths spread far and wide O'er falsehood's beaten plain."

MRS. HELEN MAR BILLINGS, Fabius, N. Y., writes: The short time I have been a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, has led me to conclude that I must have it, for at least, one year together with a copy of the HEATHENS OF THE HEATH, in cloth. I have read EXETER HALL and like it much. If the Heathens is as good, or better, I shall be pleased to peruse the same. We also read THE INDEX, which we call an excellent paper, but our neighbors cannot divine its contents so readily as those of THE TRUTH SEEKER. The mass of the people want facts in language, which is simple and easily understood. THE INDEX is more for advanced thinkers, and must, in the main, be supported by that class of minds, who are now, and will be for some time to come, in a decided minority. THE TRUTH SEEKER, on the other hand, timely steps forward and takes the masses by the hand and leads them pleasantly along, and teaches them to think for themselves. Please accept my best wishes.

WELLS'Every Man his own Lawyer,

AND

Business Form Book.

BY JOHN G. WELLS.

A Complete Guide in all Matters of Law and Business Negotiations.

For EVERY STATE IN THE UNION.

With full Instructions for proceeding without legal assistance in suits and Business Transactions of every description.

Containing: Legal Forms of Deeds, Mortgages, Leases, Affidavits, Depositions, Bonds, Orders, Contracts, Powers of Attorney, Certificates of Citizenship, Agreements, Assignments, Awards, Declarations, Demands, Letters of Credit, Arbitration, Partnership, Releases, Wills, Codicils, Submissions, Land Jointures, Tenants' and Landlords' Receipts, Public Lands, Land Warrants, Composition with Creditors, Oaths, Satisfaction of Mortgages, Pre-emption Laws, Marriage and Divorce, Patent Laws, with full Instructions to Inventors; Pension Laws, with full Instructions to enable the discharged soldier or sailor to procure back pay, pensions, bounties, and all war claims; the Laws of the different States concerning Property Exempt from Execution, Collection of Debts, Mechanics' Liens, Contracts, Limitation of Actions, Usury, Qualifications of Voters, Licenses to sell Goods, etc. Also, containing the Internal Revenue Laws, Stamp Duties, Post-Office and Custom House Regulations. Constitution of the United States, with Amendments, the whole action of the Government in relation to Reconstruction and the Freeman, Seals of the different States, with descriptions, etc.

There is no class of the community, male or female, who have, or expect to have any property, or who have any rights or privileges which require protection, who will not be greatly benefitted and advantaged by the possession of the book. It will save them money, save them trouble, save them time, save them litigation and lawyers' fees, and give them information which nobody can afford to be without.

We have no hesitation in saying that this Work will be found the most comprehensive, reliable, and indispensable BUSINESS MAN'S GUIDE ever published in this or any other country; in fact, a work which individuals in any class, in any community, cannot afford to be without.

As an attest of what we state, we refer to the free encomiums of the leading press of this country; or to any of the 100,000 individuals who have purchased the present edition and have had occasion to use the work, or have taken the trouble to examine it.

A Few Extracts from the Many Flattering Notices of the Press.

Wells' Every Man his Own Lawyer, and Business Form Book. New York: John G. Wells. As a legal adviser always at hand to instruct the reader how to proceed in suits and business transactions of all kinds; as a form book, to enable the best learned to draw deeds, mortgages, leases, orders, wills, etc.; as a guide in regard to the laws of the various States, concerning exemptions, liens, limitations of actions, and so on, the volume in question is certainly invaluable to men of business; and it is not surprising that a hundred thousand copies soon found their way into the homes and counting-houses of the multitude. Here we have not only all the various changes in the laws of the different States; the Patent Laws, the Pension Laws, the Homestead Laws, the Internal Revenue Laws, etc., with full instructions to all who may be interested in them. The publisher has been determined to make this work complete, and, to our thinking, he has succeeded. No business man or woman can with safety be without a copy of it.—New York Times.

This work has been received with great favor, and attained a large sale. The most implicit confidence can be placed upon the work as an authority on all the subjects which it treats.—Philadelphia Age.

As to the utility and convenience of this work to all business men, there can be no question.—Chicago Republican.

It is in fact, a book filled with the most valuable information for every citizen: you can purchase in this book what may be worth hundreds of dollars to you.—St. Louis Dispatch.

It is emphatically of the highest utility to every man, be our business what it may.—Pittston Gazette.

For every-day reference we have found it the most convenient of all books. For practical utility to every one cannot be over-estimated. Men of every class will find in this work just what they want, plainly, clearly, and practically stated.—Bangor Democrat.

This excellent work should be in the hands of every farmer and business man.—Cincinnati Times.

The work embraces 650 large 12mo pp., and is printed on fine paper, handsomely bound.

A NEW BOOK. THE Doctrine of Descent AND DARWINISM.

By PROF. OSCAR SCHMIDT, of the University of Strasburgh.

This is No. 13 of Appleton's International Scientific Series, and is not excelled by any one of its fellows, and is richly worthy the perusal of every enquiring mind. It is a work of 334 pages, 12 mo., and contains twenty-six illustrations. It is an elaborate review and survey of the whole subject of Evolution and Darwin's special philosophy, giving in clear language a comprehensive view of the subject.

It is eminently a whole library in one volume, and we recommend it in the highest terms. Sent by mail. Price, $1.50; postage, 15 cts. Address,

THE Boston Investigator!

THE OLDEST REFORM JOURNAL IN THE UNITED STATES

Will commence its 45th year April 18, 1875.

PUBLISHED EVERY WEDNESDAY

at 24 Washington street, Boston, Mass., by JOSHUA P. MENDUM.

HORACE SEAVER, Editor.

PRICE: $3.50 per annum. Single copies, 7 cents. Specimen copies sent on receipt of a Two-Cent Stamp to pay the postage.

The Investigator is devoted to the Liberal cause in religion; or, in other words, to Universal Mental Liberty. Independent in all its discussions, discarding superstitious theories of what never can be known it devotes its columns to things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who have entered its unknown shores. Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interest of this world, it confines itself to things of this life entirely. It will soon commence its FORTY-FIFTH year and asks for support from those who are fond of sound reasoning, good reading, reliable news, anecdotes, science, art, and a useful Family Journal. Reader, please send your subscriptions for six months or one year; and if you are not satisfied with the way the Investigator is conducted, we won't ask you to continue with us any longer. Now is the time to subscribe.

HULL'S CRUCIBLE;

A Wide-awake Spiritualistic and Social Reform Journal.

Prominent among the reforms advocated in HULL'S CRUCIBLE are the following:

1. REFORMS IN RELIGION, such as shall do away with many of the outward forms and restore the power of godliness.

2. REFORMS IN THE GOVERNMENT, such as shall do away with the Rings, Cliques and Monopolies, and put all matters concerning the Government of the People into the hands of the People.

3. REFORMS REGULATING THE RELATIONS OF CAPITAL AND LABOR, such as shall secure to Labor, the producer of Capital, the control of Capital.

4. REFORMS REGULATING THE RELATIONS OF THE SEXES TO EACH OTHER, such as shall secure to every member of each sex the entire control of their own person, and place Prostitution in or out of Marriage for money or any other cause, out of the question.

Any thought calculated to benefit humanity, whether coming under any of the above, or any other propositions, will find a cordial welcome in the columns of HULL'S CRUCIBLE.

HULL'S CRUCIBLE joins hands with all Reformers and Reformers of whatever School, and welcomes any ideas, however unpopular, calculated to benefit humanity.

Those interested in a live Reformatory Journal, are invited to hand in their subscriptions.

Odds and Ends.

It is easy enough to make the acquaintance of apple dealers. "Buy their fruits—we shall know them."

If you want to teach a dog arithmetic, tie up one of his paws, and he will put down three and carry one every time.

"HULLO, bub! trying to get an appetite for your dinner?" "Well, n-o-o, not exactly; fact is, I'm trying to get a dinner for my appetite."

HAVE you "Blasted Hopes?" asked a young lady of a librarian with a handkerchief tied over his jaw. "No, ma'am," said he, "It's only a blasted toothache."

"THREE and sixpence per gal!" exclaimed Mrs. Pardington, looking over the Price Current. "Why, bless me, what is the world a coming to, when gals are valued at only three and sixpence?"

"WHY, Ichabod, I thought you got married more'n a year ago?" "Well, Aunt Jerusha, it was talked of, but I found that the girl and all her folks were opposed to it, and so I just gave them all the mitten, and let the thing drop."

A COUPLE of disputatious neighbors were contending as to which is the oldest business in the world, when the wife of one of them, with her babe in her arms, silenced them by declaring that the oldest business in the world is the nursery business.

"NUMBERS is what does the business," shouted a man who lives on Mechanic street. "When my wife is alone, I can reason with her and run things to suit myself, but when her mother is around, I am not even a stockholder in the concern."

A SUNDAY-SCHOOL teacher told her class about the wise and foolish virgins, and asked them the next Sunday to repeat the story. All but one little miss had forgotten, and she only remembered that it was about "them women who forgot their kerosene."

THE BIBLE AS A SCHOOL BOOK.—Scholar (reading), "These are the children which Milcah bore."

School Marm.—"Stop! that is wrong; read it over."

Scholar.—"These are the children which Milcah bore."

School Marm.—"That will do. That is quite possible. They might milk a bear, but they could not milk a boar."

THE other day a New York lady went to pay her respects to one of the latest arrivals on the list of babyhood, when the following colloquy took place between her and the little four-year old sister of the new comer: "I have come for that baby now," said the lady. "You can't have it," was the reply. "But I must; I came over on purpose," urged the visitor. "We can't spare it at all," persisted the child, "but I'll get a piece of paper, and you can cut out a pattern."

An old farmer employed a son of Erin to work for him on the farm. Pat was constantly misplacing the end-boards in the cart—the front board behind and the tail board in front, which made the old gentleman very irritable. To prevent blunders, he painted on both boards a large "B," then calling Pat to him and showing him the boards, said: "Now, you block-head, you need make no mistake, as they are now both marked. This (pointing to one board) is 'B' for before, and that (indicating the tail-board) is 'B' for behind," whereupon the old gentleman marched off with great dignity.

A MISSOURI CLERGYMAN ACCUSED.
BUT HIS OFFENSE IS NOT OF A VERY SERIOUS NATURE.

An old lady came up to the office Wednesday. She was worn and tired from climbing the winding stairs, and she sank almost breathless into the waste basket, putting the poems and stories it contained to the only press they will ever know. There was a troubled, anxious look on her face, a pair of green spectacles on her nose, and a general air of sorrow and exhaustion that appealed at once to our tenderest feelings. The feelings answered the appeal and we stepped respectfully forward. After the aged female had recovered her breath, she asked:

"Is there a loryer's office in this buildin'?"

We answered in the affirmative, but we are sorry to say that the legal gentleman was out of town.

"Out of town, eh? Well I s'pose I'll have to find some other loryer, I kem in town a purpose to have this thing fixed up, an' I ain't a going back until I know whether there is any law an' ekeity in this country."

We ventured to remind the dame that lawing was a losing business in the end, and should be resorted to only in the most aggravated cases.

"Aggravated cases!" she screeched, and the manuscript in the basket rattled violently.

"Young man, it is the most aggravated case you ever heard of. You ken never know the anguish of a mother's heart, when her only dorter goes astray an' follars after false idols."

"Your daughter has had trouble, then?" "No, it's me what's havin' the trouble; but she's a causin' it—she an' that tarnal sheep-faced preacher."

"Ah! a minister in the case! I think I understand. Such things are becoming too common; alas! too frequent. The cloth is being brought into disrepute by such scoundrels, 'who steal the livery of heaven to serve the devil in.' Poor girl!"

"Pore nothin'! She's a brazen huzzy to go back on her mother's teachin'." Lord knows I've allus tried to raise her right."

"But you must consider, my good woman, that your daughter had peculiar temptations. You must make allowance for the fact that the tempter came to her in holy garb imposing upon her confidence in the assumed character of a spiritual adviser, silencing the voice of her conscience with cunningly chosen scriptural quotations. You must not be severe on her."

"Well, Hanner was a'bedient girl till he kem foolin' around. He kem to the house purty often, but I didn't s'pose nothin' was wrong till a week ago, when Hanner tole me, Then I giv him a mighty big piece of my mind."

"He denied it of course?"

"No, he didn't. He said he had done his dooty as a Christian. An' his congregation are all tickled over it, an' that's what makes me bile."

"Why, that is an aggravated case. That he should be guilty of such a thing is bad enough; that he should call it the performance of a duty is worse, and that his congregation should uphold him in such vile practices is beyond belief."

"Well, it's so an I want to get a loryer to issuo a conjunction or injectment or somethin', to stop it."

"I fear there is no legal redress, unless it is a matter of very recent occurrence. A bill has passed the legislature governing such cases but it wont work backward."

"What is in that bill?" asked the old lady, her face lighting up with a new hope.

"It makes it obligatory upon the man to either marry the woman or support the chi—"

"What!" shrieked the woman springing up with a suddenness that sent the basket of unacknowledged genius half way across the room.

"You baril-headed idiot! My girl ain't no such fool as that! You editors think you're smart, an' you're alluss s'posed things wusn't they are. I've been a life-long Methodist, and I've tried to raise my dorter the same faith, but that tarnal 'Piscopalyun preacher has got her to 'gre to jine his church. I'm her nateral garjeen an' I ain't agoin to 'low her to do it. Ef she can't get along with the same religion her mother's got she shant have any. That's the whole case, an' there no marryin' nur s'portin nur Beecherin' in it."

From the way the old lady bumped along down the stairs we fear she was unduly agitated.

We shall never jump to another conclusion.—no, not if should lie within an inch of our nose, and pointed proofs were pressing against us on each side and behind.

CATARRH CURE.

What is Catarrh? It is an affection of the head, which may end in Deafness, partial or total Blindness, diseases of the throat and vocal organs, and even in Consumption.

In nine cases out of ten, when people fancy they have only a "cold in the head," they have CATARRH!

It is a terrible disease and should not be trifled with. The Best Remedy known for it is that prepared by the Rev. R. B. Lockwood, which has the endorsement of such eminent physicians as Dr. Geo. N. Tibbles of Hudson City, N. J.; Dr. W. H. Newell, Jersey City Heights; Dr. A. B. Laidlaw, Jersey City, N. J.; and of such distinguished ministers as Rev. W. H. Dikeman, New York, Rev. W. H. McCormack, Mt. Hermon, N. J., and very many others.

This medicine is prepared in good faith and may be relied on in every case to effect a permanent and speedy cure.

Rev. R. B. Lockwood's NASA! DOUCHE to facilitate the use of the CATARRH CURE is indispensable to insure the cure of obstinate chronic cases and will be found valuable in all stages of the disease.

Rev. R. B. Lockwood's LIVER AND STOMACH PILLS, for the cure of DYSPEPSIA and all disorders of the Stomach and Digestive Organs, have the highest recommendation from the thousands who have used them.

WINWOOD READE, the well-known author of books of travel is dead.

"She is my mother-in-law, with all that the name implies," said a witness in an Indianapolis lawsuit.

ONLY seven of the sixty-one cardinals who witnessed the Pope's elevation to the Pontifical throne are still living.

ONE WHO WASN'T KISSED.—Thus far no one has accused any of the parties to the Tilton-Beecher case of kissing Mrs. Morse.—Cincinnati Commercial.

RECOVERING HIS MEMORY.—Since Mr. Beecher left the stand, his memory is said to be slowly but surely recovering.—St. Louis Republican.

"Does the Lord love a man who spends at a church festival the money he owes his washerwoman?" is a question asked by a Pennsylvania paper.

THE experiment of transfusing blood has just been applied to Gen. Frank Blair, who has long been prostrated with paralysis at his home in St. Louis. Six ounces of blood were injected into his veins, and the result is said to be favorable.

"Do you think that souls separated here are united hereafter?" asked a pale emaciated pietist of a friend. "I hope not" was the chilling reply. "It cost me a pretty good figure to get a divorce, and when I invested that money I invested it for time and eternity too."

It may be interesting to know that the people of this country used last year 1,636,335 pounds of arsenic 789,787 pounds of camphor, 116,053 pounds of jalap, 26,202 pounds of ipecac, 297,213 pounds of nux vomica, and $399,-399 worth of vaccine virus, all of which was imported.

In the twelve years immediately preceding the completion of the drainage and water supply system of Salisbury, Eng., the yearly mortality amounted to 27 per 1000. During the twelve years following the mortality fell to 20 per 1000, and during the last three years it was only 17 per 1000.

"WHAT tremendous lying there has been—perjury, perjury, perjury. Surely some one ought to go to prison from that court-room," said Brother Bowen to a reporter a few days ago; and those most familiar with his settled convictions, are convinced he knows Mr. Beecher to be the man.

SLOBBERING AND CRYING ALL AROUND.—There is a rapidly growing feeling of disgust at the revelations of the trial, apart from the question of guilt or innocence of the accused. I can best express this feeling by using the language of my club friend. "It is," said he, "the greatest case of slobbering I have ever seen; everybody kissed and cried over everybody else, and tears enough were shed to run a sawmill. It was a case of boo-hoo and letter-writing, and everybody seems to have gone around with his handkerchief in one hand and writing materials in the other. It's enough to turn the stomach of a buzzard."—Cincinnati Gazette.

MR. FRANK BIRD, the recent candidate for the Governorship of Massachusetts, says: "From the time I saw that Mr. Beecher would not arrest Mrs. Woodhull for that publication, a conclusion was forced upon my mind, and I am sorry to say that every development since then has added to that conviction."

THE REV. Thomas Barnard, an English clergyman of the Established Church, got rather drunk in London, and in that condition went to the Globe Theatre, where Lydia Thompson had been playing in burlesque. A new piece was produced that night, and Miss Thompson did not appear in it. The clergyman was so enraged by disappointment that he shouted and hissed, and therefore was arrested.

MR. BEECHER is author of some thirty-five volumes. Before he finally steps down and out, we suggest that he add two or three more to his distinguished productions. Let one be a work on Kissing, with a critical analysis of the different kinds of kissing. Let another be upon the Nature of "True Inwardness" and the innocence of adultery. Let the third be Perjury for a clergyman not a crime. He possesses the talent and experience to handle these subjects in a masterly manner, and if he gets them up in the style of his Life of Christ, they will doubtless meet with large sales.

MR. BEECHER'S FRIENDS DISAPPOINTED.—There is a good deal of disappointment pervading all classes that Mr. Beecher has not more clearly explained his damaging letters; but as they are very difficult to explain, perhaps he did the best he could. And upon the whole, it is safe to say that he did as well as any one could under his circumstances. We think he has failed to change the opinions of those who were previously convinced of his guilt, and the issue still remains unsettled, and probably will thus remain, whatever shall be the verdict of the jury. We wish we could give Mr. Beecher a stronger endorsement than this, but we cannot do so conscientiously.—Rochester Democrat.

WHATEVER failings Mr. Beecher may have, the world cannot but admire his great generosity. When he learned Tilton was needing some aid in publishing the Golden Age, he unsolicitedly mortgaged his house and presented him with $5,000. Finding that that modest damsel, Bessie Turner, wished to improve her education, he freely pulled out his pocket-book and gave $2,000 for that meritorious object. When he discovered that retaining his position in Plymouth pulpit was somewhat distasteful to Theodore, with great magnanimity he offered to "step down and out," sacrifice all his honor and fame, and be destroyed, if necessary, if thereby Tilton's happiness could be increased. Who can help admiring such self-sacrificing liberality and disinterested benevolence?

ANOTHER FRAIL SHEPHERD.—A little more than a year ago, the Rev. J. J. Reeder, a young minister of the Gospel, went to Milford, Pa., and for a brief period studied under the Rev. E. F. Bischoe, pastor of the Methodist Episcopal church of that village. Subsequently Mr. Reeder was sent by the Newark Methodist Episcopal Conference to fill a vacancy in the Methodist Episcopal church at this place. The young divine came, and for a time his meetings were largely attended. He was very fond of the female members of his church, and the greater part of his time was spent in their society. He finally took to buying and trading fast horses. In this he was successful. He finally purchased a horse for which he gave his note, but ere the same became due, he suddenly departed for parts unknown, leaving many unpaid bills. In his hasty flight, he left his trunks, books, etc., behind, and the same have just been sold at public auction.

MR. BEECHER CONTRADICTING HIMSELF FLATLY.—Beecher has shown himself to be the most forgetful and untrustworthy witness, measured by the simple rules of common sense and of law, that has yet testified in the case, unless those negroes can be excepted. In a carefully prepared written "statement," he purposely created the impression that Mr. Moulton threatened him with a pistol, and thus extorted from him Mrs. Tilton's letter of retraction. He swears on the witness stand that the showing of the pistol was purely accidental, and had nothing to do with the surrender of Mrs. Tilton's letter. As a lie is the intent to deceive, Beecher has lied once, on his own testimony. Beecher in his sworn statement, represented Moulton as a blackmailer, and purposely caused that impression to go abroad. He swears that he did not so regard him—all his testimony shows that he did not, and shows that this theory was merely the trick of the lawyers. He swears that the lawyers forced him to utter lie number two. Innocence needs no lawyer's tricks. Having, in effect sworn that he lied in calling Moulton a blackmailer, and having sworn that he lied in representing that Moulton threatened him with a pistol, we are prepared to believe that he has not altogether clung to the truth when he said he didn't.—*Cin. LOVE IN THE CHURCH.—The Methodist church at Nottingham, Manitoba, recently had double service of a most infelicitous character. A quarrel had divided the congregation, and each party claimed to be dominant. Each had called a new minister, and the two clergymen were on hand to begin their labors. The first to arrive took possession of the pulpit, and the other sat behind the chancel rail. The man in the pulpit gave out a hymn, the other man gave out another, and both were sung confusedly by the rival sections of the assembly. Then the man behind the railing started off on his sermon, and the other began to read a chapter of Scripture. When the reading was over, and it was plain that the preaching was going to last much longer, the partisans of the reader sung another hymn with a loud organ accompaniment. The musical noise drowned the voice of the clergyman in the pulpit, but when it was over he was found to be preaching right along as though nothing unusual had happened. The clergyman in the chancel, less cool, was unable to fix his thoughts on a discussion, and so remained silent and beaten. At the close of this extraordinary scene, a deacon explained that it had been enacted "under legal advice and to further the cause of Christ." It is more easy to understand about the legal advice than how such belligerent proceedings were calculated to "further the cause of Christ."

AS WE GO TO PRESS the eighteenth week of the great scandal trial is completed, and that an end will be reached ere very long, begins to be apparent. The country, doubtless, rejoices at this, for everybody is tired of the perjury connected with the case. The evidence produced in rebuttal shows that much of the testimony offered by the defense was false, and seems to have been manufactured for the occasion. Of this character was the stories told by the negroes; the accounts about Tilton's riding in a carriage with Mrs. Woodhull in the Rossel procession; Gen. Tracy's statements about the double part he acted; the mis-statements of Claflin, Cleveland and Storrs; Bessie Turner's fancies and fallacies; but most of all, the sworn statements of the great Pastor himself. He stated the interview between Bowen and himself, when the latter gave him that imperative letter from Tilton was a casual call Mr. Bowen made upon him at his own house. Mr. Bowen swears it was at Mr. Freeland's, and that the interview was by special appointment. Beecher swore that at that interview he gave information to Bowen in reference to the waywardness of Tilton which caused Bowen to discharge Tilton; and upon this he endeavored to explain his remarkable letters of contrition, remorse and "ragged edge." Bowen swears this was not so; that Beecher said nothing that caused him to discharge Tilton, and in fact he had resolved upon the discharge before he saw Beecher. The testimony of the week has been decidedly damaging to the Plymouth Pastor. It is a mournful affair that a man of Mr. Beecher's talent and reputation should commit such crimes. Adultery is the least. Perjury and an effort to blacken the character of innocent persons is most damnable. It looks very bad on the part of Mr. Evans and his co-workers that they should employ perjury to try to win the case. They must be aware of the guilt of their client, and that their principal witnesses swore falsely.

CHAPTER XVII.

The power that properly belonged to the State was passing steadily away from the Church, and the hand of the Governor was already raised to give the last crushing blow to the vile superstition which had blinded even his own understanding. The God-like attribute of reason that has never proved wholly false to its divine origin, was slowly beginning to right itself, and to break through the clouds and mists that had so long obscured it.

The corrupt and hollow among the clergy, who had from the vilest motives pandered to the terrible delusion, were now quietly deserting it, as rats desert a sinking ship; and, although the prison doors were not yet thrown open to those who had been confined on the charge of witchcraft, and notwithstanding that an occasional arrest was still made among the accused or suspected, yet it was apparent to those who could look below the surface, that the diabolical delusion was doomed.

The sudden impetus given to the action of the Governor, in relation to the superstition, was owing simply to the circumstance that, on the day that Francis Ellencourt called he was made aware of the startling fact, that among the papers found in the head of the Fanatic's staff, was one containing a list of those who were to be seized and accused of secret dealings with the Evil One, which list was headed with the name of Lady Phipps herself!

There was enough in the document to show that a deep plot had been laid, in which his Excellency could not have failed to become involved also, and which, if not at once checked, might tend to the sudden overthrow of his government, and the total destruction of himself and his family. Hence his instant action, and the unexpected moves which made him almost, if not quite, master of the situation before his enemies had taken the alarm.

In the meantime, from their isolated position, neither Alice nor Madge were aware of the reaction that had taken place in the mind of the public, as well as in that of the Governor; for, although Peter Huskins called frequently to see Sloucher, no word of the altered condition of affairs escaped his lips. In truth, the witchfinder felt his vocation steadily passing away from him; and being a sincere wrong-doer, he began to open his eyes and to almost view the situation from a standpoint that had not previously presented itself to his distorted imagination.

But more extraordinary still, the Fanatic, whose injuries, notwithstanding the frequent visits of the leech, were slowly but surely bearing him toward the narrow house, had of late, through some strange revolution that seemed to have passed through his being, won, with imploring eyes and pleading inarticulate words, evidences of compassion from Madge Gordon, who had begun, out of the pure depths of her womanly instincts, to pity the bodily anguish that was wasting his life without a moment's cessation.

He had done her a wrong that had blasted her happiness, and had darkened her reason for years, but his eyes had lost all their fiendish light, and more than once of late she had discovered tears stealing in silence down his hollow, wounded cheeks, while the face that had been hideous, lost much, if not all, of its repulsiveness.

"It is, indeed, strange," said Alice, who had listened to this disclosure on the part of her companion, "and perhaps, after all our dread and horror of him, the miserable sufferer is not lost to every human sentiment."

"I am now," said Madge, "beginning to understand a little of what he attempts to say, and am satisfied that you have nothing farther to fear from him at least, however it may stand between you and Huskins."

"There is," said Alice, in reply to this latter, "something hopeful in this. And could I but get any intelligence of my safety to the villa, and learn whether there has been received any word from my beloved Maurice, I could remain in a measure contented until my fate was decided."

"No doubt," returned Madge, "I might, had I exerted myself, have found means of apprising your friends of your safety. But I felt there would have been danger in it, inasmuch as it would possibly give some clue to your enemies of your place of refuge, and lead to your imprisonment in quarters more repulsive still. However, if I could come across poor, little Titmouse, for whom all my affection has now returned, I should convey to him enough to satisfy your friend, that you were safe for the time being at least."

It was well that there had been an ample stock of food in the Fanatic's quarters, else the poor prisoner and her guardian might have been sadly pinched long ere this. But Sloucher had paid more attention to the inner man than had ever been anticipated, and never permitted himself to run short in this relation. Now, however, he was but a slight tax on his stores, although those to whom he had done such wrong began to minister to his wants with a feeling more kindly and humane than they thought themselves capable of under the circumstances.

A man is divine by accident only. A woman is divine by nature. The avenues to his sympathies are difficult and tortuous with a detective at every turn, while those leading to the heart of a woman are broad, straight, and as open as the day, without a suspicion obstructing them. On the one part, there is cold calculation; on the other, the frankest confidence; and hence the sufferings and misconceptions to which she is so constantly subjected. Unless you humiliate and degrade her, you can never tramp the angel out of her, and even then, amid the ruin that is wrought, there are to be found some traces of the vanished plumes. A man is frequently a monster beyond redemption. A woman is never wholly lost. She has the right by nature to a double stock of sympathy, and she has got it. She bestows more human life on the world than a man, and has absolutely a larger share in existence than he; from the fact, that she fosters its metaphysical being and perfects its physical structure to an extent totally beyond his opportunities or capacity. In the words, a wife and a mother, there is a broader and more important significance than there is in the words, a husband and a father. And although Alice Ravenswood was still a maiden and without the sacred investiture of either holy appellation, there was in her sweet young heart, bright promise of the future as she listened to the anguished moans of her prostrate enemy, and consented to stand by his bed side with words of forgiveness already promised him by Madge.

But the one great anxiety still pressed on the fair girl—that of conveying if possible some word of intelligence to the poor invalid and those who had not now heard from her for weeks.

Although the day had been dark and chilly, the apartment in which Alice and Madge were seated had been so long barricaded against the external atmosphere, its oppressiveness now manifested itself to such a degree, that Madge was constrained to open one of those apertures that once served for loopholes, and that had long been closed by the Fanatic with a view to preserving the secrecy of his more worldly apartment, which was lighted from above. To accomplish this, all that was necessary was to push back a small sliding shutter in the wainscoting, and withdraw a solid block of pine of considerable size, fitted exactly to the largest of the openings. This Madge did, just as night had set in after another long day of suspense on the part of Alice, and without dwelling for a moment on the fact, that now that the lamp was lighted its rays streamed through the orifice a short distance from the ground into the darkness without.

When Titmouse began to entertain a surmise that his young mistress was perhaps, after all, a prisoner in the lonely residence of the Fanatic, he made sundry surreptitious visits to the old block-house after night, but all to no purpose, for so far. Time and again he had crept round and round the gloomy building in the hopes of being able to get a glimpse of the interior, or to catch some word or token that might verify his suspicions; and as often did he return to the villa to brood over his disappointment, alone, for from all save the Chief he kept the secret of his visits, lest so strange a fancy might subject him to ridicule. As already observed, all the inmates of the villa and the friends of Alice, including the Chief and many of the Indians, were constantly making the most minute and diligent search for her. Maurice and Francis with the assurance of but little interference with their operations, were ever moving from point to point in the hope of gaining some intelligence of her; but, as may be supposed, to no purpose. Every avenue had been so securely closed against them by the death of the Noose and the half-breed, as well as through the precautions of Sloucher, not a gleam of hope could they discover in any direction. Even the witchfinder, who had recently seemed to become more manageable, and perhaps inclined to doubt his own infallibility, declared that he knew nothing whatever of the fugitive, nor did Sloucher, for whose sincerity and veracity he was still willing to pledge himself. This was most disheartening; but still the dwarf was determined to keep his eye on the solitary domicile of the Fanatic; and in furtherance of this resolution, he had determined to make another pilgrimage to it, and that too on the very night at which we have now arrived.

While, then, Alice and Madge were conversing on the low condition of the Fanatic and the possible upshot of his death, which might lead to the discovery of the fugitive. Their attention was attracted by a noise that seemed to proceed from the opening just mentioned. The eyes of Alice were suddenly turned in alarm toward that point, when, simultaneously with her companion, she plainly beheld the features of Titmouse who had gained the aperture, and was now evidently but waiting a signal to work his way through it, or to receive some communication from the lips of his astonished mistress.

Madge on perceiving the face of the dwarf sprang instantly to her feet, and approaching the opening, whispered to him to squeeze himself through, if he thought he could make his exit speedily by the same passage. The little fellow without a moment's hesitation, wormed himself through the opening and in a few moments stood in the apartment.

This was joy inexpressible to Alice, who now, for the first time, learned of the return of Maurice and of all that had occurred since the night of her flight. It was unbounded relief to her to hear that Francis Ellencourt had arrived, also, and had been with the Governor; while the fact of Florence having taken up her abode temporarily at the villa, with a view to solacing and sustaining the spirits of her invalid mother was to her most consoling. Now, however, she should be able to relieve her lover and friends of the terrible anxiety that had so long beset them as to her probable fate. She resolved, consequently, to warn them one and all not to approach her place of concealment at present, as she was in no absolute immediate danger, from the fact that her enemy, the Fanatic, had neither the will nor the power to work her further mischief. This she hastily embodied in a note, to her mother and Maurice, which was given to the dwarf, who soon disappeared through the channel which he had entered, and over which the shutter was now securely slid at once.

But the fanatics of the church, and those of the Special Court created by his Excellency, were still powerful enough to make one final effort to mark the terrible drama with a wholesale sacrifice of those who had been already consigned to prison. The gloomy and dangerous men who were sincerely impressed with the belief that it was their bounden duty to bring to the stake or the gallows all who were charged with witchcraft, had yet a sufficient following to make them formidable, even in the eyes of the Governor, who did not consider himself yet in a position to dissolve the Court. Hence, these fanatics, who were sustained by many misguided soldiers and citizens, had, after due deliberation in secret council and in prayer, determined to clutch their lawful prey from the grasp of the civil authorities and sacrifice the enemies of the Lord even at the risk of their own lives—that is should there be any further indications on the part of his Excellency to reject the superstition as unfounded, or interfere with the judgment of the Court.

In a single hour, then, affairs that had been growing more favorable for the persecuted took a sudden and unexpected turn; and even while Titmouse was on his way back to the villa, both meeting, and conspiracy against the authorities had assumed so active and dangerous an aspect, that those in prison, and such as had been suspected and named for denunciation, were in a position the most perilous, as they now were marked for wholesale destruction by a force that might, perhaps, cope successfully with that at the command of the government.

This secret impulse given to the infamous persecution appealed once more to the superstition of the witchfinder, who, without pausing to analyze the motives, threw himself again into harness, but this time with more caution and secrecy. As already observed, his convictions were sincere, and if he had begun to waver in relation to them, now that the servants of the Lord had determined to return to the charge with vigor, he fell into their views as warmly as ever, presuming that the weakness that had recently beset his opinions was simply due to the machinations of the Evil One.

Ill then, as the Fanatic was, Peter Huskins determined to visit him on this very night, to apprise him that, during the evening, it had been decided to cut off by a sudden and unexpected stroke all those already imprisoned under the charge of witchcraft, as well as those suspected of that terrible crime. This latter the witchfinder had determined to endorse, as the only project that could save the land and the servants of the Lord from the dangers that beset both.

Full of this intelligence, then, Peter set out after nightfall for the abode of the Fanatic, which he reached in time to be attracted by a singular gleam of light from a part of the building that had always appeared to him to present a solid resistance to anything of the sort. He was surprised, and paused within a short distance of the building to note the circumstance, when suddenly he descried a human head mount to a level with the aperture through which the light streamed. He was astounded beyond measure, and moving cautiously forward was about to seize upon the object of his wonderment, when the thought struck him that, doubtless, this was some emissary of the foul fiend, who had, by his mysterious power, caused the solid wall to give away before him, so that he might enter and plague the sick man.

This flash of thought caused him to recoil; nor was he greatly reassured when he saw the form of Titmouse pass through the wall and disappear on the inside. Perceiving, however, that the light again streamed through the opening he cautiously approached, and peering through caught a glimpse of Alice, as she was eagerly listening to the dwarf, and making enquiries in relation to those at the villa.

Hearing her name mentioned by Titmouse, he at once knew her through her disguise, and, of course, as he was not in a position to see Madge Gordon from where she was standing, he rushed to the conclusion that the witch Ravenswood had taken possession of the house of his trusty colleague, and was now holding communication with her familiars, who were passing and repassing through the solid wall.

Now, however, he began to discover that the light came through one of the old loopholes, and as it was soon again partially obstructed he plainly recognized the features of the dwarf as he once more appeared at the orifice and began to creep through it. Perplexed and confused beyond measure, he determined to secure the little urchin, the moment he touched the ground, and possess himself of the missive that he saw Alice hand him. It were best, however, not to disturb the sick man by any outcry, so, moving off rapidly into the path that he knew the dwarf must take on his way back to the villa, he waited in silence the approach of the little emissary, presuming that the note of which he was the bearer, would disclose a harvest of names that might be turned to good account by the morose and inflamed fanatics that now had become desperate in all things.

He had not paused but a very short period when his ear caught the hasty approach of Titmouse, who, all unconscious of danger, was rapidly retracing his steps toward the villa. Soon there was but a single pace between them, and Huskins had just stretched forth his sinewy arm to clutch his intended victim, when he was thrown forward several feet on his side, as though he had been tripped, and struck or dashed suddenly from his place by some one behind him. Stunned by the fall, he lay a few seconds before he fully comprehended what had occurred; but recovering his feet as soon as might be, he started off along the track taken by the dwarf, in the hope of overhauling him, although with no very well assured feeling of success, for again he was almost satisfied that he had for the moment been baffled by some agent of the enemy of mankind. Still he was in the service of the Lord and should prevail against the Powers of Evil. He had not proceeded far, however, until he was again assailed, and this time he found himself in the clutch of two men, who, aided by a third, closely pinioned him, and threatening him with instant death if he made any outcry, deprived him of some papers, which they handed to the third party, and hurried him off into the forest in the direction of the ravine. While he was being bound he thought he could descry the diminutive form of the dwarf standing close by, and just as he was being led away, he felt satisfied that the little urchin and the third man, who had assisted in binding his arms, had followed the track to the villa.

After traveling for upwards of an hour, the two men halted before an immense mass of rock, when one of them dragging aside a dense mass of withered foliage, thrust him through an opening that he recognized as the mouth of the cave. Here, while in total darkness, they firmly bound his feet and legs, and laying him gently down on the rocky floor, they left him to his meditations without uttering a single word. He felt satisfied that they were Indians; although it was possible that they might be whites, who had assumed the disguise and the broken English of the red man. Be this as it may, he was now perfectly helpless, and doubtless left to perish in this gloomy place beyond the reach of aid, or at least the probable approach of succor until death had done its work. This was a terrible fate, indeed; but had he not consigned many a poor trembling fellow-creature to quite as dark and as hopeless—as horrible a dungeon.

As the silence grows upon him, and the sense that he has been left to die by his captors, who have, he feels, hastened from the place, he utters a long, loud cry, that reverberates through the cavern; and then all is silence. He seeks to gain his feet, but in vain; nor can he move his hands, or his closely pinioned arms. Again, a cry escapes his pale lips, and again a dread silence succeeds it. His brain begins to burn! He writhes in his anguish a few feet from where he had been laid, and the cave is silent for the rest of the night.

As already remarked, Titmouse had concealed his suspicion in relation to Alice being held in thrall in the gloomy abode of the Fanatic, from all but Red Wing, who now was to be seen daily at the villa or in its neighborhood. The chief, who had no small confidence in the judgment and penetration of the little morsel of humanity, promised to observe silence on the subject, and to keep an eye on the Fanatic's, lest perchance the suspicions of the dwarf might in reality have the broadest foundation. In furtherance of this design, on this very night, and without being aware that Titmouse had preceded him a few minutes previously, he and two of his red companions took the path to the gloomy abode of the Fanatic, in the hope of being able to gain some information with regard to the surmises of the dwarf. They arrived at the lonely habitation just as Huskins had reached the spot from whence he recognized Alice and the features of Titmouse as he crept through the loop-hole or window. Peering from behind a tree within a single yard of the witchfinder, they also witnessed all that he had seen, even to the handing of the letter. Red Wing knew that on the reappearance of the dwarf, Huskins would seek to possess himself of the missive, but determined to prevent it, and as he saw the witchfinder hasten along the path leading to the villa, he knew the intention was to seize the little fellow at some distance from the house, so as not to arouse the suspicions of Miss Ravenswood. Softly he and his comrades followed, taking their stand almost within reach of Huskins, as he now remained awaiting the approach of his intended victim. While following in the footsteps of the witchfinder, the chief had given rapid directions as to how he was to be disposed of; for now that he had seen Alice, he must not be permitted to lay his hands on her; for it was evident from his exclamation when he had caught a glimpse of her, that she had been secreted in the Fanatic's without his previous knowledge; although, in reality, her presence there had been attributed by him to some demoniacal agency. Nevertheless he must now be taken care of and not permitted to return to the Fanatic's, and hence the disposition already made of him.

When Red Wing and the dwarf reached the villa, the joyful tidings they had to convey, were broken gradually to the invalid. On perceiving her daughter's handwriting, Mrs. Ravenswood fainted; but was soon restored, to learn the happy news that she was alive and safe, as well as being in no apprehension of immediate danger. Maurice, on devouring the contents of the note, became as pale as death, and were it not for a superhuman effort would have wept like a woman when the tide returned to his cheek. He could have flown to his beloved, but her wise words forbade him. Life and joy, however, had begun to stir within them all. Florence and Francis were relieved of a terrible fear that had pressed upon them; and all the household seemed to feel that the hour of deliverance was drawing nigh. The papers that had been taken from the witchfinder, who had been searched at the instance of Titmouse, contained like those of the Fanatic some information of the most vital importance to the Governor, and these Francis determined to lay before his Excellency early in the morning, in the belief that they could not fail to precipitate instantly a crisis in which justice and truth should triumph at once. John Lightfoot and Martha began to indulge in the hope that the day of oppression was fast dawning to a close; while Emily, in expectation of soon seeing her beloved young mistress once more, sobbed in a retired nook, for no inconsiderable time, on the shoulder, or perhaps something very like the breast of Robert. There was much that was akin to peace in the household that night, and a bright winged angel, very like in appearance to Alice, flitted through the slumbers of Maurice and those of the invalid.

When Titmouse had disappeared from the apartment where he had had the sudden and unexpected interview with Alice, and when the slide had been again drawn over the aperture by which he had made his egress, Alice and her companion sat down to congratulate themselves on the accidental and fortunate rencontre. The period of the interview had been too brief to put Miss Ravenswood in possession of all that could interest her deeply; but it was sufficiently long to relieve her burdened mind of the heavy load that for many days had weighed it down. While in the midst of their confidences, a sound from the adjoining apartment attracted the attention to the sick man, when rising simultaneously, they both entered his chamber, and, for the first time since her abduction, Alice stood beside him. The meeting was strange in its essence, and affected both in no ordinary degree. On perceiving her, the Fanatic, pale and motionless, looked up as if to read her heart in her eyes; and when he perceived them moist with the tears of compassion for his intense and prolonged suffering, he slowly extricated his attenuated hand from the covering of the pallet that had long been made comfortable, and extended it timidly toward her. She took it frankly, and returning its feeble pressure, she laid her own delicate fingers in token of forgiveness upon his clammy brow. A long-drawn sigh told of the relief he experienced, and now, to complete the triumph of the divine in humanity, he heard from the lips of Madge also, a full and tear-bedewed pardon for all the misery that both she and her long-lost daughter had suffered at his hands, for she now revealed her whole knowledge of what had passed in years gone by. There was a deep struggle in the breast of the once powerful man, as with unaccustomed feelings, and in a scarcely audible voice, although in words now perfectly intelligible, he poured forth his repentant soul in trembling accents of gratitude for the boon bestowed upon him. When his pardon had been sealed by both, he motioned Madge to draw near, and slowly whispering to her something that escaped Alice, the woman withdrew for a moment. In a brief space she returned, bearing a small package of papers and a pen and ink. Alice was now motioned to a seat at the rude table, and being requested to write, the sufferer dictated a codicil to the description of a will, or schedule of all his earthly goods and possessions, giving to Madge Gordon the whole in trust for her grandson, until he came of age, with sufficient for her own maintenance during her life.

Alice was astonished at the extent and value of the property; nor had her companion any idea previously of its magnitude. The paragraph perfected, the sick man, with an effort the most painful, managed to sign it, while Alice affixed her name as a witness. The exertion must have been too great for him, however, for he had evidently swooned when it was over. Soon nevertheless, he gave evidence of returning consciousness, and as he began to breathe more freely, the two women stole softly away and left him to repose, if such it might be called.

the contents of the paper now submitted to him, and that had been taken from the witchfinder, found it necessary to overthrow instantly, and at a single stroke, the fanatics and the gloomy edifice that even still threatened to involve him in ruin. There was not a moment to be lost! A dreadful and bloody conspiracy had been concocted against him and all those in prison for witchcraft; and if it was not to succeed, it must be struck to the very heart on the instant. As already intimated, he had fortified himself in many relations, to make his success most certain ultimately; but here was a daring attempt to subvert all law and order, as well as every sentiment of humanity. Before noon, all the chief conspirators were under arrest, and by one o'clock the Special Court had been dissolved, the jail doors opened and every one who had been imprisoned on the foul charge of witchcraft liberated! The terrible delusion of the day had been hurled to the earth, never to rise again, and the first massive block had been securely laid in the foundation of human freedom in the New World.

The intelligence spread like wild-fire, and larger numbers than had at first been anticipated hailed it with joy. The weathercock of the soldiery, too, still true to its history, veered round again at a moment's notice, when there was nothing to be gained by settling down rustily in one direction.

Francis was the first to reach the villa with the joyful intelligence; and soon Florence, Maurice and he, together with Robert, John Langton and Titmouse, were at the door of the gloomy dwelling where Alice, unconscious of what had occurred, still considered herself a persecuted fugitive. At first, Madge Gordon refused to admit them; but hearing the voice of the dwarf, she regarded all safe, and soon the whole party were standing in the little wainscotted entry on one side of which opened a door into the sick room. A word from Titmouse—who had already become a hero—soon explained everything; and Madge perceiving how matters stood, instantly admitted Florence and Maurice into the apartment in which Alice now stood in a bewilderment of hope and alarm. A single glimpse of the joyous face of Maurice revealed all; and, with a bound, she fell fainting into his arms.

In the meantime, Madge had led Titmouse to the bed side of the Fanatic, who now gazed upon him intently. After dwelling upon the features of the little fellow, and learning that the days of the superstition had passed away forever, he whispered to Madge to ask the presence of Alice and Maurice for a brief moment. In a few seconds the lovers stood before him, when he faintly whispered for Maurice to add his forgiveness to that already expressed by Alice. A word of explanation on the part of the fair girl won the frank and free pardon of her brave lover who spoke the desired pardon into the failing man's ear. On hearing it, he turned round with an effort, and tremblingly taking the hand of Alice, he placed it in that of Maurice. A blessing feebly faltered on his tongue, a smile passed over his palid features, now no longer repulsive, and he was gone!

Months had passed away, and the relation between Maurice and Alice; that between Francis and Florence; that between John Langton and Martha, and that between Emily Graham and Robert had received, respectively, that important benediction which the Church and society consider indispensable to the happiness of those who are tired of single blessedness, and without which neither luck nor grace can follow the culminating compact formed for life between a man and a woman. As, in the town generally, so in individual dwellings peace and prosperity were beginning to steadily diffuse their benign light. Francis Ellencourt and Maurice accepted important public positions, and old Dick Giles had begun to ply his vocation on the river, in a brand-new boat called "The Alice," and another called "The Florence." Red Wing and Firefly were frequent visitors at both The Heights and the villa, and the invalid seemed to have taken a new lease of her life. Everything was progressing smoothly, and all matters appeared explained satisfactorily, save the prolonged disappearance of Peter Huskins. Upon this point the chief had often been interrogated, but all to no purpose, until one day in the early Spring, after old Dick had disposed of his furs to great advantage, as Maurice and he were shooting alone along the ravine, their attention was attracted by a number of men at the mouth of a cave which had become exposed, as it appeared, from the foliage that covered it having given way beneath a weight of snow. Evidently something of an unusual nature had transpired, for the little crowd were hanging over some object that lay within the opening. On drawing near, what was the surprise of one of the friends at least, to recognize the features of the witchfinder, notwithstanding that they were greatly mutilated as if from a fall or some extreme violence. On enquiry, it was found that some persons present, who had been exploring the cave, came upon a chasm nearly one hundred feet deep, at the bottom of which a white thread of a torrent seemed to be tearing along. Anxious to fathom its mysterious depths, they constructed rope ladders and descended with a torch. At the bottom they found a subterranean stream as they had anticipated; but what astounded them most was, that dead among the jagged rocks on its brink, lay a man, who from the fact of his having been bound hands and feet, seemed to them to have been deliberately thrown over the precipice. The body was soon recognized to be that of the witchfinder; but the idea of his having been intentionally flung into the gulf was erroneous; although it can scarcely be doubted, that the two Indians who had brought the unfortunate thither, had purposely placed him on the very edge of the fatal trap, so as to make him, in a measure, his own executioner.

And thus ends our little narrative with all its imperfections. During its course we trust we have offended neither justice nor truth; but that, on the contrary, we have afforded some little instruction and edification, in what we have said touching humanity in general, and the dire superstition that for a period clouded the young life of THE WITCH OF THE WINE MARK.

THE GREAT WRESTLING MATCH.

In noticing the extraordinary Bible stories which are too improbable to gain our credulity, it is fit, probably, that we should not omit the most remarkable wrestling match which has ever been reported, the parties to which were God and his favored servant Jacob, as narrated in the thirty-second chapter of Genesis.

After Jacob had tarried twenty years with his father-in-law, Laban, securing his two wives, and by a system of sharp practice in cattle-raising which the world has never anywhere else exhibited, he became very wealthy in flocks, herds, camels and asses, it seems God had an interview with him in a dream and instructed him to get out of that land and return to his own kindred.

He accordingly, when his Father-in-law was absent from home shearing sheep, stole away, taking all the wealth he claimed to have made from Laban's possessions, and his wife Rachel stole, also, the gods and images that were her father's. They thus early showed the disposition for acquiring property, honestly or dishonestly—a reputation which their descendants for centuries have persistently maintained.

When Jacob neared his father's residence, he seemed to have some misgivings as to the kind of reception he would receive from his brother Esau, probably growing out of the sharp game he had played upon him many years before, in the matter of the birth-right and the mess of pottage; and with his characteristic shrewdness he sent servants with valuable presents to Esau to placate him and allay any unfriendly feeling that might linger in his breast toward his long absent brother Jacob. The ruse seems to have been successful, for Esau went out and met Jacob in a commendable brotherly spirit, quite contrary to the fears the latter had entertained.

The most remarkable part of this narrative is the account of the extraordinary wrestling match between God and Jacob during the night immediately succeeding the day on which the presents aforesaid were sent. Jacob seemed to be fearful, notwithstanding the very generous presents he had made to Esau, as to the reception he would meet with, and he arose in the night and sent his two wives, his two concubines and his eleven children and all his treasures over the ford of Jabbok, and he was left alone, and God came in and wrestled with him till the break of day. The match seems not to have been conducted precisely upon the rules which since have governed the prize ring and boxing and wrestling matches. Usually seconds are chosen and an umpire appointed to see that fair play to both sides is used. In this case there were no seconds nor umpire—the two wrestlers were alone, with none to witness the contest which for several hours was so evenly kept up.

Although in no other parts of the Bible are we told of any remarkable muscular strength or bravery exhibited by Jacob, he must have been one of the most powerful athletes ever known, to hold an even contest with God for several hours so vigorously. We do not believe any of the most noted acrobats, gymnasts or prize-fighters that ever lived would be able to hold God an even contest for hours, if God did his best. If he would consent to meet the ablest of them in a contest of this kind, had we money to risk on the result, we should bet on God every time.

Jacob, however, must have the credit of acquitting himself remarkably well in the encounter, for God seems to have gained nothing upon him until he took an unfair advantage and put Jacob's hip out of joint. By modern rules such conduct would be called "foul," and would lose the game and the "stakes." But God, doubtless, considered it fair, or he would not have resorted to that course, especially as daylight had come, and it was important he should be off. He asked Jacob to let him go, but Jacob refused unless God would comply with his demands, so the putting out of his hip was, perhaps, after all, justifiable.

We recollect in our childhood days wrestling was tabooed by the strictest teachers of morality as being of an immoral and objectionable tendency, but if God engaged in it, and gave lessons to a person he was so partial to as he was to Jacob, we cannot see upon what grounds the exercise should be pronounced immoral. What was done by God and Jacob would seem to be good enough for anybody.

In this instance of God's wrestling with Jacob for hours, he must have been more thoroughly "materialized" than on usual occasions when he exhibited himself. We have accounts of several occasions where he made himself visible and talked with men; as in the Garden of Eden, where he walked in the cool of the day and conversed with Adam and Eve, afterwards with Cain after he murdered Abel, afterwards with Noah in reference to building the ark and shipping his live cargo. He afterwards appeared to Moses, first as fire in the burning bush, afterwards on Mount Sinai during the forty days they were up there together cutting the ten commandments on tables of stone. On still another occasion, he showed Moses his back parts. Why he showed his back parts and not his front parts, the account does not state, except that no man could see his face and live. That he had front parts as well as back parts, there cannot be a reasonable doubt, for no personage was ever seen with back parts but what had front parts also.

He consented, however, to put Moses in the cleft of the rock and place his hand over him while he was passing by, letting him see his back parts only, as just stated. It looks to a disinterested person as though there was a clash between these statements as to God's being seen. That God was seen on several occasions, we have the most positive Bible assurances, and when John says, "No man hath seen him at any time," and Paul says, "No man hath seen him or can see him," it would appear they had borne false testimony, or that the persons who made the other statements had done so. Though these passages from "God's Word" may seem contradictory to a natural man, to one having spiritual discernment it is to be supposed they are perfectly consistent.

In this wrestling case, though God saw fit to put Jacob's hip out of joint, he did not leave him in that unpleasant predicament without doing something for him in return. Before this time he had simply been called Jacob; but God now gave him the name of Israel. Jacob may have considered this full compensation for the injury inflicted, but for our own part we would not have our hip put out of joint for a dozen new names. The two evidently parted in the best of spirits, and Jacob called the place "Peniel, for I have seen God face to face and my life is preserved."

The question may arise: If Moses could not see God's face and live, how could Jacob? It must be borne in mind, however, that they were two different men. If Jacob had the muscular strength to hold out against God for hours in a wrestling match, it is not improbable he would have strength enough of the optic nerves to see his face, and not die from the effects of it.

Seriously, these Bible stories of God's wrestling with men, of his showing his back parts, of his talking face to face with various individuals are significant of the crude age of the world in which they were written. At that time it was supposed the earth was the centre of the Universe, that it was flat and stationary, and that the sun and moon made daily circuits around it, and that the stars were small bodies of light placed in a solid firmament a short distance from the earth. Their ideas of God were equally as crude and imperfect. They supposed him to be a being, having the form and appearance of a man, who had a throne above the firmament from which he could oversee all parts of the earth, and who spent much of his time in war and bloodshed, leading one nation against another in the most bloody conflicts, and often betraying one army into the hands of another, more cruel, without any adequate reason, and frequently putting scores of thousands to death on a single occasion.

Since the world has learned to have more enlarged and correct views of the Universe, that the earth is but a very small portion of the solar system, and that the solar system is but a very small fraction of the Universe—that systems and constellations fill the immensity of space in all directions, as far as the mind can think, many have come to entertain grander conceptions of deity than those crude notions of him held by Jacob, and Moses and Joshua.

When it is remembered that the earth not only revolves on its axis at the rate of one thousand miles an hour, but that in its course around the sun it flies with a velocity of more than a thousand miles a minute, and that the entire solar system is rushing with an accelerated velocity in another direction around a much greater and far distant sun, the inconsistency of the idea of a local God, seated on a fixed throne in some particular point in the heavens can be easily comprehended.

When we realize that the same deity that presides in our land must necessarily be equally present on every side of our globe and through it, and not only the same in the sun and moon and planets, but in the numberless other systems and worlds—in the distant constellation of Orion and millions of others, still billions of times further removed—in all these trillions of worlds just as much as here—we can perhaps have a faint conception of the utter absurdity of the theory of olden times, that God was an organized being; that he occupied a single point in immensity; that his attention was given specially to the affairs of a single nation of roving brigands, that he was fickle, cruel, revengeful and malicious, and that he spent any portion of his time in a wrestling contest with Jacob, or in showing his back parts to Moses.

The more appreciative are our ideas of this boundless Universe, the more expanded will be our conceptions of an unorganized, impersonal, ever-present Deity, wherever matter and worlds and space exist.

Christianity Examined.

NO. VIII.

In previous numbers of this series we have called attention to the great similarity between the legends ascribed to the manner in which Christ was born of a virgin without the aid of a natural father, by the intervention of Divinity, and a very similar legend in Hindoo mythology, taught and implicitly believed, of a Jezus Christna. We traced the very striking similarity between the original and the copy, and showed that in all essential particulars the story of Jesus Christ of the Christian religion was extremely like the much older mythology of Jezus Christna of India. We called attention to the fact that it was hardly probable two real incidents, in characteristics so nearly alike, could take place in countries a thousand miles apart, and nearly as many years from each other. We saw one was the older, the other the younger; one the original, the other the copy. We perceived, conclusively, that Christna of India was not copied after Christ of Palestine, and came to the conclusion that it was the reverse; the mythology of Christ was borrowed from the older story of India.

In that age of the world it was customary, in many nations, to adhere to the belief of gods and demi-gods—that Deity in a peculiar intercourse with humanity produced an intermediate offspring, part God and part man, partaking equally of the nature of both. This doctrine was inculcated in India, Persia, Egypt, Phœnicia, Greece, and other nations; so when we come down to the later time of the Christian era the prevalent doctrines of the older nations had only to be adopted to fabricate the entire story upon which the Christian religion is founded.

For the benefit of those who have become subscribers since we called attention to these facts, we trust our older readers will pardon us if we repeat, to some extent, some of the ideas already set forth. In this connection we beg to ask a few moments' observation to the history of Buddha of India, the greatest teacher, perhaps, that ever lived, and whose doctrines have had a much greater number of believers than any other teacher that ever walked this planet. His followers and disciples have numbered hundreds of millions, and have been nearly twenty times as numerous as the followers of Jesus. At the present time his adherents number nearly half the entire population of the globe, and fully ten times as many as the entire Christian world. His doctrines have been most peaceful, and have been promulgated by the elements of peace, and not by the sword, as has been the case with Christianity and Mahometanism.

The followers of Buddha implicitly believe that Mahamaia, his mother, was an immaculate virgin, that she conceived through a divine influence, thus possessing the divine element of his father and the human character from his mother. That he stood upon his feet soon after his birth and talked to those around him; that at five years of age he sat unsupported in the air; that after he entered upon his sacred mission, he was attacked by demons who tried to make him swerve from the path of duty in which his feet had commenced their journey. By penance, self-denial and prayer he maintained his supremacy over these numerous demons, and caused them to flee from his presence.

He taught his disciples that a paradise of gems, of flowers, feasts, and music awaited the faithful, and a hell of torments in flames of sulphur and fire was the doom of the wicked. He commenced his ministry at about thirty years of age, and wandered over the country from place to place attended by his disciples. He dressed in the coarsest manner, and fed upon the plainest kinds of food.

Buddha, which means "Intelligence," called also Arddha Chiddi, also Chakai Mouni, and also Gotama, which means "he who kills the senses," existed in the tenth century before the Christian era, was said to have belonged to the royal family, and to have been born in affluence, he pursued a life of pleasure until he was twenty-nine years of age, when the appearance of a gangrened corpse threw him into a meditative mood, after which he resolved to relinquish a life of pleasure, and devote himself to one of thoughtfulness and self-denial. He covered himself with a shroud, and became a wandering mendicant, spending his whole time in giving moral and religious instruction. He was of a decided philosophical turn of mind, and in this respect vastly superior to the personage called Jesus, if such a person ever existed.

The theories of Buddha, considering the age of the world, appear to have been remarkably sound and clear. He believed in the existence of a God, who was not, however, a being nor a Creator. He believed matter to be eternal, and though the present form of the Universe should be destroyed, that matter would still really exist and be ready to assume new forms and to enter into new organizations; that it possessed the elements of intelligence, or was endowed with the inherent power of producing intelligence.

In four months after he commenced his ministry, he had gained five disciples. At the close of a year it had increased to twelve hundred, and in the twenty-nine centuries which have since passed away, he has, as we observed, had vastly more adherents than any other system of religion the world has ever known. The believers in his doctrine that have lived since his debut on earth, would have to be computed by thousands of millions. In point of purity of doctrine, peacefulness of behavior, self-denying sincerity and fervent devotion to the principles of true philosophy, coupled with the success of his teachings, Buddha doubtless far transcended any religious teacher who ever lived.

The reference to him in the Sanscrit proves him to have been of Hindoo origin, but in India his peculiar philosophy was largely superseded by the older philosophy of Brahminism, which is more aristocratic in character, sustaining the ideas of castes and inherited superiority. It was founded on the "Institutes of Menu" and the teachings of the Vedas and Puranas, the Hindoo Scriptures, which Buddha discarded. The Brahmins were the clergy of their religion, and were born to their position and held themselves distinct and above the lower classes, which they despised; whereas a Buddhist priest could come from the lower classes as well as any other, and they aimed to do away with all distinction of caste. The Brahmin philosophy was rather more upon the pantheistic order than Buddhism, which was Atheistic in its character, and the former recognized as well a creation of the Universe. Brahminism was originally Monotheistic, but it had its trinity, Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva, and afterwards other gods, angels and genii were introduced. Christna was the great favorite deity of the women. The trinity of Buddha was the past, the present and the future.

If Buddhism lost ground in India, it became the prevailing religion of China, Siam, Tartary, Thibet, Burmah, Japan, Ceylon and other countries. If in some of these countries the original purity of its doctrines has been somewhat lost in the succession of centuries it only illustrates the tendency to change or evolution which all systems of religion have exhibited. We repeat, no other system of religion has met with such success, has spread itself so peacefully, or has diffused more happiness to its adherents than Buddhism. Christianity can in no wise compare with it in these respects.

We have shown that the belief of a virgin being impregnated by a divine influence, and the product a child, half God and half man, existed many centuries before the Christian era, and that the idea was very far from being original with the inventors and founders of Christianity. Thus Alankee, one of Gengiskan's grandmothers, was believed to have been impregnated, when a virgin, by a ray from heaven. Grecian mythology was also full of the same idea of gods and mortals cohabiting together, thus producing demi-gods; so that, though a strong similarity is perceived in this regard between the traditions of the older systems, and those of the Church of Rome, the founders of Christianity are positively denied the credit of originality in this sublime belief. They simply borrowed the idea and substituted new propria persona in the grand drama of deo-mortal cohabitation.

Thus we see Christianity, like all the other religions of the earth, has been an outgrowth or an evolution of the preceding systems. To be what it is, it had only to take a little from Brahminism, a little from Buddhism, a little from Judaism, a little from Grecian mythology and philosophy, and the same to be given to artful priests to manipulate and make up anew. Paul was probably adequate to the task; and if he was not, Eusebius, Augustine, and scores of the earlier Christian fathers, were dishonest enough and ingenious enough to do it.

There is really nothing wonderful or miraculous about the Christian religion, if we look at it with eyes unblinded by holy awe and superstition. Every dogma on the list has been borrowed from older systems. It does not contain a single original idea. Everything in it existed centuries before Christianity as a system was thought of. It is only those who have been born and reared in its influence that can see anything divine in it. It certainly is no purer, no more moral, no more successful than other systems of religion—in fact far less so. Like Mahometanism it has been spread by the aid of the sword, and like it has caused human blood to flow in rivers, hurrying to an untimely death millions upon millions of the sons and daughters of humanity. Immense armies have been marshalled for its promulgation. In the line of its hidden horrors of persecution, murder and intolerance, in fettering the free aspirations of the human soul, in holding back human longings for freedom and mental liberty, in clogging the wheels of the car of progress, in its racks and stakes and infernal tortures in the name of holy religion, it has far transcended any and all religions that have ever existed on the earth.

By continually picturing and painting the Jesus of the Christian system in prints, in books, and upon the canvas, with a solemn visage and a halo always around his head, and suspended upon the cross in the agonies of death; by calling him God, the maker of heaven and earth, children grow up with a full belief in his divine character, and an awe for him which would just as easily have attached to any other individual that had been presented to their view continually in the same manner.

It is not strange that respect, veneration, and love even, is accorded to Jesus by such numbers of men and women. This fondness for hero worship has been exhibited in all religions and nations in all ages of the world. Thus we see it in the followers of Christna, Buddha, Zoroaster, Confucius, Plato, Jesus, Mahomet, Luther, Geo. Fox, Ann Lee and Joseph Smith. The devotees of all these individuals maintain a profound reverence for their cherished leaders which often has amounted to worship, and in many cases to a deification of the adored individual. Christians are not alone in this worshipful feeling, and it is no more for them to adore their leader, their ideal or their idol, than for the mistaken zealots of other creeds, all alike needing greater light, more science, more mental liberty, and a greater diffusion of natural common sense. It is to be hoped the world is progressing at a reasonably rapid rate toward this consummation so devoutly to be wished, and that the sun of science and truth is dispelling the shadows of superstition and error, and effectually driving them back to the caverns and recesses of forgetfulness, where they justly belong. All hail to the glad day, when reason, light and mental freedom shall rule! Avaunt priestcraft, superstition and mental slavery! Great glory, happiness and progression is, we trust, in store for the human race!

WE ARE glad to see our able champion, B. F. Underwood, is meeting with good success in various parts of the West. He is dealing sturdy blows to the errors and absurdities of past darkened ages, and letting in the light of science and truth. We get cheering accounts of the effect of his labors in many places, and sundry reports in the secular press of his addresses. In our next we will try and give our readers the benefit of one of these reports. Long may Mr. Underwood retain his health and vigor to continue the good work he is so ably prosecuting.

It is with unfeigned pleasure we announce the return to this city of our friend and brother, G. L. Henderson. He was extremely sick while in the West, and at one time thought his end really had come. His friends gave him up to die, and some who were still within the influence of the Christian faith importuned him to allow prayers to be offered up for him, but he firmly declined, saying he found his belief equally as good to die by as to live by, and that he had not the slightest desire to turn back to the dark creeds of Christianity, Druidism, or any other form of Paganism. He believed dying was the easiest part of our struggle in this existence, and that he should step forward into the great unknown future without the least fear or misgiving.

A crisis in his disease took place, and the result was a favorable one. He gradually began to mend, and though his weight was reduced to ninety pounds, he soon began to improve, and in a few weeks he was able to make the journey with his family to this city, and he is still gaining in health and strength. He will make this his future home, and we hope many years may be spared him in which to prosecute the work of reform and effective organization of the Liberal element of the country, which he so fondly cherishes.

Draper's Conflict.

We wish to call the attention of our readers again to Dr. Draper's very admirable book on The Conflict between Science and Religion. No more appropriate work could have been done at the present time than to write a history of the long and terrible conflict between the agencies of intolerance and of liberalism, which has resulted in that large measure of free opinion which the present age enjoys. Dr. Draper has done an important service for his time. No notice or review can do justice to the work. One of the incidental characteristics of the book is the large amount of interesting information it contains regarding the progress of scientific knowledge. In it we

A Study of Harmonialism.

BY A. O. GENUNG.

We shall allude to Spiritualism in this essay as a philosophy, but a system so superlatively self-contradictory in its character would at the best, perhaps, be more fittingly expressed by the term theory. We will first consider for illustration, the several modes of explaining the existence of a spiritual essence. At one time a favorite method of explanation was that on the death of an individual, a spiritual form is eliminated or thrown off from the original organization. Again, prominent exponents of the philosophy maintained—recognizing the fact that immortality to exist at all must extend both ways—that the theory of pre-existence is necessary to account for the continuance of the thinking principle. And now a popular mode of interpretation is that man is a duality, beginning at birth, and continuing through all time.

And Spiritualists do not agree respecting the existence or non-existence of a presiding Deity. Some maintain that none exists, other than the principle manifested in Nature, while others assure us that he occurs as an intelligent Force, but fail to explain how intelligence may exist apart from organization.

Again, while all agree that the existence of a spiritual corporal organization must be postulated to account for "materialization," yet, no two are agreed, respecting the effects, that abnormal, physical, and mental changes may exert on the spirit form.

And recently a prominent organ of Spiritualism regaled its readers with a tedious discussion of the question whether the marriage rite is perpetuated in the "spheres," when a single monosyllable from those regions would set the matter at rest?

And finally when the childish and conflicting character of the testimony of so-called spirit communion becomes so strikingly apparent as to peremptorily demand reconciliation with common sense an apologist is not wanting to come forward with an audacious system called "Diakka," designed to account for every discrepancy of statement, but whose actual effect is to render confusion worse confounded.

We are not ignorant of the fact that it is claimed for Spiritualism that it is a system to be gradually developed, and that "mediumism" furnishes as yet an imperfect means of communion. But here we are reminded that an unquestioned spiritualistic authority asserts that, to quote verbatim: "I have heard an uneducated bar-man, when in a state of trance, maintain a dialogue with a party of philosophers, on 'Reason and Fore-knowledge, Will and Fate,' and hold his own against them. I have put to him the most difficult questions in psychology, and received answers always thoughtful, often full of wisdom, and invariably conveyed in choice and elegant language." Is it unreasonable to suggest that the intelligence which converses through this individual might, with equal propriety, be able also to afford us information through answers "full of wisdom" respecting the questions above considered? If the spiritual philosophy be true, why is it that the testimony submitted through mediumism is, as a rule, so utterly at variance with the canons of common-sense? Certainly no one will deny this being the case, when so acceptable an authority as Alfred R. Wallace acknowledges the prevalence of "common-place trivialities, which do undoubtedly form the staple of ordinary seance communications." And why is it that "seers," "sensitives," who assert that they themselves have even visited the spheres, are not supposed to grant us consistent explanations?

We do not wish to display a spirit of dogmatism in our estimates of Spiritualism or its exponents, but the disciples of that philosophy do appear incapable of employing any legitimate method of reasoning. We fear that the value of the jewel, consistency, is underestimated by our friends of the "mystic rap."

It is no uncommon occurrence, however, for Spiritualists to urge in defense of their philosophy, that science, as we understand it, is incapable of establishing limits to human knowledge, and that the methods of observation known to scientific men are not calculated to explore the subtler conditions embraced in a spiritual world. But this objection savors too much of subterfuge, and only serves to remind us of a similar one so long employed by the Christian clergy.

And even were such an objection offered in good faith, it carries with it little weight, for this feeling of security is evidently founded in a misconception of the actual aspect of scientific thought, in this connection. The attitude of science toward Spiritualism is much the same as that which sometimes characterizes an army toward a besieged garrison of the enemy. As the army of assault is practically victorious without firing a gun, through cutting off the supplies and communications of its adversaries, so does science move on "with the passionless strength of a glacier," constantly adding to human knowledge—still there is no longer room nor necessity for "spiritual philosophy."

But it will be urged, however, that the phenomenon, peculiar to Spiritualism, is an irrepressible fact; that manifestations of force, inexplicable through any known law, do occur; and the stereotyped query of the average spiritualist "If not spirits, what is it?" is perpetually greeting our ears. But such is distinctively the argument of the uninformed. The advocates of Harmonialism are too much in the habit of claiming a spiritual origin for every occult force which science has heretofore been unable to clearly account for. Mesmerism, clairvoyance, the odic force, etc., are examples, and were it not for the advanced state of natural knowledge, we fear that even the rainbow and the aurora borealis would follow a like fate!

The student of philosophy will, however, naturally inquire, "What do we understand to be the actual significations of the remarkable movement under consideration?" We endeavor to explain. Originally, some inexplicable natural phenomena occurring in an obscure family, they were at once looked upon by an illiterate few, as affording superior evidence of the actual existence of the traditional "soul." And, as a certain class of minds are never so well content as when engaged in the pursuit of the vague and the supernatural, an association of "Spiritualists" was speedily formed. As time passed on another class joined in the movement—a class lacking nothing in intelligence, but whose conduct was such as to lay themselves open to the suspicion of being too eager to secure the maximum of worldly passions for the minimum of exertion; and when the development of genuine phenomena failed to keep pace with the progress of the organization, other "phenomena" were improvised to aid in the desired consummation. And, not to be unjust to the movement, it is necessary to add, that a third class should be considered—that large number of cultivated and well-meaning persons who, living in a progressive age, permit themselves to be identified with a system so much at variance, in its cardinal doctrine, with rational modes of thought. The religion of Christianity, which originated in the crude understanding of a semi-barbarous race, long since reached its acme of power and influence, and is now rapidly passing into decline. Those who have witnessed the spectacle of a staunch built vessel going to pieces on a formidable reef, know with what relentless fury the elements dismember her every plank. Figuratively, Christianity is such a vessel, and natural science is the reef; and it only remains to be said that Spiritualism is simply a fragment of the wreck.

In making a final estimate, then, of the value of their philosophy to civilization, this alone remains to be added: As an auxiliary to Materialism, (the religious aspect of science) Spiritualism is invaluable. As a system of religion or of philosophy, it is, to say the best of it, altogether unsatisfactory.

It is not at all to the point for the advocates and apologists of Harmonialism to urge that until science shall have fully explained the so-called mediumistic phenomena, the balance of evidence predominates in favor of their philosophy, for it is only recently that science has exercised any considerable influence in the province of human thought. And by the way, the public have not as yet digested, nor even become familiar with what has already been written in attempted elucidation of the actual character of the phenomena under consideration, works which, in the judgment of the writer, are well worthy of diligent perusal.

But even should phenomena occur that are not clearly understood, let us not abruptly accept the most preposterous of all interpretations, that of attributing to them a "spiritual" origin, but await patiently such time when science shall be able to offer a rational and consistent explanation.

Is Tyndall's "a Farce of a Philosophy"?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER:—I admire the energy with which our Anti-Christian friend of The Index applies "Cultured Free Thought" in opposing slavishness to authority, in encouraging independent thinking, and in denouncing those who would "persecute and despectfully use" Materialists and Atheists; but I do not admire the contemptuous expression he applies to Tyndall's materialism. I have noticed that Abbot says he has no quarrel with it, but only with Tyndall's failure "to extend it unambiguously and without limitation even to sensation and thought," and that what he requires of Tyndall is a more rigorous treatment of science, instead of a "farce of philosophy," which imposes on "man the dire necessity of pouring contempt on his own understanding."

Now whatever ambiguity there may have been in the Address as originally given and reported, that ambiguity is removed by Tyndall's insertion in the 7th edition of the following passage: "The arguments placed in the mouth of Bishop Butler suffices in my opinion to crush out all such materialism as this," that out of sensationless and individually dead atoms, things so utterly incongruous with them as sensation, thought, and emotion can arise. Respecting the definitions of matter in our scientific text-books he says: "The framers of these definitions were not biologists but mathematicians, and had reference to such accidents and properties of matter as could be expressed in their formula. . . . Divorced from matter where is life to be found? Whatever our faith may say, knowledge shows life and matter to be inseparably joined. Every meal we eat illustrates the mysterious control of mind by matter." But Abbot says mind is a manifestation of a power he calls God.

I must notice another of Abbot's contemptuous expressions. He says: "It is enough to make every thinker blush with shame to see philosophy so villainously impaled" as it is by Tyndall in the following sentence: "Considered fundamentally it is by the operation of an insoluble mystery that life is evolved, species differentiated, and mind unfolded, from the prepotent elements of the immeasurable past."

We try to soar in a vacuum the moment we seek to comprehend the connection between them." In this Tyndall's offense with Abbot is that in this sentence Tyndall mystifies religion "in the apotheosis of insoluble mystery," and settles "down in the recognition of an insoluble mystery as the last word of modern science;" while he ought to see that science will solve the mystery. Abbot says "as the condition of all science something must be postulated as a basis." We have seen that in biological science Tyndall postulates eternal living matter as the basis of all organic forms. He argues that no intrusion of creative power into any series of phenomena has ever been observed. The assumption of such a power to account for special phenomena has always proved a failure. It is opposed to the spirit of science. Tyndall sees the molecular groupings and motions of this matter working to definite ends of inorganic existences, and finds in the facts of sustention and growth of organic bodies reasonable grounds for inferring that the same properties of matter are sufficient for the evolution of body and soul (meaning by soul functions called mental); but the problem of their connection is an insoluble mystery; and he conceives that God who can mould matter and bestow mind is not a less soluble mystery, with the added difficulty that while we believe that we know something of mind and matter, we are sure that we do not know God; and "Canst thou by searching find out God?"

Abbot, on the contrary, postulates "inorganic matter which," he says, "is the admitted source of all organic life," (but Abbot means by inorganic matter that which has not life) and, he says, a correct definition of inorganic matter, is the main question; and that "the real secret of all organism must be sought in [the Reason and Goodness exhibited as] one omnipresent Energy" which manifests itself in countless atoms as a universal organic "polarity," and also in the atom-built organism as "intelligence." I will not repeat what I have said about its being easy to comprehend Tyndall's belief that living matter, possessing inherent polar or structural forces, is the ultimate cause of the omnipresent Energy, and of the phenomena of body and mind, and it is to comprehend Abbot's Reason and Goodness as the ultimate cause; but I will observe that Abbot ought not to affirm that Tyndall's treatment of science is less rigorous than his own, because he does not presume to know so much about this, (to me inconceivable) diffused Reason and Goodness as Abbot does; and because he does not believe, as Abbot does, that science will eventually solve the problem of the connection of matter and mind by establishing without a doubt the existence of a God acting in every atom, as the ultimate cause. I think that Abbot is unjust in stigmatizing Tyndall's materialism "as a farce of a philosophy," and in affirming that "compared with it straight-out Atheism is infinitely more respectable." Epicurus, like Tyndall did not deny the existence of the gods, but he could not account for the amount of evil and disorder that exists but by the decision that the gods did not interfere with the creation, or management of the world.

The poet who cried,
"Oh! for a lodge in some vast wilderness,
Some borderless contiguity of shade,
Where rumours of oppression and deceit,
Of unsuccessful and successful wars,
Might never reach me more.
My ear is pained, my soul is sick,
With every day's report of wrong and outrage,
With which the earth is filled,"

Expressed the sentiment which leads so many to be unable to believe in a God of goodness and of power. Until Mr. Abbot has made it appear more probable than he has done, that the moral and physical evil, which has existed in all the time recorded by the earth and by books, is consistent with Reason and Goodness ruled every atom, I shall be obliged to think Tyndall's philosophy much more consistent than Abbot's is, as it has the advantage of not confusing our minds as to what constitutes Goodness.

JOHN CHAPPELLSMITH.

New Harmony, Ind., Mar., 23d, 1875.

VALUE of church property in the United States in 1850, $87,328,800; in 1860, $171,397,932; in 1870, $357,483,581. At this rate in 1900 it will be $2,835,865,648. The greater portion of this property is untaxed, while all other property in the country is over-taxed. Cannot the most obtuse-minded person in the country see the danger imminent in the vast accumulations of property the Church is making? Are they "laying up treasures in heaven," or rather are they not earthly treasures and in this world of sin? Nothing endangers the liberties of the people more than church monopolies and priestly dominion.

SCIENCE has never sought to ally herself to civil power. She has never attempted to throw odium or inflict social ruin on any human being. She has never subjected any one to mental torment, physical torture, least of all to death, for the purpose of upholding or promoting her ideas. She presents herself unstained by cruelties and crimes. But in the Vatican—we have only to recall the Inquisition—the lands that are now raised in appeals to the Most Merciful are crimsoned. They have been steeped in blood!—Prof. Draper.

The Jews and their God.

BY ISAAC PADEN.

So long as theologians are unable to reconcile their idea of the fall of man with justice, and leave their God holding the position of an honorable father, let them cease their claims as expounders of mysteries which they nor no one else can understand. Let the clergy of our day show wherein God or man was benefited in cursing the earth, as is claimed their God did. Providing the result was, and is good, it proves his curses are the same in result as his blessings, then it makes but little, if any, difference which he does. Let them show the justice of the effects, or results, claimed for the act of one man, and that before he knew good from evil. Let them show the wisdom in, or the benefit arising from, the flood as they view it. It may be claimed it was done to cleanse the earth of the wickedness of man. This is absurd and untrue, as it had no such effect. Let them show the fact, that Christian religion has a saving power over man, more than other religions. Let them show the fact that a believer in the Christian religion is better off in the life beyond the grave, than a moralist, whose end and aim is to do right.

As for the Jewish history of their God, if it is reliable or has any truth in it, he appeared to them in the form of a man, having all the passions of a man, such as hate, love, revenge and a warlike disposition, over-anxious to receive the admiration of man in reference to his greatness over other gods, and that he gave precepts and commands in person to Abraham, Moses and others during a period not less than four thousand years. During that period he was frequently seen and conversed with. At one time Aaron, Noah, Abihu and seventy elders saw his feet and what he stood on; Moses saw his back parts, (is it possible he could have back parts and not have fore parts); besides this, he eat dinner with Abraham, and Aunt Sarah had a good laugh at what was said. But for the last two thousand years he has changed his manner and custom, in communicating with man, and keeps himself out of sight—no part of his body, neither the fore part nor the hind part, are now seen, or his voice heard to say, "Thus saith the Lord." But as he was confined to the Jews as their God, the failure of the Jews as a nation, is proof of his incompetency to govern and manage them as a nation, may account for his absence. But be this as it may, there are now no corresponding evidences of his existence in the manner in which he displayed his person and power among the Jews.

All the facts in relation to the Jews and their God, as they stand recorded in the Jewish history, go hand in hand with our position. Also see the agreement our position has with the facts claimed in reference to the appearing of spiritual personages throughout all ages and nations also at the present. These personages were in the early days of man, called gods and lords, thus there were gods many and lords many, but the Jews acknowledged only one as God, the balance were called angels, ghosts and spirits of them that were dead; this latter name was rejected by the Jews, inasmuch as it was calculated, in its nature, sooner or later to destroy their God. This gave rise to all the inhuman treatment by the Jews and their God toward the mediums of their day, who Jesus said they killed, who saw and conversed face to face with the spirits of those whose earthly bodies were dead, the same as Abraham, Moses and others did to their God; also the woman of Endor, who spoke face to face with the spirit of Samuel, in like manner as Jesus and his three disciples conversed with Moses and Elias some thousand years after the death of the body. This same universal custom among all nations, of seeing and conversing with spiritual personages, has undergone no material change, remaining the same, only different developments, with a marked improvement from a low, savage and revengeful nature, to that of love and good will to man on earth.

This spiritual intercourse is fast becoming a scientific fact, and the sworn statements of thousands could be added to these few thoughts, sufficient to make this a large volume of many hundreds of pages, not only from persons in the United States, but from all nations now known, thus bearing corresponding evidence of the claims herein set forth by the writer. Here let me say, notwithstanding Gods in the plural were the common belief of man before the days of Abraham, and is the same now with some nations, yet it is proper to say many individuals believed in a higher Power of rule far above and beyond their comprehension. The idea of a Power or ruling influence that forms and controls the Universe, including worlds, planets, suns and satellites, throughout space, giving life and motion to each and all in accordance with the nature of their existence; to be confined or represented through a personage of the size of a man, say five feet eleven inches high; has all the features of an absurd inconsistency, the same as to claim the water that runs in the Mississippi river would run through a goose quill.

All the facts in the case unite in the position taken by the writer, that the God that rules and governs the Universe is not the Jewish God. Therefore the God that rules is not responsible, and is hereby honorably discharged as being in person the doer of those low, savage acts which the Jews charged to their God; yet their God spake many truths, and did some good things, but this falls far short of proving he was God in the full sense of the word Deity.

CHAPTER VIII.

We now close, after giving a few scattering thoughts upon God's foreknowledge and his foreordination, which involves man's free agency (as it is called) and a question of some importance between our Arminian and Predestinarian brethren. Those of the Arminian order deny foreordination, and denounce it as false and untrue, yet they claim God foreknows all things before they come to pass. The Predestinarians hold that God not only knows, but predestined all things whatsoever comes to pass. The writer of this has often requested of those who deny foreordination to show wherein the difference lies between God (if he is God) knowing a thing and foreordaining it. Thus far he has failed to be answered. The main argument (or rather assertion) in favor of a difference is, that God, knowing a thing, yet in the future does not necessarily make it take place (provided he is a man instead of God, we admit the truth of this idea). But as they claim God foresaw all that takes place, and had a perfect knowledge of the same by bringing all things yet in the future present before his sight, as though they were, destroys the argument. The fact (if it is a fact) of God bringing all things present before him, is positive proof they will take place; unless his seeing and knowing a thing is unreliable, and subject to be a failure, in such a case God's foreknowledge would be of but little use to himself or any one else.

A Reverend gentleman once claimed that man could look forward, see and foretell an eclipse many years ahead, and that knowledge had nothing to do in causing the eclipse, and surely God could do as much as a man. This we admitted, but claimed neither God or man had any foundation for the knowledge of a thing before it existed, only as the result of unchangeable laws ordained and in force. Therefore all the knowledge that a man can have of an eclipse or anything yet in the future, arises from a knowledge he may have of unchangeable laws now in force. The Rev. gentleman claimed I destroyed man's accountability. To this I replied, so long as he was unable to show there was a difference, I was justified in claiming the result under each theory to be the same. The thing necessary to be done is to show there is a difference in principle, and the result will also be different. But wherein can the difference be, when foreknowledge is the result of unchangeable law?

We fearlessly say, in the absence of unchangeable law, there can be no foreknowledge. We also say, if it is impossible for God to be mistaken, or to fail in foreknowing a thing, then of necessity it must take place. We likewise say, it is impossible for a man to change the thing God saw he would do, unless his foreknowledge is a failure.

We will here illustrate a case, "it was a fact, Booth killed President Lincoln by shooting him with a pistol, and it also was a fact, God saw and had a knowledge of the act long before we were a nation." I now ask how Booth could have avoided the act, and God's foreknowledge remain good and unimpaired? I also ask, is the power of God's foreknowledge more easy for man to change, alter or disappoint than his power to ordain upon which foreknowledge is based?

These foregoing points under consideration, have in reference to the God, who is acknowledged by the Arminian as well as the Predestinarian; each claim he is the all-wise and almighty ruler, creator and preserver of all things. All who adopt this last have no just right to complain in regard to his manner of ruling, on any other claim than that they consider he is either deficient in wisdom or power. Yet they are the first to raise the question, does God, man or the Devil rule? or do all three rule jointly? or is it each one acts his part in the drama of life? It is claimed by the Arminian, as well as the Predestinarian, that the Devil is the prince and power of the air, and that he holds a ruling power over a large portion of man, if not all. They also hold man is a free moral agent, and acts from choice to suit himself, having good and evil set before him. Here I must call the reader's attention to the fact that there can be no mistake in the matter, in reference to man's destiny, providing his path is the result of his own choice. Thus, under the idea of the power of the Devil, and man acting from his own choice, this God-ruling power is cut off, and he, as Almighty ruler, is thrown into the shade. Under such a theological view, who would wonder or think strange that God, after seeing the effect of the Devil's power, and the determination of man to do just as he pleased, that such a God would exclaim in the agony of his soul's disappointment, that it repented him he had made man, and was grieved to the heart. This theological view of a personal Devil, and his power over man, together with man's free agency, completely destroys and annihilates a personal God as supreme ruler, either by way of foreknowledge or foreordination; both are equally destroyed, and he is driven to the painful necessity to await his chance and accept at the hands of man and the Devil, such as are not capable or not able to act for themselves.

Here we have three theological systems or views before us. God, an Almighty ruler, who has, before man existed, foreordained whatsoever comes to pass; second, "God, an Almighty ruler, whose unalterable foreknowledge governs all things whatsoever comes to pass;" third, then, under the power and influence of the Devil, acting from his own choice a free moral agent, does just as he pleases." Add to this never-ending damnation for all who know not God. Here is the conclusion of theology. It is an unfathomable mystery, thousands of years have been spent, talent and money thrown away, the brain of man destroyed, monomaniacs produced trying to reconcile the theological views in relation to man's moral and religious condition. I close with this consolation, truth is immortal, and cannot die; while error is mortal, and cannot live where the freedom of thought is exercised.

[THE END.]

Qui Bono?

BY S. H. PRESTON.

"What have Infidels done? Show me any good Infidelity has done and I will be an Infidel." Thus a small edition of Wesley recently propounded from the pulpit. This Methodist mummy "wants to know, you know." Well, I will tell him. It is to Infidels he is indebted for the blessed privilege of blowing the little Arminian gospel trumpet and spilling his churchianic slops upon them from a petty Protestant pulpit to-day. To whom are we indebted for a government based upon equal political and religious rights? a government in which all religions are tolerated, and which makes no distinction on account of creed? in which the once obnoxious Methodists have been protected and permitted to progress in the midst of jealous and antagonistic sects? To John Wesley, the founder of Methodism? Nay, read history. While this bigoted priest, a fugitive from justice, of the State of North Carolina, was writing, preaching, and untiringly laboring against the American cause, and inflicting deeper injury upon them than any other Englishman, Thomas Paine was giving to the world his "Common Sense" and "Crisis," and aiding the struggle for Independence with his pen, money and valor. To whom are we indebted, more than to all others, for this Model Republic, its liberal institutions, and for civil and religious liberty? I will tell you. To that immortal trinity of Infidel patriots, Paine, Jefferson, and Franklin. It was the pen of Thomas Paine which first wrote "The Free and Independent States of America." The writer of the Age of Reason was the author hero of the Revolution. Infidels, foes everywhere and forever of kings and priests; Infidels, the saviors of liberty; Infidels gave mankind the sublime Declaration of American Independence, a government without a Church, and a Constitution without a God. In every land, through all the dark and dreary centuries of chains and whip and fire, liberty was ever the watchword of the Infidel. Religion has, in all ages, been the synonym of slavery. The world has seen no such despotism as spiritual despotism, no such merciless tyrants as those "by the grace of God." "Infidelity is liberty; all religion is slavery. In every creed man is the slave of God, woman is the slave of man, and the sweet children are the slaves of all." The Infidel has ever been found battling for the rights of man; the priest ever reeking with the gore of heretics. The Church damned men; Infidelity reformed them. The Church established inquisitions; Infidelity founded universities. But we are told that Infidels tear down, destroy. True; they have torn down the stakes and crosses and gibbets that, like a forest, hedged in the rugged road of Progress, and have raised telegraph poles in their stead. They have dethroned kings, and enthroned man; they have demolished bastiles, and built and beautified temples of industry; they have rolled back the unwieldy stone which the Church had placed at the sepulchre of Liberty; they have destroyed the thumbscrews and racks and torture dungeons of the Church, and put out the fagot fires in which Torquemada and John Calvin slowly roasted thinkers and discoverers. "What have they done?" Whatever has been done for the prosperity and advancement of man, has been done by the few heroic Infidels, in spite of all the persecutions of priests and popes and potentates. While that insatiate monster, called Christianity, has strewn the fair fields of earth with the wrecks of armies and the bones of murdered millions, converted populous nations into deserts and transformed our beautiful world into a slaughter-house, drenched with blood and tears, Infidelity has been the creator of science, the preserver of art, and the guardian of the ark of freedom. "What good?" Why, Infidelity is the religion of goodness. "The world is my country, to do good my religion," was the life motto of that grand heroic Infidel, Thomas Paine. The Church repeats creeds; Infidelity does good. The Church persecutes honest people for opinion's sake; Infidelity makes religious duties consist in "doing justice, loving mercy, and endeavoring to make our fellow creatures happy; Infidelity has enfranchised the human mind, has rescued the world from the midnight of medieval superstition; and the monuments of Infidels are the mile stones along the highway of Progress.

find a succession of vivid pictures of the state of actual science among the earlier Greeks and the later Romans, at the birth of Christianity, at the epoch of the "Fathers of the Church," in the middle ages, at the period of the rise of modern knowledge, at the time of the Reformation, and in the present century:

We desire to call attention to the work as an admirable literary production, free from that "dryness" and "repulsiveness" characteristic of many scientific works. For felicity of expression and eloquence, many passages deserve place among the gems of literature. It is a work calculated to make infidels, and we trust all our readers who can afford it will add this to their libraries. To give an idea of the popularity this work has achieved we will state that twenty thousand copies have been sold in the few months since it was placed before the public. Price $1.75; postage 15 cents.

PERSONAL EXPERIENCES OF WM. H. MUMLER IN SPIRIT PHOTOGRAPHY. A pamphlet of sixty-eight pages has been sent us by the publishers, Colby & Rich of Boston, with the above title. It contains the history of that class of phenomena, citing numerous striking cases. It will no doubt be found interesting by our Spiritualistic readers, who will doubtless govern themselves accordingly. It probably sells at twenty-five cents.

Renewed Offers.

We are anxious to extend the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER so far as possible, and are disposed to give all the encouragement we can to the movement.

For $1.75 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER post-paid for one year, and a copy of "Blakeman's 200 Poetical Riddles."

For $2.25 THE TRUTH SEEKER one year, and Byron's complete works.

For $2.60 THE TRUTH SEEKER one year, "Blakeman's Riddles," Shakespeare's complete works, and either of the works named in the paragraph above.

For $3.50 THE TRUTH SEEKER one year, and a copy of "The Heathens of the Heath," paper.

For $3.00 THE TRUTH SEEKER one year, and a copy of "The Heathens of the Heath," cloth.

For $3.75 THE TRUTH SEEKER one year, Shakespeare's, Byron's, Goldsmith's and Milton's complete works.

For $5.50 THE TRUTH SEEKER one year, and one of "Calkin's Champion Washing Machines," which the Company invariably sell at $7.50. They are decidedly one of the best washing machines in use. Over 60,000 have been sold within two years—more than have been sold of any other washer in the same time. For representation and description see 14th page. The papers and premiums sent to one or more parties as desired. The papers and books always sent post-paid by mail; the washer by express.

Here, friends, are liberal offers. Those who accept them will obtain more than their money's worth in every instance. We hope every friend of the cause will take interest enough in THE TRUTH SEEKER to send us a few names, at least, upon some of the above propositions.

TRIAL SUBSCRIBERS.

We will still send THE TRUTH SEEKER three months to trial subscribers for 25 cents.

For 35 cents the Paper three months, and a copy of "Blakeman's 200 Poetical Riddles."

For 55 cents the Paper three months, and either of the works mentioned in paragraph third, up above.

For 75 cents the Paper three months, and Goldsmith's Works, complete, illustrated, 375 pages.

For 85 cents the Paper three months, and either Byron's complete works, 650 pages, and 21 illustrations, or Shakespeare's complete works, 1000 pages and 36 illustrations.

All postage prepaid.

Here is a fine opportunity to obtain standard works at half price, and THE TRUTH SEEKER three months included. The names of many trial subscribers have been received, and we are anxious for thousands more. Friends of THE TRUTH SEEKER, please make a little effort to send us all the trial subscribers you can. The outlay is very small, and the good resulting from it may be considerable. Let us hear from you.

True, "the times are hard;" we are in a position to realize it. While all are struggling to get through "the pinch," let THE TRUTH SEEKER not be forgotten.

A Valuable New Book.

The glory of the present age is the diffusion of useful information. The appearance therefore of any new publication that bids fair to enlighten the masses more fully upon any practical subject, should be regarded as grounds for congratulation. It gives us pleasure therefore to call the attention of our readers to R. V. Pierce's forthcoming new book entitled, The People's Common Sense Medical Adviser. This work will contain about nine hundred pages, will be well bound, illustrated with about two hundred wood cuts and colored plates, and sent by mail to any address for the unprecedentedly low price of $1.50. It is now ready for delivery. The author has become widely and favorably known to the American as well as the people of several Foreign nations, through his Family Medicines, and as the founder of the World's Dispensary at Buffalo, N.Y. established for the treatment of Chronic Diseases and now ventures to appear in the new role of authorship. From a perusal of advanced pages, we believe the book is calculated to be eminently useful. It embraces a wide range of subjects, all of them bearing with more or less directness upon the all-important question of health. Biology, Physiology, the Cerebral Functions, the Human Temperaments, and Hygienic Treatment, or Nursing of the Sick, receive that attention which their relative importance demands. Physical and Mental Culture, Ventilation, Sleep, Cleanliness, Food, Beverages, and Clothing are practical topics, and treated in a practical manner.

The use of Water as a Remedial Agent receives that attention which it deserves. Under the head of Remedies for Diseases is presented a list of our most useful indigenous medicinal plants, together with their properties and uses and pictorial representations of many of the most important. The appropriate dose of each remedy is also given. After a suitable introduction we have in Part Fourth, Diseases and their Remedial Treatment. Almost every disorder that preys upon the human system is here described, together with its symptoms, causes, and treatment, as far as is thought safe and advisable for the non-professional to prescribe. Chronic ailments receive special attention. A chapter on Accidents and Emergencies is a very useful feature of the book. Besides this much miscellaneous and profitable information is given, which will make it a genuine "vade mecum"—a convenient companion in every household. Many a precious life has been lost from the lack of just the knowledge which this work imparts. A healthy moral sentiment pervades the whole work, and we cordially commend it as worthy a place in every family.

A GOOD MAN SLEEPS WITH HIS FATHERS.—EX-Gov. Bramlette of Kentucky, manager of the Louisville Lottery swindle died January 11th. Those who failed in former schemes, or who failed to "draw a prize" will perhaps remember him. He was, as we have formerly stated, a lawyer, and also a church member, and while we would not speak ill of the dead, we presume it will be no news to Louisville people to say that, like most church members, in addition to running a lottery swindle, he also sported female companions other than lawful ones. One of these, whom the ex-Governor had supported for some years, and to whom he had paid $10,000 at one time, in spite of the efforts of the police, succeeded in suddenly appearing in the cemetery at his funeral and placed a wreath upon his coffin. After Bramlette's death a new manager was appointed. Gilmore's band was hired to play at the "Grand Gift Concert," and, unless the manager again puts it off, the great drawing will come off on Feb. 27th, when a few may receive more than they have paid in, and tens of thousands who drew blanks will have reason to remember the very old but very true saying that "a fool and his money is soon parted."

Superstitious people are getting suspicious of the Louisville lottery scheme, as it seems to be sure death to all who have any connection with it. Including ex-Gov. Bramlette, his wife and child, no less than thirteen persons connected in some way with the scheme have died. It is to be hoped this singular fatality will not extend to the ticket holders, for if it should, there would be numerous victims in every hamlet.—Kentucky paper.

The Land of Pure Delight.

"There is a land of pure delight,
Where saints immortal reign."

So sang our pious fathers and mothers. And now the question arises, Where shall we find that land?

"What evolution! what extent! what swarms
Of worlds that laugh at earth! immensely great—Immensely distant from each other's spheres!
What then the wondrous space through which they roll?
At once it quite ingulfs all human thought,
'Tis comprehension's absolute defeat."

Where, among these swarms of worlds, are we to look for the land of pure delight?

May it please ye, I ask no favors of those worlds. I have a world of my own—my birthright inheritance—a world in which is the material for building a Hell, or a Heaven, as best suits my aspiring.

And who the architect? With your leave, I am. And here, in this world, graciously vouchsafed unto me, I'll have my land of pure delight, where saints immortal reign, reign over all conflicting forces, bringing every feeling, every thought into harmony with the divine afflatus.

Not exactly. Have you any more questions to ask? No need to say, others are not bound by my rule of action. They have as good title to be monarchs of all they survey, in their worlds, as I have in mine.

Variety, in harmony, is the central idea of this Universe. The Sovereignty of Individuality, each in her and his empire, or world, is Magna Charta.

It is a maxim of common law, that when private convenience comes in conflict with public good, the latter is paramount.

Should Prentiss, or any other scribbler, get up a brain bantling, for his own edification, THE TRUTH SEEKER is under no obligation, not even of courtesy, to print it to the molestation of its many readers.

Letters to a Preacher.

NO. VII.

FRIEND B.: You say I am right in asserting that Athens reached the acme of Pagan civilization, but you say also that "Plato believed in a colony of wives and the strangling of feeble children, and that Zeno was a drunkard, and those beautiful temples were more filthy than any stable, as were also their houses or rather shanties, and the animals lousy beyond endurance."

That may all be true, but if so, it was not because they had never enjoyed the blessings (?) of Christianity, but rather because of the age in which they lived. As the world increases in knowledge, equality between man and woman will settle the vexed question as to whether men shall have "colonies of wives," none at all, or whether the two sexes shall live together as equals partners for just so long a time as they contract to do so. Your own Biblical heroes, very many of them, had "colonies of wives," and it would be hard to say how few or how many wives (?) are now really possessed by a great many men even in this enlightened Christian country in the Nineteenth Century.

As to the strangling of feeble children, if the Athenians surpassed the parents of this age in that respect, they must indeed have been "vile," for many of them now, if a child happens to be in the way, and is not wanted, do not stop to consider whether it is feeble or strong, but quietly and secretly dispose of it; and it is rarely that anything is said about it, unless the fact becomes so notorious that it is impossible to overlook it.

Coroner Lankester, of London, says, "that in that Christian city 12,000 mothers annually murder their offspring!" And a writer in the World more than doubled that number in estimating the foetus and child murders of New York. "Tens of thousands of human beings in St. Giles, London, and in Murderer's Block and other localities in New York are reared in schools of vice and brutality." Could Pagan Athens be worse in these respects? The London Telegraph says, "The most brutal and most cowardly, the most pitiless and most barbarous deeds done in the world are perpetrated by the lower classes of English people," and beneath the "shadow of the cross," too.

There speaks of the filth of ancient Athens. No doubt they had many habits that would be very offensive to us, and so had our ancestors of only a few hundred years ago; and there are people now that are so far ahead of this age in some respects, that they cannot use the same hair-comb, face-towel, etc., that are used by other people without having their sense of personal cleanliness absolutely shocked. And there are many places where the whole family dip their bread into the gravy dish, and their knives into the butter, and spoons into the preserve dish, yet these habits are called vulgar and unclean in refined society. There are thousands of homes in Christian America where we can find any amount of reeking filth and fetid odors that are full as disgusting as many of the repulsive habits of said Athenians.

As to filthy stables, I approve of them but little less than I do of filthy houses. All domestic animals love cleanliness, and should be kept where they can enjoy sunshine and pure air, not only for their own enjoyment, but for our satisfaction. I have seen cows right here in Snowville, standing for weeks and months together in a mire of their own filth, and their haunches plastered all over with it from being obliged to lie down in it for want of a clean spot to sleep on, and others are forced to drink stagnant, putrid water from muddy ponds and filthy puddles, or go thirsty all the long, hot Summer days—and hogs! Well, the pens of these much abused animals are often public nuisances. It is not only repulsive to think of using the milk and eating the flesh of animals reared in filth, but it is unhealthy also. As the years come and go, we learn better and better how to be clean. Each age improves upon the one that has passed, and as the cycles of ages go by, we need new laws, new customs, and new social influences, and consequently one old Jew-Book of "holy absurdities," appropriate though it might have been for the day in which it was written, cannot be a law and a guide to the world forever.

"O had the Yahoo eyes, he'd plainly see
What bitter fruits grow on the Gospel tree;
What pestilential crabs have ever grown,
And ever will where e'er this tree is known.
Look round the globe—for near two thousand years,
The cross has deluged it with blood and tears."

A Letter from Iowa.

WASHINGTON PRAIRIE, IOWA, April 1st, 1875.

Thinking a few thoughts from this quarter may be interesting to your readers, I address to you the following: Our friend, G. L. Henderson, delivered two scientific lectures in the Rosa school-house, at this place, March 28th, 1875, at 11 o'clock, A.M., and at early candle lighting.

He handled the subject of ancient and modern superstition, showing its fallacy, and the impropriety of its being taught in the nineteenth century, and treated it with great ability, proving beyond a doubt the position he assumed, and which has been sustained by ancient as well as modern scientists. He defended his position with ability and sound logic, well calculated to convince candid and unprejudiced hearers. There was a respectable audience, and they seemed to be convinced of the importance of his subject, and that there is work to be accomplished in this country, as well as across the ocean, that shall shake Christianity from center to circumference.

Can humanity look back upon ancient Christianity and view the terrible atrocities inflicted by the Church upon honest men and women for their opinions, without the deepest feelings of horror and indignation? The Christianity of to-day, as represented by the churches, is an imposition on humanity! It trains the mind to believe in an unknown God, and keeps them in fear of an endless hell! Can an individual be happy and have such thoughts? Because a principle was tolerated two thousand years ago, is it any reason that it should be tolerated to-day, when science shows it to be an entire falsehood? Let our young people be taught the principles of science, reason, and all that pertains to happiness in this world, and see what a complete reformation will be effected. When this work is accomplished we will have less use for insane asylums and penitentiaries. Why not, then, each and every individual join in this great and glorious work, and endeavor to overthrow that ancient and modern superstition, and to keep its galling chains from the necks of our race?

Let the rising generation in every section of the country be taught science, liberty, truth, justice, and morality, and where will your superstition be? You will see no more domes of churches erected as a monument to superstition! Let the money that is expended for churches be contributed for libraries and halls of science and literature.

As an inhabitant of a free country, as a citizen of a great and rising republic, as a member of an intelligent community, I hope to live to see all this accomplished. Yours for the good of Humanity, ALFRED ROSA.

[Our friend evinces the right spirit and one we hope will soon prevail all over the land. We are pleased to think the labors of friends Underwood and Henderson have been productive of good upon Washington Prairie. They have both spoken there a number of times, and a goodly number of hearty, intelligent, enthusiastic live Liberals are now among its citizens, and who feel willing to make some sacrifices, and use some exertions to advance the cause of truth and human progress. We hope to see this feeling more prevalent in many other localities].

About Goods.

MR. EDITOR:—I see occasional requests from your patrons, as to the most reliable house to purchase goods from in New York. Being a woman, and posted in these matters, I am ready to give my experience. Having traded at various houses in New York, I was induced by a friend to visit Ehrlich's large Emporium on Eighth Avenue this Spring, and can honestly and disinterestedly say, I made the best bargains I ever made in New York, and saved at least twenty-five per cent in my purchases. Inquiries of outside parties who have dealt there, confirm my opinion, I find their reputation is unrivalled for honest dealing. Consequently I call the attention of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER to this fact, and advise them to give this house the first trial, feeling confident if they do, they will be more than satisfied.

Their new Quarterly is a fine magazine, handsomely gotten up, and contains a full account of their stock and price list. Full reliance can be placed on their offers. They offer the Magazine at ten cents a year, as a means of introducing themselves over the country. Send for it, and see for yourselves.

This is a gratuitous testimony on my part, and not an advertisement. I see the daily increasing need of people in the country, and write this as a merited tribute to one of the most reliable business houses in New York city.

How Is It?

BY W. H. PRENTICE.

[In a Massachusetts village lives a poor, feeble, ex-Methodist minister, dependent upon charity for support. Receiving meagre aid from his brethren of the church, and generous donations from some called Infidels, he wrote the following lines:]

How is it that a Christian name
Shall save a person from all blame,
When to the judgment bar we come,
To hear our welcome or our doom—
How is it?

How is it many who profess
True charity and godliness,
Are often deaf to cries of want—
I pray you help me, no I can't—
How is it?

Shall he who in the world below
Never relieved another's woe,
Although with wealth and comfort blest,
Shall he enjoy Eternal rest?—
How is it?

Because he had a name to live,
Yet never aught was known to give;
While one we call an Infidel,
Who has given much, must go to hell—
How is it?

Must he whom cry of want affects,
Be classed with those whom God rejects,
Because they do not see the need
Of joining some Religious Creed—
How is it?

How is it often when you tell
Your troubles to the Infidel,
He carries out the Master's word,
Gives to the poor, lends to the Lord—
How is it?

How is it—has he too a soul,
To live while endless ages roll?
He who will not the poor deny,
Shall he for mercy always cry—
How is it?

To him that asketh we should give,
Lend to another, let him live;
Give to the poor, lend to the Lord:
How is it, is not this the Word?
How is it?

Will man be known in that great day,
Simply by what the others say:
Or will the great decision be,
Doing for them ye did for me—
How is it?

The Golden Age.

BY FRANCES L. WILSON.

Bards have sung of Golden Ages,
That have passed with much regret;
But in spite of bards and sages,
The Golden Age is coming yet.

When free from dogmas and from creeds,
And superstition's binding chain;
When Bigotry for Truth recedes,
We know Free Thought's assumed her reign.

The age is coming when man can teach,
Mankind should make Fair Truth their guide;
And be allowed freedom of speech;
No fear from Prejudice and Pride.

When we can roam the realms of thought,
With no walls to limit her boundless sea;
To a book or a creed no longer locked,
But unfettered, untrammelled, and free.

'Tis coming, yes, 'twill soon be here!
The Past's dark form try to forget,
For Reason speaks in tones most clear,
The Golden Age is coming yet.

Man and Nature.

We often hear it said, the nearer we live to nature the better it is for us. Let me ask, is our typical man a natural being? Man clothes himself to protect himself against nature; he acquires knowledge that he may be happy; he learns to walk, to think, to talk. Where then among enlightened nations do we find the natural men? Is not man by nature a blank sheet upon which education has written manhood? What would we be without acquisition? Are progression, civilization and improvement idle terms? Is the uncultivated desert a farm? Is the thistle-patch a garden? Are your best fruits natural fruits? and man most pleasing in nudity? If not, man then, in a large measure, at least, is artificial, in education, accomplishments, tastes and desires, and what is called society, par excellence, is wholly so. Indeed, man seems to be ashamed of nature, because nature is true to herself and regrets neither man's likes nor dislikes his pleasures or his pains. Has man then improved on nature and its mythical duty? If so, he simply pays the rental for the use; she claims the matter, not the acts, and naturally jogs along.

Appeal to the American People.

Is the liberty of conscience, guaranteed inviolable by the Constitution of the United States, a sham?

The signers of the following statement appeal to the American people for justice, for the fulfilment of sacred promises and reparation for a foul insult perpetrated by two zealous Pennsylvania judges. Can the citizens of the great Republic afford to have their liberties trampled under foot? And will they allow their country to be upheld to the ridicule and scorn of the enlightened world of the present age? Citizens of the Republic, read this!

PHILADELPHIA, March 11th, 1875.

On Friday, March 5th, 1875, the undersigned accompanied Mr. Julius Nieland on his way to procure his second naturalization papers. Mr. Nieland had his "first papers" with him, duly made out two years and two days previously. The certificate of citizenship was filled out for him, whereupon we were told to go into any court to take the oath. Court-room No. 2 being less thronged than the others, we entered there and applied to one of the two judges present. Immediately an official handed us a Bible, which remained in our hands, the said clerk having left us very quickly, and there being no table near by. The judge began to read the oath, when we told him that we wished to "affirm." Upon a sign by the judge, the clerk took the Bible away from us, asking, in a rude manner, "Why did you take it?" We answered, "Because you gave it to us." Then the judge asked, "Have you a reason for not wanting to swear by the Bible? We evaded the direct answer, by simply repeating our wish to "affirm," and asked why we should not be allowed to do so. The judge, repeating his question, we admitted that we had a reason. He then asked us whether we did not believe in the doctrines of the Bible. We answered, that we believed in morality, but not in "revelations." (Mr. Nieland here said that he was an Infidel.) Thereupon the judge asked whether we believed in a Supreme Being. The judge now refused to administer the oath (or affirmation), and told Mr. Nieland that, being an Infidel, he could not become a citizen. The other judge nodded his approval, ringing the bell at the same time to announce the adjournment of the court. The judge kept the papers. We asked him for his name and that of the other judge. They were J. RATT and HARE.

The foregoing proves that, although we endeavored to prevent giving offense, the inquisitorial examination of the judge compelled us to profess a creed, and that the latter gave him a pretext of grossly violating the liberty of conscience guaranteed by the Constitution.

F. BIELEFIELD.

I certify to the correctness of the above statements.

JULIUS NIELAND.

SINCE the passage of the laws allowing secular celebrations of marriages and deaths in Germany complaint is made that the Protestant population has become frightfully demoralized. The president of the Evangelical Consistory of Brandenburg, says that baptisms have become quite infrequent, marriages have been frightfully secularized, and burials have grown to be pagan. Thus the number of baptisms have diminished by 55 per cent, and in some districts by 72 and 90 per cent. In Frankfurt-on-the-Oder, Christian ministers were called in only in the cases of 14 persons in 100 deceased; in Potsdam only in 12 cases in 100; while in Berlin burials were attended by clergymen in only a single case in 100. In Frankfurt and Potsdam the number of marriages by the clergymen subsequent to the civil registration were only about 75 per cent; while in Berlin, only 19 marriages in 100 affected any kind of religious ceremony. Supposing these statements to be true, they only expose what was concealed before. If under the laws the people had become heathen, and were concealing the fact, it is well to repeal the laws and discover the evil, that the remedy may be applied.—Independent.

ADDRESS DELIVERED AT THE PAINE HALL DEDICATION,

Boston, Mass., January 29, 1875,

BY B. F. UNDERWOOD.

Mr. Chairman, Ladies, and Gentlemen:—I was prevented this afternoon, by fatigue of travel, and illness consequent on my very efforts to reach this city in order to participate in these demonstrations, from speaking, and did I not feel a special interest in this occasion, I should not attempt to speak this evening.

I understand, although I have had no time to engage even in the most informal conversation with the managers of these meetings since my arrival, that the object is to honor the name of Thomas Paine, to commemorate his services, and to dedicate this Hall to Freethought. I deem these objects worthy of the demonstrations that I have seen, and I almost wish, nay, I surely wish, if the theory of our Spiritualistic friends be true, that Thomas Paine would give us a "materialization" to-night, (applause and laughter); that he were present on this occasion, that he might see this sea of faces before him, assembled for the purpose of hearing words in honor of his name, and dedicatory of this Hall; that he might himself stand up before us, apparently a living, flesh-and-blood human being, and give us some trenchant, stirring, thrilling sentences, such as individualized the writings which he left behind him, and express his gladness at the great advancement that has been made since the time in which he lived and walked the earth. (Applause.)

I delight to speak the praise of Thomas Paine, not because I concur in all the sentiments that he advanced—for perhaps there are few persons who are not extremely orthodox in their views who differ more widely from Thomas Paine on some philosophical and scientific questions than myself; but I delight to speak the praises of Thomas Paine because he was a pioneer in the cause of Freethought, because he prepared the way, made it easy for others to follow him, and to go far beyond the position that he took. Thomas Paine was a man who did great and noble service in his day and generation, and we should be ungrateful if, because we think we occupy more advanced positions than he did, we should neglect to give him his meed of praise.

In the first place, Thomas Paine's services have been ignored, and they have been ignored because of his very honesty, his frankness, and his fidelity to himself and the truth. He did great and noble service to this country, and had it not been for the fact that after he had given up his political services, he went still further and gave us his honest opinion on religion, he would be one of the men most honored by the present generation.

Every person who has but a smattering of American history, must know that at the very time when our fathers were sending their petitions to Great Britain, full of assurances of their loyalty, full of assurances that they were devoted to the mother country, and that they only wanted to be placed back where they had been up to the year 1763—every person, I say, must know that at that time Thomas Paine came out and told our fathers that fidelity to themselves, that honor and happiness alike demanded that they should assume a different attitude toward the oppressive and infamous British Government; that it was their duty, not simply to whine about grievances, but to tell Great Britain that they were no longer bound to yield obedience to the Government; that they had a right to affirm their own sovereignty and their own independence. His little book "Common Sense," a work remarkable for its terseness, was published January 17, 1776.

The effect of that work was wonderful. It attacked monarchical government; it attacked the idea that we were under a duty to pay obedience and allegiance to the British Government. It portrayed the excellence of Republican institutions; it pointed out the practicability of independence; it called upon the Colonies to rise in their dignity and in their courage, and to establish a Republic—a Republic in which there should be no distinction between the peasant and the peer; in which there should be no titles of nobility nor badges of prerogative; in which there should be no religious disabilities; but in which there should be, on the contrary, real equality among mankind; where conduct and character should be the only conditions of preferment and of honor; where the voice of the people should be the supreme law of the land; and which should be an asylum where the oppressed of all nations might come and find protection and brotherhood.

When these sentiments were first advanced, it is difficult for us to understand the effect they had, because we are now familiar with Republican institutions; we are familiar with criticisms of the British Constitution and monarchical government; but at that time, our fathers, with very rare exceptions, were devoted to Great Britain; they thought the British Constitution was the perfection of wisdom; they thought the British form of government could not be surpassed; and when Thomas Paine came out and advocated rebellion and revolution, the great mass of the American people were shocked, and there was actually a committee appointed to answer his work, by some of the leading statesmen of the country—not because they did not endorse in their own hearts, but because they thought the promulgation of such doctrines was premature, and would have a tendency to defeat the very object they had in view, which was to obtain a redress of their grievances, and to be placed back in the position in which they were before the tea tax and the paper tax were imposed. At first "Common Sense" aroused indignation, but it met a response in the hearts of the people, and the work spread rapidly. Edition after edition was issued, until a hundred thousand copies were circulated; even at a time when we had a population of only about three millions. The opposition diminished, and the tide grew stronger and stronger, until it bore down all opposition, and from New England to the Carolinas there was apparently but one voice, and that voice called for the Declaration of American Independence and the establishment of a free country. In the July following—that July which we have pleasure in celebrating every year—appeared the manifesto that is now known throughout the world as the Declaration of American Independence. (Applause.)

The effect of this work of Thomas Paine to which I have referred, has not been sufficiently appreciated by the ordinary reader, because our historians, fearful, perhaps, that if they should give the exact truth, it would render their works unpopular, or from prejudice against Paine's religious position, have either entirely omitted any reference to the facts, or else they have only given a paragraph where pages alone could do him anything like justice. So, if we want to know the facts in regard to the influence that work produced, we must go back to the very sources of American history, to those sources which Bancroft and other historians have consulted; we must go back to the chronicles and correspondence of those times; and we shall find that they speak in unmistakable language regarding the influence which Paine exerted in forming our Government. For instance, Washington, two months after the publication of "Common Sense," speaks of it as working a "powerful change" in public opinion. Gen. Lee, in a letter to Washington, says: "I own myself convinced by the arguments of the necessity of a separation." Lossing, in his "Field Book of the Revolution," says: "Common Sense was the earliest and most powerful appeal in behalf of Independence, and probably did more to fix that idea firmly in the public mind than any other instrumental-ity." Morse, in his "Annals of the Revolution," says: "That the change in the public mind in consequence of 'Common Sense,' is without a parallel." Saml. Adams, in a letter to Paine, in 1802, wrote: "Common Sense awakened the public mind and led the people to call loudly for independence."

We certainly can not be unmindful of, or ungrateful for, the services of the man who took such a prominent part in stirring up our revolutionary fathers to the great idea of establishing a government, and especially when such pains have been taken entirely to ignore his services. And then we should not forget that after Thomas Paine had helped to inaugurate, nay, when he had done more than any other man, not even excepting Saml. Adams of this State, or Thomas Jefferson of Virginia, to inaugurate the Revolution, he was not less brave and consistent in sustaining the spirits of our soldiery, and in helping forward the great work in which the country was engaged. He threw his whole soul into the movement. Accompanying Washington's army and accepting the fare of a common soldier, he wrote words of encouragement and hope, often upon a drum-head, by the flickering light of a torch, and scattered them among the troops. He suited them to the condition of the army and the aspect of public affairs.

The first of these pamphlets appeared just after Washington's defeat on Long Island, when he had been driven from Forts Mifflin and Mifflin. The air was filled with gloom. Traitors were in the camp and Tories were in the town. Our soldiers were disheartened. Embarrassments and hardships were growing heavier, and fear pervaded the land. In this sad condition of affairs, in this night of despondence and gloom, when the ranks of our army were thinned by battle and disease, when our soldiers were half starved and poorly clad, and reddened the snow over which they walked with bare and bleeding feet, rang out in clarion tones the thrilling words of Paine: "These are the times that try men's souls. The summer soldier and sunshine patriot will in this crisis shrink from the service of his country, but he that stands it now deserves the thanks of man and woman. Tyranny, like hell, is not easily conquered, yet we have this consolation, that the harder the conflict the more glorious the victory." (Applause.)

These words have come down to us, and they are repeated now, as they frequently were during our terrible civil war, by thousands—may I not say by millions?—who never knew the circumstances under which they were first given to the public. And Thomas Paine continued his great and noble services during that entire Revolution. He followed the army through sunshine and through storm. If our country was in a terrible strait, he pictured, with perhaps more or less of exaggeration, the weakness of Great Britain, and magnified the resources of the Colonies; so that when our soldiers read those words, they hastened back, as if they had deserted from the army, to their regiments, and those in the country who had been despairing had their courage renewed, and they were glad again to affirm their determination never to give up the struggle until the Colonies of America should be recognized as free and independent States.

The last of these papers, called "The Crisis," was issued at the close of the war, and congratulated the country on the patriotism and the bravery of the army, on the persistency and devotion of the people, and on the great and glorious results which had followed from the efforts of those men, both to themselves and the unborn millions that should come after them. Thomas Paine lived to see his great aim achieved, his great object finally accomplished.

"The times," he wrote, "that tried men's souls are over, and the greatest and completest revolution the world ever knew gloriously and happily accomplished." "It is not every country (perhaps there is not another in the world) that can boast so fair an origin. Even the first settlement of America corresponds with the character of the revolution. Rome, once the proud mistress of the world, was originally a band of robbers. Plunder and rapine made her rich, and her oppression of millions made her great. But America need never be ashamed to tell her birth, nor to relate the stages by which she rose to empire."

Now, when we consider these facts—and I have stated them in the plainest language, and without any exaggeration, as any person by consulting history can establish—would it not be ungrateful in us, even if we had no sympathy with the religious sentiments of Thomas Paine, since his name has been covered with so much obloquy, since his character has been so much misrepresented, since his services have been so entirely ignored—would it not be ungrateful, even ungracious, in us to be unwilling to give him his meed of praise on such an occasion as this?

Then, as Freethinkers, we are unquestionably indebted to Thomas Paine in an eminent degree. I believe that there are many Freethinkers in this country, men of culture, men of the most unfeigned heartiness in the cause of Freethought, and who would not willingly do injustice to Thomas Paine, who yet do undervalue the real services which he rendered to the cause of Freethought. They never think that the value of Thomas Paine's services consists in the value of his religious works as historical criticisms, and because other writers, more learned, having the advantages of modern research and modern investigation, have gone further than he was able to go, they seem to think that Thomas Paine ought to occupy a secondary place in the history of Freethought. But, my friends, let us stop and consider a moment. The services of Thomas Paine to the cause of Freethought do not consist chiefly, not to say exclusively, in the value, as a criticism, of his "Age of Reason," or his other writings, but it consists in this: that he took the arguments that had been confined chiefly to the learned, to men like Collins and Bolingbroke, and clothed them in his own peculiar language, so lucid and so clear that a child cannot misunderstand them, and thereby he made them terribly effective, to a degree that they had never been made before. There had been before the time of Thomas Paine more learned Freethinkers than he, who had made use of the arguments which he presents in his little work, but there never had been a man who was capable of producing those arguments in the same effective style, so adapted to the mass of the people, and so calculated to produce an effect. Thomas Paine's style as a writer, in some respects, has never been equaled; at least, has never been surpassed. We are told that Talleyrand once said that the object of language is to conceal our thoughts. If that be the real object of language, Thomas Paine was a failure, for he never could write to conceal his thoughts, but, on the contrary, every sentence that he wrote was suffused with the light of his own luminous mind, and stamped with his own intense individuality of character. Aristotle says: "He who would be a leader must think as wise people do, but speak as common people do." In that sense, Thomas Paine was a real teacher, for he was certainly a sagacious and very clear-headed man, and he presented his thoughts in language so terse and clear and simple that even the most uneducated mind could not fail to understand them, while the most learned, even to-day, cannot read them without profit or without interest. (Applause.)

The researches of modern scholarship have undoubtedly added a great deal to what Thomas Paine was able to give in his day. It is a fact which we must admit, and the man who does not admit it is a man who is not up with the times, that modern science and modern scholarship have made us acquainted with arguments of which Thomas Paine was entirely ignorant. There are questions of historical criticism, of which he knew nothing whatever, which have since assumed prominence; but while we admit this fact, we nevertheless cannot deny that Thomas Paine, considering the age in which he lived, gave to the world a little work (his "Age of Reason") which has perhaps done as much for the cause of Freethought as any work that has ever been written. It has had a larger circulation than any other Infidel book ever published in the English language; it has been read and understood by a larger number of minds, and has perhaps produced a greater impression than any other book of its kind. Its influence has not been confined merely to those who have read it, but has extended throughout the land; and to-day, in all our churches,

There are men and women who are shocked when they hear the name of Thomas Paine, who nevertheless have largely accepted his views, although they would feel insulted if accused of holding the opinions of "Tom Paine." I say, then, that Thomas Paine is entitled to our sympathy and our gratitude as a pioneer in the cause of Freethought. He cleared the way, and made it possible for others to go beyond him.

Well, in the second place, I understand that our building is dedicated to Freethought, to Universal Mental Liberty; and in this sense the occasion is worthy of our presence, and worthy of any words we may utter. It may be said, however, (and I notice that the fact has been mentioned as an objection by the religious press,) that this Hall has been built by those who do not accept the sentiments of Thomas Paine, but, on the contrary, go far beyond him in the rejection of the claims of religion. That is true. I presume that the majority of the contributors to this Hall do not coincide in the Deistic opinions of Thomas Paine: on the contrary, they would reject both his views respecting a personal Governor of the Universe, and the immortality of the soul. But, at the same time, I do not see that that is any reason why we should not give prominence to the name of Paine, or why this Hall should not be reared for him, because, in the average mind, there is no doubt that he stands for the very principles which we represent. He has been the target at which every intolerant religionist has blazed away during the past hundred years, and in the minds of the great mass of the people there is no man who stands out more prominently as the embodiment of Freethought and the embodiment of "Infidelity," as it is called, than this very man, Thomas Paine.

And then it must be considered further, that we have not accepted Thomas Paine as a leader. No Freethinker, I do not care what phase of Freethought he represents, will allow any body, be he priest, or pope, or king, or prelate, to dispossess him of his direct relations to Nature, whatever they are. No person who is entitled to the name of Freethinker will acknowledge any man, living or dead, as a leader, or himself as a disciple. (Applause.) But it is proper enough that we should recognize Thomas Paine as a pioneer in Freethought, and therefore give his name to this Hall, without implying, as many of the religious press have supposed, that we endorse all the Theistic opinions which he may have presented in the "Age of Reason."

But there is another thing to be considered. This Hall is a necessity. As long as we shall find a disposition on the part of some of our fellow-citizens to dispossess another portion of their rights, it will be our duty to erect halls of this kind, and dedicate them to the principles to which this is dedicated. As long, for instance, as we shall find men excluded from our courts of justice simply because of their religious opinions, as a gentleman was excluded two or three weeks ago, in the city of New York, I understand at the instigation, I regret to say, of one who is herself an unbeliever in the Christian religion, and is perhaps as thoroughly Infidel as the man who was excluded—so long as we see men excluded from the witness stand because they do not believe in a personal Governor of the Universe, so long as we shall see any State endeavoring to support the sacredness of the Sabbath, so long as we shall see the Bible read as an authoritative book and religious instruction continued in our public schools, so long as we shall see chaplains supported by our State and General Governments, so long as we shall see churches and religious institutions exempted from taxation, and we Freethinkers thereby required indirectly to support them, so long as we shall see Jesuitical priests and weak-minded or bigoted men and women assembled together in conventions, trying to evangelize the Constitution of the United States, and to secure a recognition therein of God, Christ, and the Bible, and thereby trying to make a Procrustean bed on which every man and woman shall be stretched; so long it will be our duty to sustain every effort that is calculated to advance Freethought; so long will it be our duty, not simply to advocate Freethought theoretically, not simply to tell about the absurdity of many religious dogmas, but it will continue our duty to do more than that—to prevent the aggressions and the schemes of those plotters, however honest they may be, (and the more dangerous because they are honest). And it will be our duty, further than that, to secure those rights of which we have already been dispossessed, so that when any man comes to the witness stand he shall no longer be questioned with regard to his religious convictions, but the only question will be with respect to his character and worth, so far as his competency as a witness is concerned. (Hear.)

And there is another thing. This Hall ought to remind us that we should be on our guard against regarding our opinions as the ultimate truth. The history of all religious reforms (hardly one can be excepted) shows that when, after having been subjected to persecution and every kind of obloquy, they have finally been established, they have become somewhat encrusted and stereotyped, and have made their Procrustean bed, by which they have tried to test all other facts and all other truths outside of their immediate province. I do not care whether a man is a Christian or an Infidel, so long as he attempts to bind other people on a Procrustean bed, and to lop off their heads or their feet until they shall just fit his own peculiar opinions, I say that implies bigotry, implies a stationary position, if not actual retrogression. I believe that Freethought has a tendency to prevent that, but I believe, notwithstanding, that among Freethinkers there is more or less of that very disposition to regard their convictions as the ultimate truth, and to ignore that great ocean of truth that lies out beyond. When I find a Freethinker who is content with a mere disbelief of the Bible, who tells me he does not believe, and who thinks it a great merit that he does not believe in the story of Jonah and the whale; that he does not believe that one nation was ordered by God to cut the throats of another nation; that he does not believe in the miraculous conception—when a man tells me that that is his position, and takes special pride in it; when he considers that the sumum bonum of Freethought; when he utterly ignores the great thinkers of the past hundred years; when he ridicules Darwinism; when he regards evolution as a mere visionary theory, because he has never taken the pains to understand it; when he recognizes the great reforms of modern times as merely subordinate to that negative opinion that Jonah did not swallow the whale, or the whale did not swallow Jonah, (laughter.)—I say that man does not comprehend what Freethought is, and whatever be his name, whatever phase of Freethought he represents, he does not belong to us, he is not of us. (Applause.)

And not only should this building be a memorial of Thomas Paine, and a reminder of our duties, but it should be, and I trust it will be for years to come, a beacon, a monument, that will give encouragement and hope to thousands who are working in isolation in unpromising localities, socially ostracised, and subjected to disgrace and obloquy. I trust that they may find courage in the thought, that if the name of Thomas Paine, at the end of nearly a hundred years, has thus been vindicated, and this fine and noble structure erected in his honor, in the cultured city of Boston, right in the heart of New England Puritanism, they too may work without entirely forfeiting their character forever, and that the time may come when their services, however much ignored to-day, will receive recognition from a brave and generous public. (Applause.)

And then, again, this building marks the progress of Liberal thought, and as such it appears as significant as in any other aspect in which it can be viewed. I was in this meeting a few minutes this afternoon, and I listened to some remarks which I certainly could not endorse, and if I considered this a proper place for criticism, I should be inclined, instead of endorsing them, to submit them to considerable criticism; but I consider that that would be out of place, and therefore I will briefly say, that in my opinion we have everywhere the evidences of the advance of Freethought. "Times change, and men change with them." Thomas Paine had something to contend with of which we know nothing to-day. On every hand east and west, north and south, there has been progress; and the individual who says that Freethought and the expression of unpopular truth has the same to contend with to-day that it had a hundred years ago, it seems to me is not sufficiently acquainted with the history of the past, and does not comprehend the present. I believe, and I do not hesitate to say it frankly, that a man may go now throughout the length and breadth of the United States and advocate the views which were advanced by Thomas Paine with impunity. Nay, it had been my experience to go even into the Province of Ontario, in Canada, where they are many years behind us, and I find that even there, there is no serious danger to be apprehended from the promulgation of unpopular sentiments. But while we as Freethinkers should be proud and anxious to advance our views, let us not mistake simply that dislike which is manifested towards us for liberality, when sometimes our views are advocated with acerbity, with temper, with vulgarity, and with a blackguardism, which, wherever it is seen, is equally discreditable. If a man is a Freethinker, it makes his blackguardism and his abuse a great deal worse than if he is a Christian, because the Freethinker has no theory of a great scapegoat upon which he can throw his sins, and thereby escape the natural consequences of his wrong doing. (Applause.) The Freethinker has no great bankrupt salvation scheme by which to get rid of paying his moral honest debts. (Laughter.) Because a Freethinker stands on his own merits, he must always be a gentleman, and never descend to blackguardism, simply because some half-educated, miserable priest, intoxicated with bigotry, has seen fit to set the example. (Applause.)

Now, I say, if Freethinkers will present their views courteously, if they will avoid mere declamation and vituperation, if they will maintain the character of gentlemen, and keep up with the spirit of the age—I say (and my experience has been as wide, perhaps, as that of any public lecturer throughout the country,) they can go before an audience in any city of the United States, in any town or hamlet, and advocate their views with impunity. They may avow the most radical sentiments, I do not care if it is Free-loveism itself, if it is done in a spirit and manner that shall not excite combativeness by its very rudeness, and I believe they will receive respectful attention anywhere in the United States.

I have no sympathy, therefore, with those remarks which were made this afternoon to the effect that we are living to-day in the midst of an intolerance which is comparable in its intensity with the tolerance of the days of Thomas Paine. I believe, nay I may say I know, that we have made great advancement, not only in our views, but in the manner in which those views are treated by the great mass of Christians themselves.

In the first place, the creeds have been pulverized, they have been utterly discredited. You can go into the pulpits to-day and listen to sentiments that are so thoroughly radical that you are surprised that they come from a Christian minister. You can go into the pews, and hear there the expression of liberal and heterodox sentiments which are utterly inconsistent with the creeds and dogmas of the church. You can examine the newspapers, from Maine to Oregon, and see evidences of liberality such as you have never seen before. The press reflects, as a rule, the general sentiments of the people; it is really an index of it. There are a few papers, among which I am proud to mention the Investigator, the Index, the Truth Seeker and the Banner of Light, which are in advance of the religious sentiments of the age, but the great mass of the daily papers do not attempt to lead public opinion. If the editors of these papers are Freethinkers themselves, they suppress their sentiments, and simply attempt to express the views of the common people. I have a wide acquaintance with the editors of this country, and I think I may say with certainty that as a class they are sufficiently Infidel. They are Freethinkers, and have no sympathy whatever with the dogmas of the popular religion or with the general superstitions of the country; but looking upon them as the nominal faith of the country, in deference to the wishes of the people, they avoid attacking them with violence; at the same time, they gave them a sufficient number of thrusts to show their general position and their general wish. [Applause.]

We see evidence of this advance also in the general literature of the country. Take up any of our magazines, and see what a change has taken place in this respect. It is not more than eighteen years since Oliver Wendell Holmes, of your city, published the "Autocrat of the Breakfast Table" in the Atlantic Monthly. That was a serial that was exceedingly mild in its heterodoxy, judged from the standpoint of modern thought to-day, and yet for that he was severely censured, and the religious press of the country said it would be impossible for the Atlantic Monthly to obtain a circulation when such a man as Oliver Wendell Holmes was allowed to contribute to its pages such heterodoxy as that. But the "Autocrat of the Breakfast Table" would be milk-and-water to the Liberals of to-day, it is so mild in its heterodoxy. Gerrit Smith, whose death has just been announced, to the grief of so many millions of people, paid Horace Greeley, himself a heterodox and liberal-hearted man, thirteen hundred dollars for the publication of one of his sermons in the Tribune, and Mr. Greeley took especial pains in a leaded editorial to call attention to the fact that that sermon was not published as a communication, but as an advertisement. But since then the Tribune has been glad not only to print the mild heterodoxy of Gerrit Smith, but to accept the writings of such men as O. B. Frothingham, Mr. F. E. Abbot, Mr. Higginson and others who go as far or farther than they, and to send them broadcast among the people. Glad to get them, not simply because the editors of that paper were perhaps in sympathy with our views, but because they knew that there was such a large liberal element all over the country that it would make a demand for their paper, and increase their circulation.

Go to the city of Chicago, the Queen City of the West, and you will find that if a Freethinker speaks from the platform like this on Sunday, he wakes up on Monday morning and sees his speech reported verbatim in the daily papers, side by side with the speeches of the clergymen of the city. And this is done, not simply because they may be in sympathy with the opinions of Freethinkers, but because they know from experience that that is requisite in order to enlarge the circulation of their papers and make them popular among the people. The papers that have the largest circulation in the West, are those that give the most space to Freethought sentiments and to the most advanced views. Is not this an indication of the progress of Liberalism, and a most significant indication, too?

Then, again, look at the publishing houses of this country. The Appletons are, if I mistake not, a Methodist house, but they do not hesitate to bring out the works of such men as Tyndall, Huxley and Darwin, and we find some of the most thoroughly heterodox works brought out by those houses that have been supposed to be orthodox. They do it, as I have said in regard to the papers, not because they are in sympathy personally with the views of these writers, but because they know there is a demand for this kind of reading, and that is the way to enlarge and increase their business.

When we see these facts, when we see the writings of such men as Huxley, and Darwin, and Tyndall, and Spencer and Lewes circulated broadcast, having a larger circulation than orthodox literature, it is a pretty good indication that Freethought is advancing. And, more than that, I can state from personal observation, that there are cities and towns throughout the western country where Freethought is the predominant sentiment, and where, if I were a policy man, and wished to establish myself in business, and wished to get the good will of the community, I would rather announce myself as an Infidel than as a Christian, because that is the public sentiment of the place. [Applause.]

Then I see Liberalism in the attitude of the clergy. None of the clergy teach now what they did a hundred years ago,—that God took little infants from the breasts of their mothers and sent them splurging down into the flames of hell. A clergyman who should utter such a sentiment as that would be deprived of his pulpit, or his salary would be cut off at once. All through the country, the clergy are losing their prestige and their power. They are either conforming to public sentiment, or else they are leaving the profession, turning insurance agents, and insuring against fire in this world, instead of threatening us with hell fire in the next. [Applause and laughter.] The great mass of the people who are not brought into contact with the clergy, hardly understand all their heterodoxy. I frequently have conversations with them, and sometimes discussions, and I know whereof I speak when I say you can hardly ever get a clergyman to affirm a positive dogma.

I not long since had a discussion with a gentleman who occupies the position of professor in a theological seminary in Indianapolis, and he took the ground, when the question came up, that a man might believe what part of the Bible he chose to be divine, and what part he chose to be uninspired. He took the ground that the story of the flood, of which the Bible speaks so unqualifiedly, was a little affair, perhaps confined to Asia Minor, and before he got through he did not know that there was anything saved except Noah and his family, his pigs and his chickens, this affording an opportunity for one of the city papers to say of this professor, that he had brought the flood into the limits of a wash-basin, and to ask, "are you disposed to reject the Bible on such a small amount of water as this?" [Applause.]

Some of you have read in Scribner's—rather an orthodox journal—the articles written by Dr. Blauvelt, an orthodox man, in which he admits that the advances in Freethought are so rapid, that unless something is done in the next decade, unless lawyers, merchants and unprofessional men come to the assistance of the clergy, we shall be doing precisely what they are doing in Europe to-day: that men will go up and down the land, lifting their hands in despair and exclaiming, "Our faith is gone!" Dr. Blauvelt himself has given offense to the Christian world because he has stated the truth so plainly and frankly. He tells Christians that they have no men who can meet the champions of Freethought; that such men as Strauss, Renan, Darwin and Spencer are too strong, that their investigation has been too thorough by far to enable the Christian clergymen to meet them with success, and calls upon them to obtain a higher culture, and a more thorough acquaintance with the subject, before they attempt to compete with those men.

Let me say, in conclusion, that the advance which this Hall significantly marks, has been made in every department. In geology, destroying the old cosmogony of the Hebrews; in archaeology, destroying the old notions of the primitive perfection of mankind; in Egyptology, showing that mankind were in a high state of civilization at the very time the flood is said to have occurred; in philology, showing us that the languages are in utter opposition to the notions that God composed them, and that the old Hebrew language was probably the primitive one; in natural history, and in every department in which science has extended her researches, she has gone so far as to destroy the authority of the Bible in its historical and scientific teachings, and also to advance and strengthen the principles of Freethought.

I say then, friends, that we have every reason to feel grateful and to feel especially joyful on this occasion, since the erection of this Hall is actually an indication of the advancement of Freethought; and when we consider what kind of halls were spoken in by Freethinkers in the days of Thomas Paine, and look at this building, we must feel something of pleasure in the progress that has been made.

Let me say, before I conclude, that this Hall has a value to us, and is, as it were, a prophecy, not simply because it indicates the progress of Freethought, but because it is to be the home of the Boston Investigator, a paper that has been in existence for more than forty years, and has done valiant service in the cause of truth. [Applause.] It is also something that shows an appreciative recognition of the services of our friends, Mr. Mendum and Mr. Seaver, both of whom have labored long, faithfully and well, whose lives from their early youth have been given to the advancement of Freethought; and there cannot be any one in the whole wide country who is in sympathy with the Liberalism of the day, who will not heartily respond to what I say, when I declare that we feel grateful to these men for the great and good service they have rendered to the cause of Freethought, and we hope that their lives may be spared for many years to come, so that from this splendid edifice they may send out their paper, to make its weekly visit to the thousands in our country who give it such a hearty welcome, and who hold it in such high veneration. [Loud applause.]

PROF. T. S. LAMBERT, M.D., read a paper on Brain Building, or the food best adapted to the sustenance of the brain. He enumerated the thirteen simple substances which enter the human organization, to wit: Oxygen, hydrogen, carbon, nitrogen, phosphorus, sulphur, potassium, sodium, chlorine, calcium, magnesium, silicon or flourine, and iron. He explained the process of digestion, assimilation, and the circulation of the blood, by which the various kinds of material necessary to the growth and preservation of various parts of the body is produced. He showed that phosphorus constitutes an important portion of the brain, and that food containing the proper percentage of phosphorus is essential for this purpose.

Among the varieties containing the suitable elements for brain building, or for supplying the brain with the necessary pabulum, he classes and recommends the following: Oysters, fish of all kinds, eggs, cheese, beef, tripe, calves' brains, cream, buttermilk, oat meal in various forms, cabbage, green peas, and many varieties of fruits. The quality of the brain a person has, he held, depended much upon the kinds of food used.

The paper was a lengthy one, but expecting to have the use of the manuscript, no notes were taken. As it is probable we may publish the lecture entire, we will not attempt now to give a more lengthened account of it.

An animated discussion followed the lecture which was participated in by MR. NASH, PROF. VAN DER WEYDE, DR. GUNN, DR. HOEBER, MR. WAKEMAN, and closed by DR. LAMBERT. Some of the remarks were in opposition to the positions of the lecturer, and others in favor. In the Doctor's closing remarks he strongly commended cleanliness and abstinence from alcohol and tobacco. He believed by this course the lives of the people in this country could be increased twenty-five per cent.

[TWO HUNDRED AND NINETY-FIRST MEETING.]

Subject, Religious Opinions in Syria, by A. L. RAWSON, A.M. (who spent several years in Palestine).

The existence of Syria in the midst of the three great powers of ancient times, Egypt, Assyria and Greece, made it important to each of them as a frontier, and Palestine changed owners as often as one or the other of these countries gained a victory in the many battles that was fought for its possession. It was long thought by scholars that for many centuries Palestine was the only centre of civilization, and the source from which all other parts of the world derived both civil and religious light; but recent explorations in this and other countries have somewhat modified that opinion. Still, however much may be added to the glory of other lands and other people, there is due to the Hebrews and to Palestine the credit of having given to the world the initial of Christian civilization. The isolation of the country probably accounts for many of its ideas, and institutions having been alike in some and different in other respects from surrounding nations; and this isolation helped to perpetuate the religion and laws of the Jews, which are to-day the foundation of society in the Christian world, both of the civilized nations and the half-barbaric tribes, and since Abraham is also the father of the tribes of Ishmael, the adopted Arabs, they too trace the origin of their institutions to the Law-giver of Sinai.

Palestine has been from the earliest known time a convenient half-way station between eastern and western nations, where the various forms of civilization came into close contact, influencing each other, displacing one another, producing some of the most difficult yet fascinating problems of history which have engaged some of the best minds. There have been many valuable stores of antiquities exhumed from the ruins of cities in the east within the last fifty years, as our own and foreign museums witness. Egypt has also yielded the relics of a race that was highly cultured, scientific, religious, and whose culture and religion owed nothing to Syria.

India has opened her rock temples; China, Cambodia and other parts of the far East have astonished and delighted the world of scholars and archaeologists with unexampled ruins of temples and palaces, the relics of forms of civilization and systems of religion distinct from any originating in Syria or Western Asia.

The American society for the exploration of that part of Palestine lying east of the river Jordan and the Dead Sea, has the most promising field; but its affairs have been so poorly managed by an incompetent ring that its results so far are simply contemptible. Men uninformed on the subject have well nigh wasted the money contributed generously for the work, and instead of adding to the stock of knowledge of that district have republished old materials and rediscovered well-known sites. Other societies or individuals have, in their anxiety to gain popular favor for their enterprise, made a great clamor over insignificant items, and when pressed for something new, anything to keep up the public interest, have resorted to inventions and manufactures.

In despair at finding no inscriptions on the stones of the platform of the temple at Jerusalem, or among the stones of the debris of ruined buildings thrown down from it, inscriptions have been made and offered to the world of scholars; but so far without success, except that the exposition of these inventions has raised doubts as to the integrity of any antiquity, not only in that country but others, and cooled the ardor of the public in all similar enterprises.

Dr. Schliemann, a German, opens up the remains of Homer's Troy. S. Connos raises a question as to their genuineness. Mr. George Smith ransacks the Assyrian libraries in the valley of the Euphrates and Tigris, and because the readings modify our opinions of the account of the deluge as given in the pentateuch of Moses, Mr. Smith is ostracised and refused a hearing even in this city.

Mr. J. T. Wood, after eleven years sacrifice of the best period of his life in exploring Ephesus, and after having met with great success in restoring to us knowledge of the plans of the city and temple, and exhuming some notable art works from among the ruins of the several temples of the goddess Diana, which are now in the British museum, gave two lectures in this city with humiliating results. There were present only a very few, even of theological professors and teachers whose livelihood and position in society depend on the forces set in motion by him who faced a storm of intolerant howls for a space of two hours in the theatre of ancient Ephesus. Such exhibitions of coolness in the churches almost compel an assent to the assertion of an eminent divine, who, on being asked if he would join a company of travelers on the way to the Holy Land, said his Holy Land was in Wall street.

Pecuniary interests influence the expression of religious opinions in Syria also. Palestine is a kind of theological grocery where may be bought in packages to suit whatever may be wanted at the time by a needy soul. The keepers are so obliging that if any article is wanted that is not in stock it is at once manufactured to order. This readiness to serve, makes it one of the best markets in the world, attracting customers from all quarters who cheerfully part with their money in exchange for the sacred productions.

The very rocks of the country are ground to powder and sold as in the milk grotto at Bethlehem where the monks tell you the rocks were once black, when Joseph, and Mary, and the infant Jesus hid for a few days before their flight into Egypt, and a few drops of the Virgin's milk falling upon the rock changed it to a milky whiteness which is the color to this day. The rock also acquired at the same time the miraculous property of increasing the flow of a mother's milk when powdered and drank in water. The original grotto was small, ten or twelve feet in extent, there are now five or six large rooms, with chapels, altars, shrines, the stone from which has been powdered and sold to pilgrims pound for pound in gold. The fact that the entire mass of rock in Palestine is a white chalky limestone may help us understand this story, at least the miraculous part of it.

The abundance of material in the Holy Land makes this ready supply possible. The city of Jerusalem stands on heaps of dust and crumbling ruins of its former structures from ten to fifty, and even in places seventy-five feet deep; and its religious atmosphere can be described as being full of the dust of the crumbling remains of former systems of religion. This theological dust is rather choking to sensitive minds.

One, in that country, may feast on native fruits for a dime, spend a fortune in expensive viands from distant climes, or beg his way in the streets, secure from starvation in the generous nature of the common people. The pious pilgrim may see all the glories of the gilded sepulchre and jeweled shrines for half a cent, or he may spend a fortune in enriching the convents whose monks have been sent from distant lands to guard its shrines, or beg his way without money or price from one place to another throughout the land.

As a specimen of the variety of religions offered may be mentioned Greek, Armenian, Armenian Mechitarists, Jacobites, or Syrian Monophysites, Copts, Abyssinians, African Monophysites, Nestorians, Maronite, Melchite, Syrian, Chaldean, and Latin.

These are all Christians, and differ from one another in such things as have grown up from isolation and ignorance.

The eight Catholic rites are in communion with Rome, holding the same doctrine, but differing in the mode of worship and discipline. The heresies maintained by the schismatics are venerable with antiquity and command respect and adherence from large communities.

The Mahometans are also divided into numerous sects. The grand division is into two, the Sunnites and the Sheites.

The Jews are outcasts by both Christians and Mahometans, and they are divided into two great classes or faiths—those who look for a resurrection of the body and a future life, and those who oppose these opinions. These parties are also subdivided into a number of families or nationalities, as Polish, Spanish, English, German, etc.

It would require a goodly sized volume for an account of the thousand and one rites which flourish like exotics, well supplied with priests, monks and congregations, with a ready story of origin, experiences, persecutions, and how the faith has been kept in their particular fold.

A curious work might be composed on the various titles and offices in the eastern churches, with their origin and history. Such a work might include also a chapter on the uses of religious forms as talismans for good or against evils.

The mass of the people of Syria seem to live by their profession of devotion to the past in religion, and by their practice in things belonging to the present. In business circles it is the common saying that it requires one Copt, two Greeks and three Jews to cheat an Armenian. My experience was, that if one could not cheat you, he assisted you in cheating yourself.

In addition to the domiciled religious sects, there are the Belouins, the Druses, the Metawelies, Nusariyeh, Ismailiyeh and other smaller sects. Now, in view of this variety of material, each crystalized or molded into its own form, how are we to comprehend the bond of union that holds society together? It is a peculiarity of the country, that there is no bond of union, and every sect of each is jealous and suspicious and envious of each other, and it is utterly impossible to form a community of ideas or interests.

It is equally impossible to arrive at a common agreement in opinion on any religious question where there is such bitter antagonism. The one will oppose another for the sake of opposition, and of being unlike any other. If the Latin makes the sign of the Trinity one way, the Greek makes it another way, and the Armenian finds a third method. If the Latin makes the sign of the cross in a certain manner, the Greek varies it for the sake of a difference. If one sect writes the musical scale beginning with the syllable do, the other insists that the only true method is to begin with the syllable re. If one wears a hat with a flat crown, the other makes a point to his, and so on without end.

No other country can exhibit a like variety of people, and such antagonisms. There can be no permanent advancement in education, character, condition, or prospects, because of this disintegration. They must remain weak and helpless so long as the Turk is permitted to oppress them.

In strict analogy with this checkered origin of the people, we find many sources for the origins of the various opinions in religion, and all obscured by myths, traditions, tales of wonder, mystery, magic and miracle, for it is not to their interest to record the simple beginnings of those systems which have held and now holds millions of men, willing or unwilling.

The ancient Greek priest or priestess at the shrine of Delphi kept inviolate the secret of the oracle. The modern Greek priest at the shrine of the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem is equally reticent as to the origin of the holy fire annually distributed to the clamoring crowd of the faithful who pay for the blessed privilege of being the first to receive the divine spark.

The modern patriarch is a skilful actor, and plays his part with great effect in the fire scene, fainting from excess of emotion, or from the overpowering pressure of the Holy Spirit as the Greeks explain it. The ancient Sybil swoons, also, after receiving the answer of the god at the oracle.

If the architecture of a people is an index to their character, then the Syrians are a strange mixture of good and bad, of palaces and huts, new and old. They defend their family with their lives, but sell for a price a daughter to a stranger for a wife. Some profess Christianity, attend church, keep the fasts, and wear amulets and pray to saints, and before images, and try to keep away imaginary evil spirits by the use of charms, incantations, prayers, and sacred relics.

Some purify their bodies by frequenting the bath, others apparently never use the water externally. Some wear silks, and fine linen, and gold, pearls and diamonds, and walk on carpets, or sit on divans covered with the choicest productions of the loom, and the embroider's needle, and step from the doors into the streets where the scavenger is needed sadly, but seldom ever goes. The accumulation in some streets reaches to the top of the entrance door, and you go down stairs from the street into the courtyard that twenty years ago was on a level with the street.

The chief vices of the inhabitants are jealousy, coffee and rakes. The chief social indulgences are scandals and quarrels. The main source of income is beggary, robbery and extortion. The wealthy convents grow richer by constant beggary, robbing their dependents. The ruling classes thrive only by extortion, while the mechanic and merchant follow the same rule, and the farmer also, for he robs the soil in taking crops from it without returning to it manure and tillage.

The common people are stripped to the bone of every useful thing in life, that the rich, the rulers and priests may live in luxury and ease. The priests lends the influence of his sacred office to the rulers who use it to increase the burdens of the working classes.

The chief factories in Jerusalem are prayer-factories, and the wares made in them are shaped after patterns a thousand years old, worn-out, antiquated and unfit for human wants in this age.

The most common sight in Syria near large towns in the morning, is women carrying baskets of provisions or fruits on their heads to market. These loads in some cases weigh eighty pounds, and are carried six or eight miles, the women leaving home at two or three in the morning, so as to be in season at the city. I have seen a woman loaded with a basket of egg-fruit, a bag of fodder for the animals, her own dinner and a child six months old. She was driving a donkey heavily loaded, and leading a camel also well laden, while her husband was walking at his ease in the rear smoking his cigarette.

The unhappy condition of Syria is the direct result of corrupt religions. Whether this corruption is confined entirely to that country I will not undertake to decide. One fact however is patent: that jealousy between Christian nations has enabled the Turk to hold his strangling grip on Syria and other countries for a long time past. The policy will doubtless continue some time longer, if we are to judge from the fact that the Ottoman government made last year, in London an additional loan of £12,000,000, or $60,000,000; which means more than merely a few millions in money; it means that England's fear of Russia makes her blind to the best interests of humanity—deaf to the cries of enslaved millions. There was a time when a small number of black slaves under the British flag, or a like number under the stars and stripes enlisted the sympathies of the Christian world; now the enslaved millions of white and other men, under the mastery of the barbarous Turk excites no attention, because of the unchristian jealousies among Christian nations. It is too much to expect that any nation in Europe will jeopardize its commercial interests in the cause of oppressed humanity. And besides, these poor, miserable, ignorant, fanatic, lazy, slavish Syrians have been so long cursed with the misrule of the Turks, that they are really not worth the trouble it would cost to relieve them from their difficulties, and it would accord better with the selfish instincts of the present age to gather them into one place and treat them with nitro-glycerine.

In describing the miserable facilities for water in Jerusalem, the lecturer stated the fact that the city had only the rain water to depend upon, or the water from a brook which was the natural sewer of the city, containing its washings and filth, and which water had to be brought a distance of a mile over an elevation 400 feet, in skins on the backs of donkeys. The people are contented to drink this water, that is anything but pure, and whether they are contented or not, circumstances force it upon them.

Their religious opinions are in no better condition than their water, and the supply is from sources just as questionable as to condition and convenience, and the people seem contented, and if they are not, they are compelled by circumstances to submit to their unpleasant fate.

For want of room, we are compelled to omit several interesting points of the lecture, as well as the lively discussion which followed it, and was participated in by Messrs. WILCOX, WAKEMAN, S. P. ANDREWS, a Baptist Elder, and closed by Mr. RAWSON.

R. K. JUSTUS, Washington, Ark., writes: I send you two more subscribers, who wish to peruse the good digestible reading matter which THE TRUTH SEEKER is always chock full of. We read its pages with pleasure.

ALLEN PRINGLE, Selby, Ont., writes: I am much pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER, and will try and extend your circulation in this quarter. Your articles on "The Bible" and "Christianity" are very valuable for popular reading.

MRS. AGNES HEDGES, Georgetown, Col., writes: I herewith send you the names of four new subscribers. We like your paper very much. Please send sample copies to the appended names. I speak for myself. I like THE TRUTH SEEKER. I do not wish you ever to stop sending it to me; should I get behind in not paying for it, I will not ask you to wait long for your pay.

S. P. BRIGHAM, Franklin, Pa., writes: I have read Mrs. Zamzow's (first) letter with mingled feelings of joy and pleasure, pity and reflection. Too noble to prostitute herself, she is a living martyr—not to creed or "her religion," but to right for conscience. It grieves me to realize how narrow is the "way" each sect calls "our way," "the way," and how nearly impossible it is for them to feel or act as though any body is worth possessing, unless its soul is "saved" through their creed and its belief is in their Christ. Oh! that every Church, yea, every man could say, "to do good is my religion," then angels would smile where now they weep. In our efforts let us embrace humanity and ever do our duty. I inclose one dollar for Mrs. Zamzow.

MRS. S. R. STEVENS, Colorado Springs, Col., writes: I cannot afford to be without THE TRUTH SEEKER as long as it continues to be as liberal and just in sentiment as it has been thus far. I like it because you attend to your own business, and do not fight all others who do not agree with you. I am a Spiritualist, but I like THE TRUTH SEEKER better than some Spiritualistic papers I could name.

WM. A. CHILCOTE, Stevens' Creek, Ark., writes: I became in possession of a copy of your paper and am very much pleased with it. I read and re-read it until it was completely worn out. I do not think now that I can do without it. Please send it to me for a year. I have generally been called an infidel, and now I am proud to acknowledge the name—one who is willing to discard the old fables of the past in favor of that which is true and reliable.

A. SWIFT, San Bernardino, Cal., writes: I like the bold and fearless temper of your paper, and trust it will meet with universal patronage by all at least who have had the scales removed from their eyes, and are enabled to see the truth as it is, stripped of superstition and ignorance. Notwithstanding the combined forces of the orthodox element here—their abuse and slang, there is a manifest spirit of determination to prove all things and hold fast to the truth.

MISS LAURINDA GALLOWAY, Hoopstown, Ill., in writing to her uncle in reference to our sheet, says: Now, uncle, about that little TRUTH SEEKER. We are very fond of it. It has so much good sense in it, with an acceptable amount of fiction and fun. Father says he will take it three months on trial. When the time is out probably we will continue it. While reading its pages, it seems like conversing with you, as we so well know you fondly read it and appreciate it.

THOMAS B. JOHNSON, Sterling, Iowa, writes: I have just read the account in your paper of that poor man's situation, and have laid down the paper to write you a few lines and contribute my mite towards his assistance if it is not too late. But my friend, what a lesson can be drawn from the proposition that he must act as a hypocrite and belie his own conscience on his death bed, or be denied a cup of water or a crust of bread, and is that all? No, he must be tortured by seeing the wife of his bosom in want of the same, and his infant child perishing for the lack of nourishment. Oh! that some Heathen missionary would visit this bigoted country, and carry us back to those ages when man had more humanity for man.

DOANE KELLY, Dennis Port, Mass., writes: I see in No. 14 a person addressed you as "Mr. Heathen," and said your paper is not for the welfare of the people, but is calculated to degrade them and fit them for hell, which never will be full until it receives such men as you are. I have just commenced taking your paper; but I say to you keep on with your paper and go, if necessary, to the hell your correspondent mentioned, and I hope I shall meet you there. I much prefer hell with such men as you are, to an orthodox heaven with such narrow-minded Christians as wrote that article to you. I am sure then there would be more enjoyment with men of sense, than with shallow-witted bigots. Keep on brother, in the good work you have begun, and I beg you, not to spare the canting hypocrite. Give them the truth.

M. P. ROSECRANS, Clear Lake, Iowa, writes: The more I read your paper, the better I like it. You meet your opponents so pleasantly and so kindly, and yet so squarely, that your arguments reach the minds of all intelligent readers. Your articles on the Bible are the best I have ever seen on the subject, appealing as they do, entirely to the good sense of your readers. Go on then, in your good work, in breaking the trammels of creeds, and teaching your fellow men and women to be what nature designed them, perfect individuals, and not shriveled deformities, studying with furtive glance the will or not of an unknown power; educating them up to the standard of the unit at least in the order of creation, learning them to think for themselves, to write their own Bibles, and to look to the divine principles in their own natures for the true and perfect guide in all matters pertaining to religion, morality and government.

H. C. LIESER, Forest Grove, Oregon, writes: It is a pleasure to note the changes towards Liberalism taking place throughout the United States and the whole world. Doctrines long held as infallible are being tested in the crucible of criticism, and found wanting in purity. THE TRUTH SEEKER and the Investigator by their bold expressions are moving quite a portion of the country. Many now recognize their words as sounding the death knell of old pet doctrines. Then "Othello's occupation's gone." Reasonable ideas are gaining ground, old systems are being abandoned. Many are thinking mental freedom a blessing, and reason preferable to blind faith. Old superstitions are being scattered. Error is floating away, leaving the stream of truth clear and unobstructed. In short there is great improvement on all hands. May your way be prosperous till truth flows like a river to every home in the land and forever.

CHARLES GIBSON, Evansville, Wis., writes: A copy of your valuable paper fell under my notice about one year ago, since which I have had the reading of it. I find it advocates principles which I have endorsed for the last forty years. Nature reduces them to practice sufficiently to convince a sane mind that miracles are a delusion. Though reared under the droppings of the sanctuary and in sacred adoration of the Lord, (by I believe the best of mothers) who thought it to be her duty to teach her children the doctrine of future hell torments; that man's creation was a miracle, the coming of Christ was a miracle, and she thought if I was ever saved through the merits of Christ that would be another miracle. I felt the selfishness of my own merits, that my happiness was the effect of my own acts. Though persecuted for my opinions I consider the weakness through which it comes, and stand firm in the belief that the Universe is God being developed, and man is the creature of circumstances, and circumstances have a lot to do with his acts in every case.

Religion and Christianity are by no means one and the same thing. Religious forms are not Christianity. I understand Christianity to be motive principle reduced to practice through the honest mandates of conscience; but still I am called an infidel. But when I tell them Christ was an infidel, a usurper of the government under which he lived, and that he was put to death for heresy; they say my belief may do to live by, but not to die by. I have been near death's door, but never recanted yet.

I hope THE TRUTH SEEKER may find its way to every household in the land, and be the means of battering down the walls of bigotry and superstition, when the scales shall fall from every eye, and the galling chains of slavish fear shall be loosened and man will enjoy the light and beauty of free thought.

WELLS'Every Man his own Lawyer,

AND

Business Form Book.

BY JOHN G. WELLS.

A Complete Guide in all Matters of Law and Business Negotiations.

For EVERY STATE IN THE UNION.

With full Instructions for proceeding without legal assistance in suits and Business Transactions of every description.

Containing: Legal Forms of Deeds, Mortgages, Leases, Affidavits, Depositions, Bonds, Orders, Contracts, Powers of Attorney, Certificates of Citizenship, Agreements, Assignments, Awards, Declarations, Demands, Letters of Credit, Arbitration, Partnership, Releases, Wills, Codicils, Submissions, Land Jointures, Tenants' and Landlords' Receipts, Public Lands, Land Warrants, Composition with Creditors, Oaths, Satisfaction of Mortgages, Pre-emption Laws, Marriage and Divorce, Patent Laws, with full Instructions to Inventors; Pension Laws, with full Instructions to enable the discharged soldier or sailor to procure back pay, pensions, bounties, and all war claims; the Laws of the different States concerning Property Exemption from Execution, Collection of Debts, Mechanics' Liens, Contracts, Limitation of Actions, Usury, Qualifications of Voters, Licenses to sell Goods, etc. Also, containing the Internal Revenue Laws, Stamp Duties, Post-Office and Custom House Regulations. Constitution of the United States, with Amendments, the whole action of the Government in relation to Reconstruction and the Freeman, Seals of the different States, with descriptions, etc.

There is no class of the community, male or female, who have, or expect to have any property, or who have any rights or privileges which require protection, who will not be greatly benefitted and advantaged by the possession of the book. It will save them money, save them trouble, save them time, save them litigation and lawyers' fees, and give them information which nobody can afford to be without.

We have no hesitation in saying that this Work will be found the most comprehensive, reliable, and indispensable BUSINESS MAN'S GUIDE ever published in this or any other country; in fact, a work which individuals in any class, in any community, cannot afford to be without.

As an attest of what we state, we refer to the free encomiums of the leading press of this country; or to any of the 100,000 individuals who have purchased the present edition and have had occasion to use the work, or have taken the trouble to examine it.

A Few Extracts from the Many Flattering Notices of the Press.

Wells' Every Man his Own Lawyer, and Business Form Book. New York: John G. Wells. As a legal adviser always at hand to instruct the reader how to proceed in suits and business transactions of all kinds; as a form book, to enable the best learned to draw deeds, mortgages, leases, orders, wills, etc.; as a guide in regard to the laws of the various States, concerning exemptions, liens, limitations of actions, and so on, the volume in question is certainly invaluable to men of business; and it is not surprising that a hundred thousand copies soon found their way into the homes and counting-houses of the multitude. Here we have not only all the various changes in the laws of the different States; the Patent Laws, the Pension Laws, the Homestead Laws, the Internal Revenue Laws, etc., with full instructions to all who may be interested in them. The publisher has been determined to make this work complete, and, to our thinking, he has succeeded. No business man or woman can with safety be without a copy of it.—New York Times.

This work has been received with great favor, and attained a large sale. The most implicit confidence can be placed upon the work as an authority on all the subjects which it treats.—Philadelphia Age.

As to the utility and convenience of this work to all business men, there can be no question.—Chicago Republican.

It is in fact, a book filled with the most valuable information for every citizen: you can purchase in this book what may be worth hundreds of dollars to you.—St. Louis Dispatch.

It is emphatically of the highest utility to every man, be our business what it may.—Pittston Gazette.

For every-day reference we have found it the most convenient of all books. For practical utility to every one cannot be over-estimated. Men of every class will find in this work just what they want, plainly, clearly, and practically stated.—Bangor Democrat.

This excellent work should be in the hands of every farmer and business man.—Cincinnati Times.

The work embraces 650 large 12mo pp., and is printed on fine paper, handsomely bound.

PRICE, Cabinet Library Binding, $2 25.

THE Boston Investigator!

THE OLDEST REFORM JOURNAL IN THE UNITED STATES

Will commence its 45th year April 18, 1875.

PUBLISHED EVERY WEDNESDAY

at 84 Washington street, Boston, Mass., by JOSIAH P. MENDUM.

HORACE SEAVER, Editor.

PRICE: $3.50 per annum. Single copies, 7 cents. Specimen copies sent on receipt of a Two-Cent Stamp to pay the postage.

The Investigator is devoted to the Liberal cause in religion; or, in other words, to Universal Mental Liberty. Independent in all its discussions, discarding superstitious theories of what never can be known it devotes its columns to things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who have entered its unknown shores. Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interest of this world, it confines itself to things of this life entirely. It will soon commence its FORTY-FIFTH year and asks for support from those who are fond of sound reasoning, good reading, reliable news, anecdotes, science, art, and a useful Family Journal. Reader, please send your subscriptions for six months or one year; and if you are not satisfied with the way the Investigator is conducted, we won't ask you to continue with us any longer. Now is the time to subscribe.

days.

WE should like to know how that man in Minneapolis broke his leg putting on his overcoat.

A PERSON of an inquiring mind asks:
"Does the Lord love a man who spends at a church festival the money he owes to his washerwoman?"

A TEXAS woman has learned to use the lasso so deftly that she can stand in the door and haul the hat off the lightning-rod peddler while he is unfastening the gate.

"My son," said an old man, "beware of prejudices; they are like rats, and men's minds are like traps; prejudices get in easily, but it is doubtful if they ever get out."

A BOSTON undertaker was made very mad recently, by being awakened at an untimely hour by two inebriated persons, who wished to order two "beers" for themselves.

AFTER waiting four years, a Michigan lover finally popped the question, and the girl answered, "Of course, I'll have you.
Why, you fool, you, we could have been married three years ago."

THERE is a man in Nebraska who isn't being worried to death by people who want to borrow his wheelbarrow. His farm is six miles square, and his house is set three miles back from the road.

"JULIUS, why didn't you oblong your stay at the springs?" "Kase, Mr. Snow, dey charge too much." "Howso, Julius?"
"Wy, de landlord charged dis colored individual wid stealing de spoons."

AN old black woman, reciting her "spee-rance," said she had been to heaven. "Did you see any of de colored ladies dar?" asked a younger sister. "O, you git out; you 'spose I went in de kitchen when I was dar?"

"WHERE's the molasses, Bill?" said a red-headed woman sharply to her son, who had returned with an empty jug. "None in town, mother. Every grocery has a large board outside, with letters chalked on it. 'N. O. Molasses.'"

A LADY the other day meeting a girl who had lately left her service, inquired, "Well, Mary, where do you live now?" "Please, ma'am, I dont live nowhere, now," rejoined the girl; "I'm married!"

A DUBUQUE printer received the following note from his girl; "May I git yanked out of bed at midnite every nite by a cuss like Theydore Tilton, an' carried upp a million pare of stares, iff ever I seseto love you, Jim,"

A MAN in Monroe county, Pa., roused to frenzy by the news from Concord and Lexington, has just declared his independence by flooring his mother-in-law with a hot griddle. The neighbors, however, regard the affair simply as a family broil.

"I SHOULD think you would be ashamed to pitch into that little boy," said a pedestrian, as he caught a big bootblack cuff-ing a small newsboy. "Ye would, hey?"
sneered the lad, as he gave his nose a wipe.
"D'ye think I'd go for a big boy and get all pounded up?"

A FRENCH butcher who was on his death bed said to his wife: "If I die, Francoise, you must marry our shop boy. He is a good young man, and the business cannot be carried on without a man to look after it." "I have been thinking about that already," said his wife.

"WHERE are you stopping, Bill?" inquired one seedy man of another. "Stopping at the Russell House," was the reply. "Russell House? Where is the Russell House?"
"O, you see, I sleep in a dry goods box and rustle around like blazes to get something to eat."

SEVERAL passengers on the lower Mississippi were attracted by the alligators basking in the sunshine. "Are they amphibious, captain?" asked a looker-on. "Amphibious, thunder!" answered the enthusiastic officer, "they'll eat a hog a minute."

CANNY SCOT—"D'ye sell whuskey here, mon?" Barman—"Yes." Canny Scott—"Hoo much is't a jar?" Barman—"Two pounds." Scot (after much consideration)
"Well, then, it's unco' gude, awl hae twa pennyworth, het, wi' sugar ant lemon, and a long pipe."

A GOOD deacon on an official visit to a dying neighbor, who was a very churlish and universally unpopular man, put the usual question: "Are you willing to go, my friend?" "O, yes," said the sick man, "I am." "Well," said the simple-minded deacon, "I am glad you are, for all the neighbors are willing."

A PIOUS elder of the Scottish kirk on his way to service of a Sabbath morning, saw a little boy and girl playing marbles. He wrathfully inquired: "Boy, do you know where children go to who play marbles on Sunday?" "Ay, ay," answered the boy,
"they gang down to the field by the brig," (bridge.) "No!" roared the elder, "they go to hell and are burned." The little fellow looked shocked and frightened, called to his sister: "Come awa, Jennie, come awa, here's a mon swearing awfully."

THE advent of spring bonnets and hats has brought forth the following gush, recently noticed on an Express parcel:

Expressmen, beware!
And take extra care
Of this duck of a hat.
It's for Miss Ettie Patton,
And if it is sat on,
'Twould be smashed much too flat.
Its destination a Northern town
Of some renown,

MUCH has been said of late of kissing and the different kinds. They have several varieties in Brooklyn. An anonymous Scotch poet expresses himself in this style:

Some say that kissing's a sin,
But I think it's nae ava;
For kissing has wonn'd in this world,
Since ever that there was twa,

Oh, if it wasna lawful,
Lawyers wadna allow it;
If it wasna holy,
Ministers wadna do it.

If it wasna modest,
Maidens wadna take it;
If it wasna planty,
Puir folk wadna get it,

CATARRH CURE.

What is Catarrh? It is an affection of the head, which may end in Deafness, partial or total Blindness, diseases of the throat and vocal organs, and even in Consumption.

In nine cases out of ten, when people fancy they have only a "cold in the head,"
they have CATARRH!

It is a terrible disease and should not be trifled with. The Best Remedy known for it is that prepared by the Rev. R. B. Lockwood, which has the endorsement of such eminent physicians as Dr. Geo. N. Tibbles of Hudson City, N. J.; Dr. W. H. Newell, Jersey City Heights; Dr. A. B. Laidlaw, Hudson City, N. J.; and of such distinguished ministers as Rev. W. H. Dikeman,
New York, Rev. W. H. McCormack, Mt.
Herman, N. J., and very many others.

This medicine is prepared in good faith and may be relied on in every case to effect a permanent and speedy cure.

Rev. R. B. Lockwood's NASAL DOUCHE to facilitate the use of the CATARRH CURE is indispensable to insure the cure of ob-

Notes and Clippings.

LITERARY women are long lived. So are actors and actresses.

THE Japanese have celebrated their two thousand five hundred and thirty-fifth anniversary.

BET root sugar can be made in California at seven cents a pound, including every expense.

BEING asked what made him so dirty, an unwashed street Arab's reply was: "I was made, as they tell me, of dust, and I suppose it works out."

INTENSE heat prevailed on April 19 in the north of Scotland. Eighty degrees were registered at mid-day in the sun, and sixty-five in the shade. Two deaths from sun-stroke are reported.

THE Rev. Thos. Beecher of Elmira, N. Y., opened a dancing party with prayer the other evening, after which he said, "Now, boys, form on and I'll see you dance once, and then go home."

ORRIN SHIPMAN wants Victoria Woodhull to come and start a community "of the right stamp" on his Valcour Island property, where the free lovers' recent experiment failed.

"MAY I leave a few tracts?" asked a pious missionary of a lady who responded to his knock. "Leave some tracts? Certainly you may," said she, looking at him benignly over her specs. "Leave them with the heels towards the house, if you please."

It is reported that Mr. Beecher has taken an office in the Tribune building. That will be a fine trio, Jay Gould, the young editor, and Beecher—financial genius, editorial profundity, and exalted piety and purity.—N. Y. Sun.

A CLERGYMAN'S SUICIDE.—Middleboro', Mass., May 20.—The Rev. Charles S. Macready, pastor of the Methodist Episcopal Society here, committed suicide this morning by cutting his throat with a razor. Family trouble, causing depression of spirits, prompted the act.

"You are all going to Hell," shouted an Arkansas camp-meeting preacher. "That's a d—d lie. I am going to New Orleans," said a butternut on a rear seat; but he took it all back when the preacher marched down toward him, pulling an eighteen-inch bowie knife from his boot leg as he advanced.

It is strange that while Jay Gould makes no secret of his ownership of the controlling interest in the Tribune and his plans with reference to the future of that paper, his young editor is very shy of the subject. We advise the young editor to carefully study the wishes of the master.—N. Y. Sun.

If Beecher is guiltless, what a crowd of hitherto respectable people will go down while he ascends to grasp the crown of triumphant martyrdom! If he is guilty, what a crowd of friends, brethren and confidants he is trying to crush to save himself, not even sparing the woman he seduced.—N. Y. Sun.

OLIVER Wendell Holmes says a kiss is "the twenty-seventh letter of the alphabet—the love-labial which it takes two to speak plainly." This is the kiss alphabetical, and it is odd that Mr. Beecher hasn't mentioned it.

REVIVALIST Hammond has met out in California at least one father who don't like to have his little daughter frightened into spasms by pictures of hell fire. "You're an ecclesiastical idiot," said the irate parent, and the preacher didn't deny it.

OLD Deacon Roberts was worked up to a high state of enthusiasm in a revival. He was exhorting the unconverted to flee from the wrath to come before it was too late; for, said he, "the Lord is here now, and he may not be here again for twenty years."

FROTHINGHAM very truly says there is nothing in which men are so dishonest, so insincere, as in matters of religion. Thousands profess creeds they do not believe, patronize Sunday charlatans, and go through a service of chanting and bowing, when in their hearts is nothing.

THE Church has banked for eighteen hundred years on the vicarious salvation of Christ, and has issued millions of certificates of deposit on this bank, not one of which can ever be redeemed, or is worth a cent to the holder either in this world or the next.—Earlville Transcript.

STILL ANOTHER.—The Rev. John M. Porter, of Bethlehem, N. J., has just been deposed from the ministry and their fellowship by an ecclesiastical council for gross immorality connected with certain females of the church. John M. will have to change his religion, join another church, take another field and try it again.

THE treatment of Mrs. Tilton is the blackest of the many black things that this trial has brought out. The conduct of Mr. Beecher toward her, on the theory of innocence, is little short of dishonorable. On the theory of his guilt, it is base beyond measure; base in his seduction of her, villainous in his subsequent attempt to escape the consequences of his crime at her expense.—N. Y. Sun.

REV. T. M. DAWSON, late of the Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, Cal., has resigned, and gone to Nevada, leaving a number of other clerical gentlemen losers to the tune of thousands of dollars, invested for them by Dawson in mining stock which have declined in value. The Rev. Dawson was divorced from his wife some months since, on the grounds of desertion, she refusing to go to California with him from this State.

DURING the revival service at Valejo, California, a gentleman observed that one of Mr. Hammond's most energetic lady assistants was being vigorously hugged by a young man while the singing was going on. When the inquiry meeting was commenced, the young lady approached the gentleman who had been watching her, and asked in a meek, plaintive voice: "Do you love Jesus?" "I fear I don't love Jesus half, as much as you do the boys," responded the gentleman. The fair damsel was not disconcerted a bit, and she curled up her pretty mouth and said, "Don't you wish you were one of the boys?"

THE PROBABLE RESULT.—A member of Dr. Storrs' church in Brooklyn, attempted the solution of this problem yesterday by saying that "Plymouth church will run along just as ever, even if Mr. Beecher be found guilty, for about three or four months. By that time the recoil of public sentiment will have begun to make itself felt. All the other Congregational churches of the country will have disfellowshipped it. It will stand alone, a pariah among the Christian churches of the land. Then one or two men like Claflin or Storrs or Sage will drop away from it. Examples of this kind are always contagious. Other reputable men will follow. The women will stick longest to Beecher. It is women mostly who have lately joined his church. But Beecher will not be extinguished all of a sudden. Our country cousins, when they come to town, will flock to hear him still. He will continue to be reported in the newspapers. But that his congregation, as now constituted, will finally break up, is not to be doubted. Beecher, as a power, will wane. As a curiosity he will continue to draw as long as he lives."—Herald.

MORE FOOLS.—Joseph Curry, who says he is Christ, and not long ago was driven out of Georgia for forming a free-love colony, has started a new religious society in Springfield, Mass. A negress is worshiped by him and his few followers as queen of earth and heaven. He and this woman now represent themselves as fasting forty days and forty nights, and they have nearly starved themselves in a rigorous observance of the right. They are terribly emaciated, and so weak they can hardly walk. Curry says that at the end of forty days they will be transported to heaven in a chariot of fire. We hope they'll go.

A RUMOR prevails that Henry Ward Beecher will take up his residence in Florida when the great trial which now convulses himself and the country is ended. He has bought an orange plantation in Florida, adjoining his sister Harriet's place, and he has an agent there arranging things in the very best Beecher order for his reception. There he expects to catch the delicious scent of orange and lemon groves on the balmy breezes, recuperate his worried mind, and select for the future wiser and better companions. It is thought Henry's financier, the amiable Mrs. Beecher, will see that Elizabeth does not go along.

ALL HEARSAY EVIDENCE.—"I say Mr. Smithers," said Mrs. Smithers to her husband: "didn't I hear you down in the kitchen kissing the cook?" "My dear," replied Smithers, blandly, "permit me to insist upon my right to be reasonably ignorant, I really cannot say what you may have heard." "But wasn't you down there kissing the cook?" "My dear, I really cannot recollect, I only remember going into the kitchen and coming out again. I may have been there, and from what you say, I infer I was. But I cannot recollect just what occurred." "But," persisted the ruthless cross-examiner, "what did Jane mean when she said, 'Oh! Smithers, don't kiss so loud, or the old she-dragon up stairs will hear us?'" "Well," said Smithers, in his blandest tones, "I cannot remember what interpretation I did put on the words at the time. They are not my words, you must remember."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

THE TWENTIETH WEEK of the Brooklyn Clerical Adultery Trial has, as we go to press, reached its close. The testimony is all in, and the lawyers have commenced summing up. Ex-Judge Porter has for three days been making herculean efforts to earn the $10,000 he is said to have for the part he takes in the trial. That he is a man of eloquence, cannot be denied; and that, like most other lawyers, he is able to make the worse appear the better side, is also true. He paints Beecher the greatest saint alive, and Tilton the most depraved villain. He argues that, because Beecher is an eminent divine, a talented Christian preacher, that it is very improbable he could have committed adultery with a ewe lamb of his fold. There is a peculiar coolness in this argument. If there has been one such case in this country there has been five thousand. The poor innocent shepherds to be sure! In speaking of Tilton, Judge Porter says: "If there be a beast upon earth capable of holding a conversation about the parentage of his own boy with the paramour of his own adulterous wife, he has lived too long upon earth; it is time for him to die." There is of course, two sides to this question. In the language of the Sun it may be stated thus: If there be a beast on earth capable of debauching the wife of his friend and disciple, under pretense of praying with her and fortifying her soul with pious admonition; then, to save himself, accusing her of falling in love with him, and lying, when she called their intercourse adultery; afterwards defaming her husband for the same cowardly purpose; and again, charging with perjury the friend and the friend's wife to whom he confided, with tears and agony of pretended repentance, the secret of his infamous crime—all in order that he might himself escape due punishment and infamy at their expense; if such a beast exists, he has lived too long; it is time for him to die." The cruelest feature in this whole Beecher business is, that the reputation of so many good people must be blackened; that Henry Ward Beecher should shine with a false whiteness. "Even this shall pass away." By the time our next number issues, the trial will probably be completed.

The Pro and Con of Supernatural Religion; or,

An Answer to the Question: Have We a Supernaturally Revealed, Infallibly Inspired and Miraculously Attested Religion in the World?

BY E. E. GUILD.

PREFACE.—Whenever an opinion or institution which has long been held to be sacred, is attacked, the prejudices of their adherents will of course be shocked. This proves nothing either for or against the opinion or institution. The same shock is experienced by the Egyptian when he hears the sacredness of leeks and onions, cats and other animals questioned. Also by the Hindoo, when the divinity of his idols is disputed. And by the Mohammedans, when the authority of the Koran is denied. For ages mankind have revered, venerated and held sacred three great idols—the Priesthood, the Bible and the Church. The first has been regarded as the authorized instructor of the people in knowledge, wisdom and virtue; the second as the ultimate standard of appeal to settle all differences of opinion; the last as a secure shelter from the wrath of an incensed Deity and the evil influence of a semi-omnipotent Devil, who disputes with the Almighty the supremacy of the Universe. These are monstrous errors, degrading and pernicious in their influence. One design of this work is to expose them.

Although the Priesthood of the present day profess to be the friends of education, they are so only in so far as they can control it. There is a certain kind of information which, to the extent of their ability, they keep from the knowledge of the people. This work is intended to impart to them that very knowledge. The writer does not believe that ignorance is the mother of true devotion, nor that it is a good soil for the growth of true religion. Nor does he believe with Eusebius that falsehood is good as a medicine for the mind, nor that in order to benefit the people it is necessary to deceive them. He does not endorse the sentiment of Gregory, surnamed "The Divine," who says, "a little jargon is all that is necessary to impose on the people," nor that of Synecius, a bishop of the Church, whose opinion was that "the people are desirous of being deceived." And although he said that "to himself he should always be a philosopher, but, in dealing with the mass of mankind, he should be a priest," we say it is the duty of every man who assumes the office of a public instructor, to be not only a philosopher to himself, but to the people also, and to make philosophers of them too if he can. We do not believe that there is anything true about religion that the people ought not to know, nor anything false that it is expedient for them to believe. If the people are perishing at all, it is for the lack of knowledge and for proper direction of the faculties and powers which the God of Nature has bestowed upon them.

The present inhabitants of the world number 1,288,000,000 souls; one-quarter of these are nominal Christians. If we allow that one in four of these are actual professors, the number will be 80,500,000. Can the idea be entertained for a moment that for a period of near 6,000 years God has been endeavoring, by the most stupendous miracles, to establish a religion in the world, on the belief of which hang suspended the eternal interests of mankind, and that belief in it is confined to only a small remnant of our race? Is it not a much better, broader, more charitable view, one more honoring to God, and more satisfactory to believe, that all forms of religion contain some truth and some error, and that it is a perfectly lawful and legitimate business to separate the one from the other?

To this work these pages are dedicated as an assistant. May they be effectual in accomplishing this design. The position defended by the author is, that there is no true religion except what is perfectly natural to man; and that whatever else is so called, is a delusion and a snare. The great objection urged against this view is, that "without supernatural revelation, we could know nothing about God, or our relations to him, nor of our duty to him and our fellow-men." This comes with an ill grace from those who accept as infallible an authority which flatly contradicts them. The Bible teaches that "the heavens declare the glory of God, that the invisible things of him, from the creation of the world, are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made." Paul quoted the testimony of a heathen poet to prove that mankind are the children of God, and he asserted that the Gentiles who had not the law, but were a law unto themselves, did by nature the things contained in the law, their consciences accusing or excusing one another. Jesus, addressing the multitude, says, "why even of yourselves judge ye not what is right?" implying an ability on their part to distinguish between right and wrong. But what can be expected of men who have been educated to think that investigation and the use of their reason are wrong, and put in jeopardy their eternal interest? What men need is to have the mental crutches on which they have been leaning removed; to be taught to rely on themselves, and "stand up and show themselves men." No greater evil exists in human society than a superstition which makes mental and moral slaves of men, drowning reason in fanaticism, and making men fear to use legitimately the powers and faculties which the God of Nature has bestowed upon them.

This work is designed to impress the minds of men, not by addressing their love of the mysterious and wonderful, but by appeals to those powers of the mind with whose dictates the views herein presented are in perfect harmony. The religious world is in a state of transition, consequent on which there is great commotion and apparent confusion. The same state of things existed soon after the breaking out of the Protestant Reformation, in view of which some timid men like Melancthon and Erasmus, threatened to abandon the cause and go back to the Mother Church. We have the same class of timid souls now. They fear that free investigation will unsettle the very foundations of religious belief, and leave men without any religion at all. But men of strong faith know better. The number of brave, free-born minds is very greatly on the increase. They do not fail to lay the axe at the root of the tree, to strike at the very foundation of superstition, bigotry and intolerance. They realize that the present commotion cannot always continue; that the storm will ultimately settle into a calm; and that when the strife is over, on surveying the situation, it will be found a very great advance has been made in religious thought and ideas.

PART I.

A brief history of the four great Religions claiming a Supernatural Origin—Paganism, Judaism, Christianity and Mohammedanism.

Is Religion a special revelation from God to man? This is an important question. If the affirmative is true, it ought to be known and believed by all men. If the negative answer is the true one, the sooner the fact is made known to the world the better. In answer to the question, millions of voices will loudly exclaim Yes! On the other hand millions of men with equal confidence and emphasis will answer No! Both cannot be right. Both are ready to adduce arguments to justify their respective opinions. I propose at this time to array the arguments of the contending parties before you. I will give them an open field and fair play, and allow you to judge which comes off victor in the contest. Nearly all great battles are preceded by skirmishes—by the skirmish lines of the respective armies. And so, before I bring on the onset between the opposing arguments of the affirmative and negative, it will be necessary in order that you may have a clear view of the battle to clear the field by stating a few preliminaries.

By supernatural we understand an event, occurrence, or phenomenon, produced by a special, direct and miraculous act of Divine power.

By Nature, we mean the Universe, with all its varied physical, intellectual, and moral phenomena.

The four principal religions in the world claiming a supernatural origin are, the Pagan, Jewish, Christian and Mohammedan. Paganism was the religion of all the nations of the earth previous to the establishment of Judaism, and is now the religion of more than one half of mankind. We can trace its history backward into the darkness of remote ages when no human records were made. It is the most ancient, the most wide spread and has endured the longest of any religion in the world. Dr. Justin observes, that, "It was the religion of the greatest, the wisest, and the politest nations, of the Chaldeans, Egyptians, and Phoenicians, the parents of civil government, and of arts and sciences." It held its power over the minds of men until a century of the time of Christ, at which period it began to wane. At the time of the appearance of Christ universal skepticism prevailed throughout all Greece and Rome, among all their poets, philosophers, statesmen, and priests. The forms however were kept up, and the common people who were sunk in ignorance still continued to adhere to it. In this they were encouraged by their educated men and priests, among whom it was a maxim, that, there were many things true in religion which it was not convenient for the vulgar to know; and some things, which, though false, it was expedient for them to believe. Those who should have been the instructors of the people were their deceivers. Hence, two kinds of philosophy and religion were taught by them; the Esoteric and Exoteric, the first to be taught to the educated, the other to the masses of the uneducated people.

Judaism has existed over three thousand years. It was the religion of one nation only, and that comparatively small and inhabiting only a small portion of the earth. It is a very prevalent opinion in our day that the Jews throughout their whole history have maintained a steady and uniform faith in their religion. This is a very great mistake. Unbelievers were by no means uncommon among them. They had their Paines and Voltaires as well as we. At a very early period after the establishment of their religion by Moses, Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, "and two hundred and fifty princes of the assembly, famous in the congregation, men of renown," rose up in rebellion against him, and disputed his right to exercise authority over them. It is impossible to account for this fact only on the supposition that these men had no faith in the Divine appointment and authority of Moses. Reason asserted itself in the minds of these dissenters; but its voice was silenced by the popular clamor, and Korah and his company were sacrificed to the fury of their more credulous and practical countrymen. Aaron, a brother of Moses, and the first priest of the new religion, and his wife Miriam, rebelled against Moses, claiming that he had no superiority over them as a teacher of the Lord.

The frequent murmurings and rebellions of the Jews against Moses, shows that their confidence in his divine authority was often shaken and sometimes well nigh abandoned. Absalom, too, rebelled against his own father David, and sought to supplant him on the throne, and he had many adherents. Solomon apostatized from the religion of his fathers, and adopted that of the Pagans. After the death of Solomon, ten of the Hebrew tribe set up a kingdom of their own, renounced Judaism and embraced and practiced Paganism. This continued for a period of two hundred and fifty years. In the mean time, the kingdom of Judah vascilated between the two religions, sometimes practicing the one, then the other. During the reigns of Hezekiah, and Josiah, Judaism was revived and flourished for a short time, but soon sank again with the fall of the nation. It is now well nigh extinct; a great majority of the Jews of the present day no longer regard it as a supernatural religion. At that time, and long before the appearance of Christ, the Jews were divided into different sects, much skepticism prevailed, and some of it was tolerated. The Essenes discarded all forms and ceremonies, and utterly denied the authority of the letter of the Jewish sacred books. The Samaritans and Sadducees denied the inspiration of all the books of the Old Testament, except the Pentateuch; and the latter had no faith in a future state of existence. And yet, Sadducees, and Pharisees, alike sat in Moses' seat and filled the office of the great High Priest of the Jewish religion.

Christianity, has existed over eighteen and a half centuries. It is intimately connected with Judaism, but has been made to supersede it. Judaism, however, might be true even although Christianity should be proved false. But if Judaism is proved false it would shake Christianity to its very center. The first converts to Christianity were from the "common people." To this class Christ chiefly confined his teaching, and with them he mainly associated. He exposed the rottenness and corruption of the Jewish Church, and the hypocrisy of its priesthood and other Church dignitaries and members. This was very pleasing to a class of people who were treated with scorn and contempt by the Church, and made him an acceptable teacher among them. The new religion was accepted in Greece, and Rome, for a similar reason. It exposed the frauds and impositions of the Pagan priests, and inculcated the exercise of a spirit of good will even to those who were in the lower ranks of life. The Pagan philosophers, seeing in it a system of pure Theism, which was then the prevalent belief among them, and, admiring its beautiful system of moral ethics did not discourage its reception, but rather encouraged it, and some of them embraced it. Some of these converts, however, denied its supernatural origin, and wrote against it. Porphyry, a Platonist, who lived in the very midst of Christians of the second century, and who accepted the moral teachings of Christianity, nevertheless wrote a book to disprove its miraculous origin. So also, did Celsus, and Julian, one of the Roman Emperors, who once professed it, afterwards renounced it. For this, these men were branded as apostates and Infidels. Under Constantine, Christianity became the religion of the Roman empire, established by law. It soon became corrupted, and in this corrupted form held sway over the public mind of Europe and other countries all through the Dark Ages. On the revival of learning, skepticism began to make its appearance again. It increased more and more in proportion as the arts and sciences flourished, and as progress was made in education and civilization. As the science of the laws and phenomena of Nature were made known to men, they became sceptical in regard to the supernatural and miraculous, and that skepticism they applied to Christianity. At the present time a wide spread unbelief in all supernatural occurrences and events pervades the minds of all ranks, classes, and conditions of men. It has gained an entrance into the Church itself, and many of its clergymen and laymen join with men of literature, learning and science, in utterly repudiating the idea that there ever was, is now, or ever will be any interruption of, or interference with the steady, uniform, and uninterrupted operation of Nature and her laws; and also, in the belief that we must have a religious system based on scientific facts, and not on the mere dreams and visions of visionary men.

Mohammedanism, originated in the seventh century of the Christian era. It was designed not to supersede Christianity, nor Judaism, but to supplement both. According to Mahomet, Christ undertook to make men religious by preaching a doctrine of love, and failed. He was commissioned of God to propagate religion by fire and sword, to convert men by force of arms. Mohammedanism spread with astonishing rapidity. It was established in Arabia, Turkey, Persia, and among several nations in Africa and India. It was planted in the sacred land trodden by the feet of Christ and his Apostles, and supplanted Christianity on its own soil. Mahomet had as many, if not more followers than Christ, and although his religion is six hundred years younger than Christianity, yet there are more real Mohammedans than there are real Christians.

All four of these religions claim a heavenly origin in a special and direct sense. They do not mutually exclude each other. Judaism, it is true, denies the claims of all the rest, Christianity admits the claims of Judaism, but denies the pretence of the other two; whereas Paganism admits the supernatural origin of them all, and claims only that it is the purest and best of them all.

In this country the popular opinion is that the religions of Paganism, and Mohammedanism, are spurious and false; but that the claims of Judaism, and Christianity, are based on an impregnable foundation of truth. On the other hand a large and respectable minority of our citizens deny the claims of each one of them. It is only with the assumption of Judaism, and Christianity, that we have now to do. Those who accept these religions as supernatural revelations from God, do so on the authority of the Hebrew, and Christian Bibles, which they claim constitute an infallible standard of religious truth. Everything here, then, depends on the truth or falsity of the assumption in regard to that book. The question is: Is the Bible a special, direct, supernatural, and infallible revelation? The skirmish is now over, and the battle of opposing arguments begins. Let us examine with carefulness and candor what the disputants have to offer.

PART II.

Reviews of the Arguments in favor of Supernatural Religion.

1. On the affirmative it is urged that "a revelation from God is possible." This we do not dispute. What we deny is that the fact of a thing being possible with God proves that the thing has been or will be done. God has power to do many things that he does not do. If I were to say that God has power to make all his creatures happy, therefore, all are, or will be happy, many of the advocates of the Bible would see the fallacy of such reasoning. But the argument is just as good as this for the Bible.

2. "A revelation from God is desirable." To this we reply. First, that the fact of a thing being desirable is no proof that the desire will be gratified. Men have a thousand desires that are not granted. There are no desires more universal among men than the desire to live and be happy; and yet men die and are not perfectly happy. The argument in favor of universal salvation, founded on the universal desire of happiness, is just as good as this for the Bible. Second, however desirable it may be to have a revelation from God, that fact does not prove that the revelation would be in book form, nor that the Bible is that book. We have a number of books claiming to be revelations, and the argument is just as good in favor of each one of them as it is for the Bible. Besides, a book revelation would not be adapted to satisfy the desires of only a small portion of those who have lived in the past, inasmuch, as not more than one quarter of them could read it.

3. "A revelation from God is necessary." Necessary for what? "To teach us the existence of God, of a future state of being, and the principles of morality and virtue," we are told. But all these were known and taught by men who never saw or heard of the Bible. If a revelation was necessary at all, it was just as necessary for one man as another, for one nation as another. But nearly all knowledge of the Bible was for thousands of years confined to a very small minority of the human race. The believers in several books claiming to be revelations, may plead in favor of each the necessity of it, with as much propriety and force as that plea is made for the Bible.

4. "The truths contained in the Bible prove it to be a revelation." So think the believers in other books called revelations, and the argument is equally conclusive for each. But is every book a revelation that contains truth? Then the world is full of revelations. Common sense teaches us that a book that teaches truth is not necessarily a revelation, else Daboll's arithmetic is as perfect a revelation as God ever made.

5. "The wonderful Prophecies contained in the Bible are conclusive in proof of its divine origin." Most of the biblical prophecies are general in their nature, based on the idea of retribution, and consisting of promises to the Jews, of prosperity if they were obedient, and warnings of calamity in case of disobedience. It is the easiest thing in the world to make predictions in this way, and to have them verified to the very letter. True prophecies, also, may be based on our knowledge of the history of the past, of the laws of nature, and the law of cause and effect. If I were to predict that one hundred years from this time there would be wars and rumors of wars, that mankind would marry and be given in marriage, that murders would be committed, that there would be storms, tempests and earthquakes, the prediction would undoubtedly be verified in due time. Many of the so-called prophecies are couched in vague, indefinite and obscure language. So much is this the case, that they are susceptible of a great variety of interpretations and applications, and have actually been applied in a hundred different ways. Nothing is more obscure in the Bible than its supposed prophecies. No argument based on them is therefore of any force. Besides, we have outside of the Bible many prophecies more definite, positive, unmistakable and better authenticated than any in it. It is generally supposed that the Old Testament contains a number of prophecies which relate to Jesus Christ. I hesitate not to say that there is not one that can be proved to have any relation to him whatever.

6. "The extraordinary miracles recorded in the Bible prove its divinity." Is every book that contains a record of miracles a divine book? If so, then the Koran, the sacred book of the Hindoos, Gulliver's Travels, the Arabian Nights Entertainment, and Jack the Giant-Killer must be divine. If these alleged miracles could be proved, the argument based on them would have force. But they have never been proved. The authenticity of the historical portions of the Bible has not been proved, and to undertake to prove the miracles by the Bible, and then the Bible by the miracles, is only reasoning in a circle, a mode of reasoning which no honest, intelligent man will adopt.

7. "The good influence of the Bible in the world shows that it came from God." That the influence of the Bible, both for good and evil, has been very great is true. Its good influence we attribute to the good that we admit it contains. Its bad effects we charge not so much to its errors as to the belief in its infallibility. Were it not for this belief, its errors would long since have been discarded and all its good retained, without being to a great extent neutralized by its errors and this pernicious belief. Besides, the fact that a book has exerted a powerful influence in the world, is very far from proving that it is a book of God. The influence of the Bible has scarcely been greater than that of the Koran, the Veda, or the Shaster, but none of these are God's book. The Bible alone is not a successful civilizer nor moralizer of men. We have been trying the experiment for years. We have sent our Bibles and missionaries into every barbarous and semi-barbarous nation. We have given them a surfeit of each. At last the discovery has been made that the arts are as efficacious civilizers as the Bible. It is true the Bible and civilization in modern times have accompanied each other. But in ancient times civilization existed in places where the Bible was unknown, and, indeed, before it had an existence. It is also true that in countries the most civilized, there we find the greatest number of unbelievers in the infallibility of the Bible. Civilization is to a great extent a matter of climate, race, circumstances and condition. The inferior races of men, and the inhabitants of the torrid and frigid zones never attain to the same degree of civilization as those who live in more temperate climates.

8. "The character of the men who wrote the Bible proves it to be an inspired book. They were evidently honest men, and they claim to have been inspired. If we say they were not, we accuse honest men of attempting to deceive." We answer, 1. Only a few of the writers claim to have been inspired as writers. None of the writers of the New Testament make this claim except the author of the book of Revelations. Neither Matthew, Mark, Luke, John, Peter, James, nor Paul claimed any authority from God or Christ to write what they did. 2. It is quite possible for honest men to suppose themselves to be inspired when they are not. Past history furnishes numerous examples of this kind. To question their inspiration is not to question their honesty. 3. We know nothing about the character of the biblical writers, for we do not know who they were. This we shall show in the proper place.

9. "The numerous persons who have laid down their lives and become martyrs in the cause of the Bible, is an evidence in its favor." If all the men in the world should lay down their lives to defend a falsehood, it would not make the falsehood true. Every form of religion has had its martyrs, and almost every sect in Christendom has had them too. If the argument from martyrdom proves anything, it proves that all forms of religion are true, and that every sect in the world is right. The argument proves too much, and is, therefore, good for nothing. Martyrdom proves only the honesty of the martyr, and honest men are often mistaken.

10. "The fact that the Bible is accepted by so many learned, wise and good men is much in its favor." This argument, like the preceding, proves too much. Many as good men as any have accepted the Bibles of other religions. Some as good as the best have rejected the claims to a supernatural origin of them all. Of course they could not all be right, therefore their respective beliefs prove nothing in regard to the truth or falsity of their belief.

11. "The steady and tenacious belief of the Jews in the Old Testament, and of Christians in both the Old and New Testaments, cannot be accounted for except on the supposition that the events recorded in them actually occurred." 1. Here again the argument proves too much. How came the Greeks and Romans and other Pagan nations to believe in the wonders and prodigies recorded in their mythology? or the Hindoos to believe in the Veda, and the Mohammedans in the Koran? It is just as easy to account for the belief of one as the other. 2. We have seen that there never was a uniform and universal belief among the Jews, in the divine origin of their sacred books. Throughout the whole period of their history unbelievers were found among them, and at times a majority of the nation were so. The same is true of the belief in the New Testament. At a very early period after the compilation of that book, its authority was questioned, has been questioned ever since, and is being questioned more and more.

12. "The fact that a belief in the Bible enables its possessor to die in peace, and in the comforting assurance of a blissful immortality evinces its divine origin." 1. The argument proves too much again. How dies the moral man of every form of religion and of every sect? Is it not with the same calmness and peace, and the same comforting hopes? Does this prove that they are all right in their belief? Certainly not, but only that they are honest in their belief. The manner of one's death is no test of the truth or falsity of his opinions, but only of the sincerity of the dying man, and the strength of his convictions. Some of the greatest skeptics have met death with as much courage, calmness and peace as was ever manifested by the strongest believers in the Bible. 2. Nor is it true that believers in the Bible always die in peace. Instances are not wanting of their dying in the agonies of utter despair. The manner of one's death depends very much on the temperament, disposition and organization of the individual, the nature of his disease, and whether he is naturally courageous and hopeful or timid and fearful.

"Even This shall Pass Away."

[The following exquisite lines have been before published, but will be new to most of our readers. They were written, as will be seen, by one whose name has been much before the public of late, but we trust, nevertheless, due credit will be rendered for the truthfulness and beauty of expression here so perceptible:]

THE KING'S RING.

BY THEODORE TILTON.

Once in Persia reigned a king,
Who upon his signet-ring
Graved a maxim true and wise,
Which, if held before his eyes,
Gave him counsel, at a glance,
Fit for every change and chance;
Solemn words, and these are they:
"Even this shall pass away!"

Trains of camels through the sand
Brought him gems from Samarcand;
Fleets of galleys through the seas
Brought him pearls to match with these.
But he counted not as gain
Treasures of the mine or main;
"What is wealth?" the king would say,
"Even this shall pass away."

In the revels of his court,
At the zenith of the sport,
When the palms of all his guests,
Burned with clapping at his jests,
He, amid his figs and wine,
Cried, "O, loving friends of mine!
Pleasure comes, but not to stay:
'Even this shall pass away.'

Lady fairest ever seen
Chose he for his bride and queen.
Couched upon the marriage bed,
Whispering to his soul, he said,
"Though a bridegroom never pressed
Dearer bosom to his breast,
Mortal flesh must come to clay:
'Even this shall pass away.'

Fighting on a furious field,
Once a javelin pierced his shield.
Soldiers with a loud lament,
Bore him bleeding to his tent.
Groaning from his tortured side,
"Pain is hard to bear," he cried;
"But with patience, day by day,
'Even this shall pass away.'

Towering in the public square,
Twenty cubits in the air,
Rose his statue carved in stone.
Then the king, disguised, unknown,
Stood before his sculptured name,
Musing meekly, "What is fame?
Fame is but a slow decay:
'Even this shall pass away.'

Struck with palsy, sere and old,
Waiting at the gates of Gold,
Spoke he with his dying breath,
"Life is done; but what is death?"
Then in answer to the king
Fell a sunbeam on his ring, Showing by a heavenly ray—
"Even this shall pass away."

A new source of caoutchouc has been discovered in Burmah, in a creeping plant whose botanical name is Chavamesia esculenta. The plant is very common in Burmese forests, and is cultivated by the natives for the sake of its fruit, which is said to have an agreeable acid taste, and to mature at a season when tamarinds are scarce.

The Truth Seeker,

A JOURNAL OF REFORM AND FREE THOUGHT.

D. M. BENNETT, Editor and Prop'r.
No. 335 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

THE WITCH OF THE WINE MARK, the pleasing story of witchcraft times in New England, was completed in our last number. We trust our readers were edified and amused with its perusal. In its place we commence in this number THE PRO AND CON OF SUPERNATURAL RELIGION, (a work of medium proportions,) by E. E. GUILD, an ex-clergyman. The arguments he uses are sound, cogent, conclusive and well expressed. We bespeak for them the careful perusal of all our readers.

Another Blast from Elder Shelton.

This doughty defender of the old flood story has favored us with another of his luminous epistles. We hesitated some before cumbering our columns with such senseless twaddle, fearing our readers will not thank us for intellectual pabulum of so low a grade; but the Elder, doubtless, likes to be heard, and we will humor him this once more.

If regrets were availing, we would indulge in sorrow that this man of great faith should be so deficient in civility and common courtesy, and should employ expressions gentlemen never use. We do not care very much about his calling us "a dirty fellow;" his calling us so does not make us so; nor we cannot see with what propriety he gives us such an appellation. We bathe pretty often, and do not grovel in filth or dirt. Does the good Elder think we are "dirty" because we cannot come to the same absurd conclusions he does? We imagine he and his foul names are hardly worth minding. We remember, when a boy, of passing through a farm-yard, when an old gander pursued us, and hissed at us fearfully. We, of course, felt insulted, and wished to be revenged. We soon, however, regained our equanimity and remarked to ourselves, "don't mind him, he is only a goose." The same remark is appropriate in this case. Since our boyhood we have met more than one insolent goose, but we try not to be annoyed at their hissing.

Now listen to what our amiable and intellectual Elder has to say. We render him verbatim et literatim et spellatim:

BROOKSVILLE, BLOUNT CO., ALA., May 7th, 1875.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Sir:—I received one of your so-called Truth seekers, or more properly, one of your, Falsehood Depositorys, in which you have in vain, tried to answer the flood question.

First you complain of my bad grammar, I will say to you that it is good enough for Infidels to read, and no Christian will complain against it. You have also accused us of 'lieing,' but the beauty of it is you have not shown that it is so. The fact of the thing is, Mr. Editor you are a kind of a dirty fellow any how, and you are not the first dirty fellow I ever got hold of. I come in contact with one of your sort a few years back, and in our debate which lasted two days, he got so mad he swore by the seven Stars and every thing else he could think of. He showed his Ignorance and want of truth and veracity to the whole audience. But Sir, he did not go so far in folly, and madness, as you have gone, in trying to answer my truths which is founded on the Bible, Science, and Philosophy. I thought at the start; you would get mad, but did not think that you would betray your Ignorance so far as to Blaspheme against the Holy Gohst, in comparing poor old Beecher to the Holy Gohst, and accusing the God of Heaven of Whoredoms. Sir, by this you have brought upon yourself the Contempt of all Christians who read it, and even the Just Censure of all moderate Infidels that read your Paper. This shows at once the Viper blood, that is in you, and shows too, the deep seated malice, and hatred, you have against the Christian, and that you are not actuated by the love of Truth as you hypocritically contend. And my private opinion, is, Mr. Editor that you have been a Preacher in your young days among some of the Orthodox Christian denominations, and probably have been turned out for some unchristian act, and then turned around with a malicious heart, and try to wage a war of extermination against the poor Christians. If it is not so in your case, it has been so in many cases.

Second, we called on the Editor in our last Article to prove by indubitable witness, or evidences, that there has been upheavals in the Earth on the continent of America, since the flood. The Editors pitiful excuse is, that the man is dead that knew about it. 'yes' and the next time you hear a puffing Infidel talking about those upheavals in the Earth, the Witnesses will be dead again. The fact is if the Editor would receive the Bible declaration, about the great deep being broken up he would understand how it is that the different Stratas of Sandstone and Lime, are mixed up together in a conglomerated mass in certain Localities, and if he could believe that it rained 40 days and nights as the Bible states he could have told how that ridge which H. Scott, lives on in Blount Co., was formed some 40 feet above a Strata of Soil, Timber &c he could see that the 40 days rain would make a flood sufficient to wash the dirt and gravel from a high ridge, close by and from this small ridge, above this soil and timber, but he has entirely failed to give us any thing, but his bare assertions and when called on to prove them stated that the witnesses are dead. The fact is the Editor is driven to his last shifts, and to the wall, so much so that he became extremely absent minded in trying to answer our last Article, and got entirely out of soap and Tallow too, and went to planting Cucumber Seeds, and turning bed bugs into frogs. I laughed; when I saw the poor old grey headed Editor engaged in turning bedbugs into frogs, but from what I see of the Truth Seeker he had as well go on with the Bedbug business, and if the Editor lacks a supply of the little Pesky Creatures, we will send him some from Alabama by Express clear of freight charges. The People of Alabama would not care if he would turn all their bedbugs into frogs. Thirdly, after the frog matter, he tries to gass us Considerably, he is silly enough to try to make us believe that the Rocky and other Large Mountains, have been upheaved or formed from the force of Gass beneath. Now a man that would resort to such pitiful Subterfuges, in order to get rid of Bible truths, the Devil ought to get him, and then he would get Gass enough, but it would be Sulphuric Gass. Now Sir, as little as you think of it I have read Volumes of illustrious scientific works from noble minded and generous hearted Philosophers and Scientists, but none of them will agree with you in your Gass Theory. There is none but a few poisoned hearted Infidel writers that Claim Such a Theory. I wish Sir you would give me one hundred Dollars for every acknowledged Scientific man that will say that the Bible and Science is in Harmony with each other, and go hand in hand. I would be willing to give you a hundred Dollars for every one to The Contrary. The Bible itself is full of Science; for instance, David in one of his Psalms calls the world the round world and bids it to rejoice. Job says he maketh the weight for the wind Job was Scientific, and understood that the air had weight, and again he says, He stretcheth out the North over the Empty place, and hangeth the Earth upon nothing.

Solomon Says, all the Rivers run into the Sea; yet the Sea is not full; unto the place from whence the Rivers come, thither they return again. Then Sir there is a grander and more Sublime Science taught in the Bible, and that is the Science of mans Salvation. You told us a great tale about a traveller from Japan and China, how honest they were and how fine they were getting along in Infidelity; you will have to prove to me, that man was a truthful man, before I will have it. But in order to prove to you that he Lied, I will take you to some Large Seaport Town, and I will Show you a Japann or Chinaman Water Craft, or trading vessel, I will bring it along side of an American or European Ship of trade, and draw the contrast and say here is Infidel or heathen, and here is Christian, here is Bible, here is Science, and the blessings of civil and religious Institutions, it would compare about as favorable as a small Bird Trap, set up by the side of a fine mansion. Then go with one to the interior of Africa where they eat Snails and Bugs and also among the tribes of Indians and then turn to the Bible and Christian lands, and see the difference. Sir all the elevation and refinement you have about you, you owe it all to the Bible. Sir we do not displace the God of the Universe as you say about us, for a Jewish God, but we worship the great Jehovah or Creator of the Universe, who rules and governs all things, he is the first great Cause of all things, we prove this from Revelation, but you have no Revelation to back your blind Ideas, and in your blindness suppose an impossible thing, and that is that the Universe was always in existence. Sir I thought I had an opponent when I commenced correspondence with you, but unless you give me something better than Gass, Cucumbers, Bedbugs, and Frogs, you had better turn the matter over to some of your brother Infidels. I have written this Article as short and condensed as the subject will allow. You Can answer it if you see proper, if you do, dont waste so much Ink and Paper in trying to answer it, but I suppose the Ink and Paper is your own property and the Columns of your paper had as well be filled with that as anything Else.

ELD. J. C. SHELTON.

REMARKS. We have heard of people who knew so little that they did not know when they were whipped, and we think Elder Shelton is one of them. After we pointed out explicitly a baker's dozen of his falsehoods, uttered in his last article, and proved them to be positively false, he now exultingly says, "the beauty of it is you have not shown it is so." He reminds us of the fellow that stole a sheep, and after he and his family had eaten the flesh, the pelt, or hide, was found at his house and identified. When arrested for sheep stealing he chuckled and said: "Aha! you found the pelt, but the beauty of it is you didn't find the mut-ton!"

The Elder informs us he met a man in debate a few years since. He fails to tell us what the subject was, but we are left to infer the other fellow came off second best, for the Elder made him swear by the seven stars and a good many other things. The Elder ought to have told us what the fellow got mad at. Possibly it was at the Elder's suavity and good-breeding. We fear the unfortunate man did not have our early experience with the goose. If this man was the equal of Elder Shelton what a pair of intellectual giants they must have been! We would willingly perform a "Sabbath day's journey" to see such brave knights measure their steel. Just think of it! For two whole days these mental gladiators astonished and electrified their audience. Great as this unknown man must have been to go through what he did, it is perhaps not strange that his mind gave way at last, and he swore by the seven stars. Possibly he thought the Elder was seven giants in one. We are pleased that while this opponent must have been great, the Elder thinks he did not equal us in some points.

We are more pleased with this compliment than with the following one, that he thinks we have at some time been a preacher in an orthodox church. We really can't take that as much of a compliment; and notice how he puts it. After calling us a "dirty fellow," after accusing us of blasphemy, hypocrisy, and falsehood, he comes to the conclusion that we were once a preacher. It seems, then, the Elder thinks these qualities go together. If it is so we deem him more correct in this than in most of his other positions.

We wish to disabuse the Elder's mind, as well as to vindicate our character. We may have had our faults; we may have erred on the right hand and on the left; we are poor, and have some poor relations, but thanks to our stars, or some other good influence, we have never yet got so low as to be a preacher. We have never taken money from simple-minded and mistaken people under the pretense of dispensing to them the bread of life, of interceding for them at the throne of Deity and pretending to know more about God and the Devil and the future world than they did. No, no, we have never been a preacher! We have been a son of toil. The little money we have been able to get possessed of has been honestly procured. We have been conscientiously opposed to taking something for nothing, and have meant to tell the truth; hence we could not have been an orthodox preacher, and would not be one, were we to live a dozen lives. Neither have we ever been expelled from any church, society or association. The Elder will have to try again.

Equally at fault is the Elder when he sees us a "poor, grey-headed old man." We are not poor in flesh, and have as much on our bones as we find convenient or useful. We do not know that we have a grey hair in our head, but if it was all grey, it would be no disgrace. Neither are we quite as old as Methuselah was said to be. While we are fully as old as we ever were, we have seen the time when we were as young as anybody. We mention these small points to show the Elder how easy it is for him to be mistaken. In fact, we think him mistaken in nearly every instance.

The Elder seems rather pleased with our allusion to the bed-bug and frog, and just for his pleasure we are perfectly willing they should be incorporated into the flood story, so he can have the satisfaction of referring to them often, thinking about them, and believing in them. He suggests that we change all the bed-bugs into frogs. We beg to be excused. It is not in our line. We cheerfully refer him to his God and to Moses. They are said at one time to have been very extensively engaged in the frog making business; literally filling a large country with them, including the fields, houses, chambers, beds, ovens and kneading troughs. As the Elder is a man of prayer, and as he wishes the bed-bugs to be changed to frogs, if he will just ask his God to do the little job for him, possibly he may be gratified. Perhaps he would not like quite as many frogs as were produced on the occasion referred to, for it will be recollected old Pharaoh became very much annoyed with them and importuned Moses to kill them off, and that caused a terrible stench in the whole land. We think upon the whole, it will be better for the Elder to try and make out with what frogs he has down in Alabama, and if he is overrun with bed-bugs, to wash his bedsteads with soap-suds, and apply a solution of corrosive sublimate, mixed with spirits turpentine or kerosene. We assure him it is effectual, if thoroughly applied.

The Elder asserts we are "driven to our last shift." He is greatly mistaken; he is not half so powerful as he imagines he is. In the first place, we do not wear shifts, and have not for several years. If he means shirts, he is still wrong, for we are happy in assuring him we have half a dozen clean ones ahead. It has not always been so with us, but happens to be just now. He says, also, we are "entirely out of soap and tallow." We don't know how he should be so well informed about our soap and tallow, unless he has been prying around our premises. So far as soap is concerned, he is mistaken; we have several pieces on hand, and never allow ourselves to get entirely out. Tallow we have very little use for, and keep no supply by us. By the elegant metaphors the Elder uses, we are led to infer that, in addition to preaching, he is engaged in the soap manufacture. If this is so, we think he ought to succeed in making large quantities if he can only procure the tallow, as he has lie enough to fill all emergencies.

The pious Elder seems a little horrified at our allusion to the third part of his deity or the third member of the firm—the trinity—and which it is, the world will never know), and says we have thereby brought upon ourselves the contempt of all Christians. That may be so, and it may not. If it is, it is wholly immaterial, for their contempt is so much beneath ours that no harm at all is done. We did not say anything about the God of Heaven committing whoredoms. We briefly alluded to a circumstance imperfectly described by Matthew and Luke, the only authorities we have upon the extraordinary subject. The former merely says, Mary "was found with child of the Holy Ghost," without telling us who found it, or describing the process by which the business was accomplished. Joseph is said to have dreamed it, and as the whole story rests upon what somebody dreamed, it is hardly worth while for the world to attach much importance to it, or for the Elder to be very much shocked if we briefly allude to it.

Luke does not inform us how the remarkable operation was performed, nor does he even say it was performed at all, but says that an angel appeared to Mary and told her the Holy Ghost should come upon her and the power of the Highest should overshadow her, but he fails to tell us whether this wonderful event ever did occur, so all that the Christian world has to build their stupendous edifice upon, of their human deity being begotten by God or the Holy Ghost rests upon what a man said Joseph dreamed, and a vision another man said a Jewish maiden had. Weak authority indeed! When an unmarried girl gives birth to a child in these days, it cannot be explained upon any such theory. Nobody would think a dream or a vision a sufficient basis for such an event. And even if the girl should claim she had been overshadowed by God, or that the Holy Ghost had "come upon her," nobody would believe her. They would sooner think some priest, with real body and organs like Parson Beecher or Elder Shelton had called upon her to administer comfort and consolation.

We have no reason to suppose Mary ever claimed anything so absurd, but that a century or two afterward, when the story and the system were fixed up, some unknown person wrote the tale about Mary's vision, and it has been attributed to Luke, and his book at the Nicene Council came near being rejected as uncanonical, being retained by a single vote. If the vote of that one priest had been cast the other way, or he had been absent, the book called Luke would not have formed a part of the Bible; the world would have known very little about the overshadowing business, and we would not necessarily have shocked Elder Shelton or the Christian world by referring to it.

There is an indefiniteness about this overshadowing business which is rather unsatisfactory to a person of an enquiring turn of mind, who wants to know what he believes and why he believes it. Physiologists and most well-informed persons understand that human beings, and animals too, are begotten through the agency of sexual organs, and they cannot conceive how the result can be produced in any other way. Is there any sense in supposing Jesus was begotten by a process entirely different from all other persons who have come into the world? If a natural father was needless in his case, why not a mother also? If the sexual organs were not employed, why would it not have answered just as well for the Holy Ghost to have overshadowed a wash-tub or a meal-bag? There is a mystery about this overshadowing matter, that believers and all others are entitled to have better explained.

The Elder certainly has no occasion to be horrified at our brief allusion to it. The idea is not originally Christian. It was borrowed entirely from the Pagans. The belief that God had sexual intercourse with women prevailed in the world many centuries before Christianity was invented. The idea was common in many nations, and Mary was by no means the first virgin said to be made pregnant by Deity. Christna was said to be begotten by God, and born of the virgin Devanagay a thousand years earlier than the story was revamped in reference to Mary and Jesus. Nearly in the same age of the world, Buddha was believed to have been divinely begotten of the virgin Mahamia. Alankee, the Genkiskan's grandmother, was held to have been impregnated when a virgin by divine influence, by a ray from heaven. The Greek mythology is also full of the stories of Gods and females cohabiting together, thus producing demi-gods. Mercury was the son of Jupiter and Maia, (almost Mary); Apollo, the son of Jupiter and Latona; Hercules, the son of Jupiter and Alcmena; Bacchus, the son of Jupiter and Semele; Proserpine, the offspring of Jupiter and Ceres, and she was afterwards carried off by Pluto, and gave birth to Vulcan. Juno was the daughter of Saturn and Ops and became the wife of Jupiter; Pallas was the daughter of Jupiter and Metis, though the monstrous fable has it that as soon as he discovered Metis was pregnant, he ate her up, and in consequence he conceived, and Pallas came forth ready armed from his brain. That she and all the rest of these offspring of gods came from somebody's brain, is very apparent. All these fables were believed in many centuries before Jesus or his Holy Ghost-father was thought of. It is needless to multiply these instances in heathen mythology of the gods cohabiting with females and producing offspring. The Titans, the Cyclops, the Heroes and the Giants were all descendents of the gods and women. It would be too tedious to mention them all, but the fact is fully assured and positive, that Christians have no patent for the sublime idea of a god holding sexual intercourse with a woman. They borrowed it, as we have seen, from the Pagans, as they did all others of their dogmas and creeds; and now such men as Elder Shelton are shocked if we allude to it, and they imagine we are sacrilegious and blasphemous to speak of such absurdities. They are not offended if we doubt the story of Christna, and Buddha, and Apollo, and Mercury, and Bacchus, and Æsculapius, and Hercules, and all those other cases which are much older, more original and more reasonable than their story, but are immensely shocked if we doubt their inspired tale about Mary and the Holy Ghost. We cannot, however, see much difference in the sanctity of these different deities and fables, and we speak of one with the same freedom we do of the other, and we have no fear of being smitten or punished in consequence. If Elder Shelton thinks he can influence any of these gods to visit us in their dire wrath for our temerity, let him go ahead and do his worst. If this is "viper blood," let it be so. It is only the truth. Vipers and snakes, however, have much to do with his religious belief and nothing with ours; so he probably has quite as much of the "viper blood" as we have.

The same veneration which the Christian feels towards his system, the Mahometan feels towards his, the Persian towards his, the Buddhist towards his, the Jew towards his and the Brahmin towards his. Even the deluded wretch who bows down to a crocodile, feels an amount of awe and veneration, and, like Elder Shelton, thinks a doubter or scoffer of his god ought to be smitten with vengeance most terrible. These devotees are all equally in the wrong—all deluded and mistaken, all equally superstitious; and we trust the light of science and truth will ere long shine in upon them and convince them of their darkness and error.

Apropos of the Holy Ghost, what does Elder Shelton know of him? We apprehend nothing. He does not even know how to spell his name correctly. He persists in spelling it G-o-l-i-s-t instead of G-h-o-s-t. If there is such a person, and Elder Shelton should be fortunate enough to ever come into his presence, we fancy the Ghost will serve a writ of ejectment upon him for bad orthography, and tell him to go back and attend spelling matches until he can learn to spell ghost correctly.

The Elder, by the by, has a "bad spell" upon him as to several words. He has made improvements upon Webster—at all events Webster disagrees with him. We notice he uses one more "s" in spelling gas than Webster uses, but that is nothing. He probably has the right to two or three esses in gas if he wishes to use them, and to put a capital at one or both ends if he pleases. He also has a right to suppose there is such a gas as sulphuric gas, and he may have found an account of it in some of the elaborate scientific volumes he boasts of having read; but ordinary scientists know nothing of such a gas. There is a sulphuric acid and a sulphurous acid, but they are different compounds. The first contains three equivalents of oxygen to one of sulphur, while the latter has but two of oxygen to one of sulphur. In the form of gas oxygen and sulphur do not combine in the proportions of three to one, but of two equivalents of oxygen to one of sulphur, and hence is sulphurous gas, and not sulphuric gas. In the nomenclature of chemistry the prefixes and suffixes have much to do in designating the exact constituency of the numerous compounds in existence. Of this Elder Shelton seems totally ignorant. Why should he not be?—there is nothing of it in the Bible. Let him remember the gas which he superstitiously supposes prevails in hell, and which he devoutly hopes we may some day have to breathe, is spelt with one "s"—not two nor three—and that a small "g" is usually thought to be big enough when writing it. We really hope before Elder Shelton is called upon to take that gas for a regular diet he will learn how to spell it and how to write it. So much for the Elder's gas.

We are not a little amused to hear the Elder quoting the Bible-scientists. He tries to make us think David knew the world was round because in Psalms lxxxviii in speaking of the terrors of God, it says: "They came round me daily like water, they encompassed me about together." This passage has reference to troubles and afflictions, and not the slightest allusion to the shape and form of the earth; and there is not the least certainty that David ever wrote a word of it. There is no authority for asserting he did. When King James' translators rendered the compilation of wild strains and extravagant invectives and cursings into English they labeled them the "Psalms of David," but, as we said, nobody knows that he wrote a word of them. Possibly he wrote some of them, where he wants his enemies cursed; but no Bible scholar thinks he wrote them all. In our opinion this "man after God's own heart" knew better how to be a brigand, and how to slaughter, rob and despoil neighboring nations, and how to obtain a poor man's wife with whom he had become enamored and wished for his own sensual gratification, by having her husband placed in the front of battle where he would be almost sure to be killed—we say he knew better how to do this, than to write psalms, or that the earth was a round ball. The ends of the world are often spoken of in the Bible, but never its rotundity. Abraham did not know the earth was round, Moses did not know it, David did not know it, Solomon did not know it, and Jesus did not know it. None of the apostles, none of the Christian Fathers, none of the martyrs, none of the saints, none of the popes, bishops, nor priests knew it till the sixteenth century. A ten years old child of this day knows more of this great truth than all those distinguished men combined.

Copernicus was the great mind who first made the grand discovery that the earth is round and revolves upon its own axis, and for giving utterance to this scientific truth the Christian Church persecuted him

Slipped Up Again!

Another Grand Fizzle—a Wreck of Matter and Crush of Worlds that didn't take place—the Lord failed to come to time!—and Adventism gone to seed.

BY JOHN SYPHERS.

Yes, Millerism and Adventism are dead at last. They died of a broken heart because the thing wouldn't work. They have set now four different times for Gabriel to blow! For the crack of doom to smash things, and introduce a little phenomena in the way of a wreck of matter and crush of worlds!

April 19th at midnight they had prepared themselves at Chicago, to go forth to meet the bridegroom. But the wedding did not come off. The bride, the lamb's wife did not appear. Gabe did toot his horn. Now I tell you that horn is no fool of a horn! Let's reason a little. If all the horns in the world was made into one horn, and all the men in the world was one man, and all the breath in the world was drawn into the lungs of that one man, he would not have enough to give that horn one toot—loud enough that all the world could hear it. They base all their reasoning and chronological figuring upon Daniel and the revelations of John. I guess that now they will begin to look upon these two great lights with open eyes, and declare that the light which they saw in them was all darkness, and oh how great that darkness! I myself, individually, discovered long ago that Daniel had the nightmare, and John the delirium tremens! They now begin to think as I do, that the man is a fool, who will throw his whole weight on, or risk a single cent on any old religious prophecy that has come down to us from the dark ages when those scriptures were written. These repeated failures and humiliations will all have their use. They will help each one a little to open the eyes of an ignorant world who have made an idol of an old religious book, and a God out of a Jewish house carpenter who once shoved the jack-plane in Judea.

These Adventists have worked themselves up into the silly belief that God has no better things in store for the souls of the dead, than to sleep in a nasty mud-hole called the grave, with the body, until Gabriel shall blow! I suppose when the body rots in the ground the soul will rot with it. What an idea, to think that the souls of spirits of all the nations of the dead, are at this moment down in the ground. They say they sleep there till the resurrection! I tell you they don't sleep, nor anything analogous to it. When a man sleeps, he is still alive, and draws his breath. Are they still alive in the grave? Have all the departed nations of the earth been buried alive? What fools men can make of themselves and never suspect it. But say they, we can quote lots of scripture to prove these things—the scriptures establish nothing. They never did establish anything but the sublime ignorance of those who wrote them, and the equal ignorance of those who have proclaimed them the very infallible words of a God. That book of books, as they call their idol, had much more properly be called the book of spooks! It is full of spooks and ghost stories from end to end. How much scripture did they quote in favor of American slavery?—yet scripture could not save it. It must stand or fall upon its merits, and not upon scripture. The more scripture you can bring to bear upon any subject, as a general rule, the less truth there is in it. The man who has no more sense than to teach that the salvation of a world in any way hinges upon that old Jewish book is not aware of just exactly how big a fool he is, nor of what an injury he is doing to himself and the people who listen to him. How much better for the world if John, or Daniel, had never lived or written. I would like to see the man who was ever benefited one particle by those writings.

But on the other side look what evil they have done. Look at the regiments of victims they have sent to the lunatic asylums. Look at those lunatics in Chicago. A congregation of Advents waiting for events! They ate the last supper and made ready on general principles. They washed each others feet! This was the most sensible thing they did; it showed that they were going to glory with clean feet! If they had extended the washing to the whole body with plenty of good soap and soft water, it would have greatly enhanced the chances of glory, as nothing that is unclean or defiled can enter there. Those lunatics had all faith in old books, made by men but very little or none at all in the laws of Nature—the only Bible, book and laws that God ever issued, or that he knows or cares one cent about. If men had spent the brains and money upon the Bible of Nature that they have upon the Bible of priests—this world would be a paradise, and filled with a race of philosophers to-day. Light, knowledge, happiness and civilization would cover the earth as the waters cover the great deep. But now look at the ignorance, blindness, whiskey, tobacco, superstition, dirt, filth, and general damnation and abomination of nastiness that rests upon the race! I think when John saw those vials of wrath poured out upon the world, he was only depicting the effects of his own writings. The world might have stood his vials, but when his writings were combined with other men's writings, then the vials became barrels, and even hogsheds of soap and filth, and wrath, that in the name of religion has deluged our world in blood, and piled up mountains of human bones. When the storm came swooping down on the city of Chicago on the eve of the 19th, the faithful felt sure that the preliminaries of the great final bursting up of the affairs of this planet had commenced. You should have seen their eyes bug out; poor creatures—how I pity any people who are the victims of a religious superstition. But as a general thing, there is no curing them, unless you can break their faith in their idol—that old book. When the hour and minute hand on the clock both cut the figure 12 at midnight and no disturbances were heard or seen in any direction, then it became apparent to the Adventists that—which the world's sinner knew very well all the time—the thing was a "grand fizzle!"

Revelations, as a book, has done our world a great deal of harm. It used to make my eyes bug out to read them when I was a boy. I asked my mother if the throne of God was a big cage full of animals, for John said that they were in the midst of his throne. This seemed to settle the question whether there were animals in the spirit world. John saw whole droves of them both sitting and capering right close around the very throne of God. But some of John's animals were monsters; they had eyes before and behind. Some of them had three pair of wings, and then they could talk and speak the English language, for they continued both day and night to cry, "holy, holy, holy art thou, Lord God Almighty." And God seemed to have nothing to do but to sit there and listen to those animals praise him both day and night. If I should ever get to heaven, and they come bellowing around me after that fashion, I will hand off and let into them with a double-barreled shot gun that will give them something to howl for. If God made all things, both in the earth, under the earth and above the earth, then he made those animals. Now what did he make so many wings for, especially as they never fly, but sit still all the time? Why did God give so many wings to animals in heaven, where they never use them, but down here on the earth, where wings are of some account, he never was known to give an animal more than one pair of wings. If that is wisdom, then I don't know what the word means. On the earth wings mean "fly," but in heaven they mean "sit still." The more wings they have there, the stiller they sit. John saw a far better menagerie of show animals in heaven than Barnum ever had in his hippodrome. I wonder if they don't have animal shows in heaven, anyhow? I have an idea that John's vision was but a clairvoyant squint into a heavenly menagerie. But I really do think that God could greatly improve his mansions on high, if he would set some of his idle angels—who seem to be lying around loose and out of a job—to work, and let them clean out those animals and drive them out of heaven. I would rather have fourteen thousand wolves, lions and jackasses howling, roaring and braying around me than to listen to the eternal din and clatter of what John says he heard in heaven. We would all look funny if it should turn out after all that John was only trying to amuse us with big stories, and that he never dreamed that anybody would believe them to be literally true.

I was once passing along the streets of Knoxville, Illinois, and looking up, I saw a great symbolic canvass stretched across the street. It was full of the pictures of all the strange and unearthly looking animals that ever danced through the imagination of a man wild with delirium tremens. Said I, "when is this show of animals coming to town?" An advent preacher standing near by stepped forward and said: "Young man, the Lord from heaven will exhibit these things to your astonished eyes before long." "Very well," said I, "it don't matter who. If it is P. T. Barnum, the Lord, or any other man. I'll take stock in that concern. Please save me half a dozen tickets for me and my friends. I can't afford to miss as good a show as that; only look at your animals for instance, some with 7 heads and 10 horns, others with 3 or 4 pair of wings, and full of eyes within and without, before and behind! Bears, sheep, lambs, and huge old rams. One animal, I see, has two horns; one a big horn, and the other a little horn. The one was long, but the other was short!" I said to the preacher, "You are bill-poster to the Lord, I presume. How do you like the show business anyhow? Does your Lord make this show business pay pretty well?" He put on a very long and solemn face, and replied:

"Young man, I perceive that you are yet in the gall of bitterness and the bands of iniquity. These things represent the purposes and will of God concerning the destiny of this world and the inhabitants thereof. Come and hear me preach to-night, and I will give you a proper interpretation of this chart."

"But see here now, Mr.," said I, unto him, "if all these animals that you have got on your show bill live in heaven, then I would rather not go there. I always was naturally a little skittish and afraid of wild animals, especially of such, or if they looked like those on your bills. But then I suppose if we ever should be so lucky as to go to heaven we will have to make up our minds to stand it, for I have always believed that heaven was full of not only animals, but also of snakes and creeping things. You recollect that Peter saw all those in that great drag net that was let down from heaven; that net was drawn up into heaven again, you recollect, animals, snakes and all, and as a matter of course they are there yet, and if they have been breeding and multiplying according to the laws of their being, then heaven by this time must be a perfect den of ferocious animals, snakes and crocodiles!" I went to hear the brother hold forth, and for nearly two long hours he swayed and staggered to and fro, back and forth, up and down among the prophecies. He trotted out his animals and made them cut all kinds of capers. Every one had a prophetic meaning. Bears and lions, and rams and goats, all were symbols—just as if God had not sense enough to speak in plain language, and throw mystifying symbols to the dogs, especially in a book, upon a proper interpretation and belief of which, eternal issues hang. A book, as they preach, in which the salvation or eternal damnation of a whole world is written. But great and marvelous, oh Lord, are the mysteries of humbug! This weak brother had the entire Old and New Testament scriptures at his tongue's end. I never saw the fact more clearly demonstrated to my mind than on that occasion—that the more scripture a man can quote, the more ignorant he is. He stirred up his animals and made them howl—each one declaring that the day of judgment was close at hand, even at our doors, and that Gabriel was actually getting ready to sound his big horn, and wake up the sleeping nations. (Advent in a horn!)

After the lecture the brother asked me how I felt. I told him first-rate. I now felt more certain than ever, if it was possible, that there was nothing in the humbug at all, and that his blind eyes would yet be opened to see what a darned fool he was, and what an ass he was making of himself. I told him that the prophecies of John or of Daniel would fool the oldest man living, if he had no more sense than to study and believe them in the literal sense, as he had done. I know that God had no intention of firing the fuse that was to ignite the bomb that was to burst up this world generally. It was a libel upon the Almighty, and if his animals, or even the prophets, said anything to the contrary, they lied, and the truth was not in them. But so it goes. The world has always had outstanding bids for gods and demi-gods all the way down through its history.

Once there was a Messiah expected; this was a bid for some one to come along and declare "I am he." Considering the great demand for gods, anyone might have seen, if he was the least bit sharp, that a man like Christ, the Jewish carpenter, who could, because of his mediumship, perform a few things which seemed out of the ordinary course of things, would be seized upon by an ignorant world and made a god of. They could see in him plainly an answer to one of their outstanding bids, and they of course would not let the opportunity slip. They declared that there was no mistake. He was the very one of whom Isaiah, Moses and all the prophets did write. And thousands and tens of thousands still fool themselves with that idea, and declare stoutly that Jesus was a God, and the son of a god, and that in his blood alone there is salvation. Yes, great is the influence of humbug!

At the present day there is a bid before the world for some one to appear, and he will come, too, declaring that he is the second coming of Christ. If he has control of a few phenomena outside of the people's narrow conception of natural law, they will declare their miracles, and accept them as direct proofs of his Godship or Messiahship. There will yet come an answer to this now outstanding bid. The people are ready and waiting to be fooled again as they were of old about the coming of a Messiah. The meeting of fanatics in Chicago and at many other points on the night of the 19th of April, is one proof of the truth of my statement. Yes, great is the influence of humbug! But let it come, oh Lord let it come, for nothing can cure the desire of the human mind for humbug but humbug itself! Nothing can cure hunger or a desire for food but food itself.

The people are hungry for a God—one manifest in the flesh—human flesh, one that they can see, and hear, and talk to, one tangible to their senses. They have had demi-gods, heroes and saints enough, they are sick of them, and nothing will satisfy but a real, genuine first-class God; but of course they will call him the second coming of Jesus, as that is the nature of the bid they have now standing out in the great god-market of the world!

Crow NOT TOO SOON.—Charles J. Simpson of Keithsburg, Ill., whom the Christian papers were making much ado about, as the converted Infidel, is not likely to add much peace to their souls. Thirty years ago he was a licensed Methodist preacher, and but few in the West could excel him in eloquence or power of converting souls at revivals. Poor pay drove him from the ministry, and he commenced to earn his bread in an honest way, and for ten or fifteen years worked steadily at the shoemaker's bench. He then abandoned the work and began lecturing on Veterinary surgery. He is a great joker, and delights in playing pranks on the Church. A few years ago he was at a town in Iowa, where a protracted meeting was in progression, and as he wished a good time, he introduced himself as a minister and offered his services, which were accepted, and he assisted until the close of the meeting, when the congregation, who were so well pleased with his services, raised a collection and presented him with a $50 American watch, which he is still wearing. He is a Materialist in every sense of the word, and the "Convention at Memphis" was only one of his practical jokes at the expense of the clergy.

The Sacrament.

BY LIZZIE DOTEN.

The aged pastor broke the bread—
 With trembling hands he poured the wine—
 "Eat—drink"—in earnest tones he said—
 "These emblems of a life divine—
 His body broken for your sins;
 His blood for your salvation shed,
 The priceless sacrifice that wins!
 Life and redemption from the dead."

"See how with tender love he stands,
 And calls you to his faithful heart;
 Lo! from his wounded side and hands
 Again the crimson life drops start.
 O sinner! wherefore will you stay,
 Regardless of your lost estate;
 Come at your Savior's call to-day,
 Before alas! it is too late."

Forth from his lonely seat apart,
 A dark-brow'd Ethiopian came,
 As if new life had stired the heart,
 That beat within his manly frame.
 "O! give to me" he meekly said,
 "A portion of that heavenly food;
 I too would eat the living bread,
 And find salvation through his blood."

The pastor turned with wondering eyes;
 But when he saw the dusky brow,
 He answered with a quick surprise,
 "Ho! bold intruder! Who art thou?
 The master's table is not free
 To give the low-born servant place—
 Such privilege can only be
 For his accepted sons of grace."

Upon the dusky brow there glowed
 A flush that was not wrath nor pride,
 As forward he majestic strode,
 And stood close by the altar side,
 The broken bread his left hand spurned
 With sudden movement to the floor, While with his right he quickly turned
 The consecrated chalice o'er.

One instant; for the tempest-cloud
 To gather on each pallid face.
 And then uprose the angry crowd,
 To thrust him from the sacred place.
 With conscious might he raised his hand—
 A being of resistless will—
 And uttered the sublime command
 That hushed the tempest—"Peace, be still!"

The wave of wrath and human pride,
 Rolled back without the power to harm,
 The angry murmurs surged and died,
 And lo! there was a breathless calm.
 The dusky brow to dazzling white
 Had in one fleeting instant turned,
 And round his head a halo bright
 Of heaven's resplendent glory burned.

"I do reject," he calmly said,
 "These outward forms—this bread, this wine;
 Lo! at my table all are fed,
 Made welcome by a love divine.
 The high, the low, the rich, the poor,
 The black, the white, the bond, the free,
 The sinful soul, the heart impure—
 Forbid them not to come to me."

"Too long, too long have faithless creeds,
 Shut out the sunshine from above,
 While human hearts and human needs,
 Have perished for the lack of love.
 O, break for them the living bread;
 Let love like mine unhindered flow;
 Thus would I have the hungry fed,
 And let those outward emblems go."

Then from the altar-side there rose
 A cloud with matchless glory bright,
 As when, at evening's calm repose,
 The sun withdrew her radiant light.
 But though so far removed from all,
 He seemed in presence to depart.
 The seed of living truth let fall
 Took root in many a thoughtless heart.

A Wish.

BY OUR DEVIL.

A fairy bright in summer morning shower,
 When all my soul was hushed to gentlest thoughts,
 Appeared, and promised me to grant a wish,
 Which from my heart in broken murmurs came.
 Oh for a perfect man, whose thought and deed
 Like two matched horses shall keep equal step;
 Whose brightest thought shall fly like arrow swift,
 To do the bidding of his noblest soul!
 Or falling this, let me at least repose
 Where the soft voice of gentlest pity comes From woman's lips, and where the poisoned sting
 Of disappointment melts away in love.

Eminent Piety.

Rev. T. De Witt Talmage of Brooklyn, recently offered a reward of five hundred dollars for the name of any person of eminent piety who advocates the theatre. The Independent intimated its purpose to claim that reward, but it appears that one of our liberal friends from Worcester, Mass., put in the first appearance as claimant, as the following letter received by Mr. Talmage, and his answer to it will show:

WORCESTER, MASS., Jan. 25th, 1875.

MY DEAR BROTHER TALMAGE:—I learn from a reliable source—the newspapers—that you have offered a reward of "five hundred dollars for the name of any person of eminent piety who advocates the American theatre."

Presuming that your sense of justice would lead you to prefer that the person whose piety deserves reward, should be the recipient of your favor, rather than an impecunious third party, who may be only an informer, I beg you to consider me the rightful claimant of your generous favor.

As evidence in part of my public services in behalf of the truth, I present you the enclosed tract, entitled, "Sacred Animals, Reptiles, and Books."

I trust I have by the publication and gratuitous circulation of thirty thousand copies of this tract, led many, who have hitherto walked in the darkness of error, to discern the true gospel, obedience to the high behests of which will secure the sure reward of good behavior. There is, my dear brother, a wealth of wisdom in the following remark of an eminent divine:

"Be virtuous and you will have a soft thing of it."
 —Mark Twain.

As evidence, in part, of my piety in private life, I refer you to my dear wife and children who are certainly most familiar with my daily walk. If, peradventure, my piety be not of that type called "eminent," it is from no fault of mine, and I pray you to allow no such unavoidable disability to prejudice my claim. Sincerely and cordially your brother in the truth.

T. M. LAMB.

To this claim Mr. Talmage responds through his paper as follows:

"And now a gentleman writes us from Worcester, Mass., claiming the reward we offered for any one who is eminent in piety; and at the same time advocates and frequents the theatre. We would be glad to pay that gentleman the above reward, but as we have supposed humility to be one of the prominent characteristics of eminent piety, the fact of his holding himself so highly seems to prove him to be not as eminent in piety as our offer calls for. We have no doubt that he frequents the theatre and so meets the second qualification. We are sorry he doesn't meet the first condition. Next?—Christian at Work."

The following is the tract alluded to.

SACRED ANIMALS, REPTILES, AND BOOKS.

The cow is a sacred animal among a portion of the Hindoos, and recently a serious riot was occasioned by the English residents killing that animal for food. It was useless to reason with the natives upon the propriety of considering the cow or other animals sacred; they would have no argument with those who disbelieved in the sacred character of the cow.

By other equally ignorant peoples, other animals, and certain reptiles, are considered sacred, and all argument with them to the contrary equally useless; they refer triumphantly to the long time during which their ancestors have regarded such animals or reptiles as sacred, and therefore for that and other reasons they know they are sacred, and will have no argument with you, except you acknowledge their sacred character.

With other and more intelligent peoples, instead of animals and reptiles, certain books are regarded as sacred, and therefore entitled to an authoritative control over the judgment. With such it is equally useless to argue, except you first admit the sacred and authoritative character of the book.

The three most prominent sacred books or writings are the Shasters, the Koran, and the English Bible.

The believers in the sacred character of the Shasters are the most numerous, a less number accept the Koran as divine, while our Bible is third in the list, having by far the least number who regard it as sacred and authoritative.

Persons born in a Mahometan country are taught from early infancy to believe the Koran a divine book, and Mahomet a divinely inspired teacher; they therefore believe, undoubtingly, that their divine teacher performed the most wonderful miracles. He smote the earth, and fountains of pure water gushed forth at his bidding; he healed the sick, restored sight to the blind, and raised the dead. They admit that such miracles are not performed to-day, but they know that the divine Mahomet performed them, because tradition affirms it, and he who disbelieves is an infidel dog—the Koran is their sacred cow.

Persons born in a Christian country are in like manner taught from infancy that the Bible is a sacred book, and Jesus and the Prophets divinely inspired teachers; therefore they accept, without questioning, the absurd statements of wonderful miracles performed by the Bible Mahomet. They believed that Jesus paid his taxes with money obtained by sending one of his disciples to catch a fish, and from its mouth extracted the money with which to satisfy the tax-gatherer's claim; that he walked on the sea, turned water into wine, and raised the dead. The equally absurd and more silly Munchausen stories found in the traditions of the older prophets are piously swallowed, but with less relish. Jacob, wrestling with an angel, puts his thigh out of joint; Jonah is swallowed by a fish, and after remaining three days in the fish's stomach, comes safely to land; the sun and moon stand still at the bidding of Joshua; a clumsy box, or ark, contains representatives of every living thing upon the earth, with an ample supply of subsistence during a storm that in forty days covered the whole earth with an average depth of four miles of water; a south wind deposits dead quails in such immense numbers that they cover the ground two feet deep over an area eighteen miles in diameter.

All this, and much more of similar nonsense as well as teachings yet more pernicious, we are taught to believe as divinely revealed truth because the Bible affirms it, and to disbelieve the Bible is to be an infidel. All attempts to apply common sense or reason to this subject, with a majority of Bible believers, is met with the response, "If you don't believe the Bible, I will have no argument with you"—the Bible is their sacred cow.

We do not expect to reach those whose minds are settled by deep-seated religious prejudices; such are incapable of candid investigation; but a large and rapidly increasing class, especially among the rising generation, will catch the spirit of inquiry, and secure the joy which comes from a more rational view of our moral relations. To such the spirit of the age is speaking.

Our most popular lecturers, writers, and teachers of science and philosophy utterly repudiate a belief in the authority of the Bible. They believe it reflects the sentiments of its individual writers, and not the mind or purpose of God. They believe it to be a mixture of error and truth, legend, tradition and history. The truth they accept for its own sake; it has authority of its own—shines with no borrowed light. The errors and nonsense of the Bible they reject because they are such, and are errors and nonsense no less because found in the Bible.

But perhaps you say that a wonderful plan of salvation is revealed in the Bible, and refer triumphantly to your religious experience and the joy you feel when engaged in your devotions; these, you say, prove the divinity of the Bible, and your plan of salvation. Stop a moment, my Christian brother, and let us examine this important point.

Go with me to a Mahometan country. See that poor mendicant, traveling for many a weary mile, on hands and knees, to reach holy Mecca, that he may at Mahomet's holy shrine receive forgiveness of sins and the soul's perfect joy. As he beholds the holy city his countenance beams with the inexpressible joy which fills his soul, and he shouts, "Allah, Father, and the holy Mahomet!" Do not intrude upon his happiest hours—you have seen his plan of salvation.

Go to India. See that poor mother with her infant in her arms, pursuing her penitential pilgrimage towards the sacred Ganges. Arriving at its bank, her cup of joy is full, and in her religious ecstasy she casts her darling child into the open jaws of the sacred alligator. Now witness the frenzy of her religious happiness; hear her thanksgiving that she has been permitted to make the great sacrifice, and gain a heavenly joy—it is her plan of salvation. Now, my Christian brother, does the joy which fills the souls of the pious devotees of other religions prove the divinity of their plan of salvation? How, then, can you claim that the joy which you experience during a "revival" proves the divinity of your plan of salvation?

Your joy differs not in kind or degree from theirs. Whence its source, and what does it prove? It proves the existence in the human soul of a longing for a higher and better life—a more perfect character. Your joy springs from a concentration of all the human emotions upon what you have been taught to believe is your plan of salvation. This is the experience of the devotees of every religion.

Your joy is as fleeting as are all human emotions. To-day you experience a heaven of joy, to-morrow comes the "coldness" and feeling of self-degradation.

Are there no rational means of seeking this higher life and perfection of character? Yes; base it not upon fleeting emotions, but rationally consider the relation you sustain to your brother man, and the laws governing your moral growth. Crystallize your emotions into a fixed purpose to obey the intuitions of your moral sense. Learn from your own and others experience, that you can no more violate a law of your moral nature and escape the natural penalty, than you can violate the laws of your physical being with impunity. Distrust all efforts which have exclusive reference to a future life, and every plan of salvation which provides for the remission of the penalty of wrong doing. Such a plan of salvation would rob us of the most beneficent provision for our moral development.

All your fears and soul-groanings with reference to a future life, are born of an irrational and superstitious religion, which pretends, without the least authority for its claim, to teach man's condition in a future life—a life of which we know absolutely nothing, and can learn nothing here, unless we recognize the return of some traveler from that bourne, capable of imparting to us personally the desired information.

and sought his life. He was driven from friends and home, and was compelled to seek safety in a foreign country. Even Martin Luther, the great Reformer, called Copernicus "an old fool" for asserting the earth is round. The fact of the rotundity of the earth contradicted all the old Bible philosophy, and the Church did its best to suppress it.

After the death of Copernicus, his disciple, Galileo, again gave utterance to the truth that the earth is round, that it revolves every day upon its own axis, and makes a revolution once a year round the sun. The Church again refused to suffer such dangerous doctrines to be taught, and the noble martyr to science was seized by the Church officials—was thrown into that infernal Christian torture-house called the "Holy Inquisition," and here the brave man was subjected to cruel torture for enunciating one of the most palpable truths of the Universe; and to save his life, as he was feeble and old, was compelled to deny his firm and honest convictions, and to admit the earth stood still. He lived but a short time after his release, but he died exulting in the truth that "the earth still moves."

Solomon is another of Elder Shelton's Bible-scientists and credits him with discovering that the rivers all run into the sea. Did it take "the wisest man" that ever lived to find out that fact? And is that the reason why he was called the wisest man? It might be supposed Solomon's seven hundred wives and three hundred concubines would have kept him so busy that he could hardly find time to study geography or prosecute science. We conjecture the woman science was the science he understood the best of any.

Job is another of the Elder's Bible-scientists and he quotes him as speaking of the "weight of the wind," "stretching out the North," and "hanging the East." These ideas are perhaps sublime enough, but are not correctly expressed as modern scientists state them. It is thought Job investigated the subject of boils pretty thoroughly, for between God and Satan, he had a pretty hard time of it. Had he written a scientific treatise on "boils" we think he would have been accepted as good authority. The book of Job contains much beautiful language and many grand ideas. We have often thought it the most sensible book in the Bible. He makes nowhere any allusion to any character or event mentioned in other parts of the Bible. There is no date given by which its chronology can be even guessed at, though it is doubtless older than any part of the Jewish scriptures. The person who wrote it evidently knew something of astronomy, and talked freely about the stars, Arcturus, the Pleiades, and Orion, whereas these names are used nowhere else in the Bible, nor did its writers have any knowledge of astronomy. The book of Job is probably a drama or poem from the Chaldean language, and was borrowed or adopted by the Jews. The best scholars, Hebrew and others, agree that it is not Hebrew in character, that it was not written by a Jew, hence its divine origin and inspiration fall to the ground, for even Elder Shelton will hardly claim that anybody in olden times could have been inspired except a Jew.

After the Elder enumerates the delectable sciences of the great book, he says, "there is a grander and more sublime science taught in the Bible, and that is the science of man's salvation." This shows the Elder does not know what science is. Is what he refers to, science? Let us see how much science it contains. The theory is about in this wise: God made the world according to a plan he had cogitated upon for thousands of years; he also made a nice garden, and in it planted a tree which bore inviting fruit: he made man of the dust and placed him in the garden, but finding he was lonely, he put him to sleep and took out one of his ribs, out of which he fashioned a young, plump, blooming, fascinating female. The man and woman probably would have got along very well had it not been for the fruit just mentioned and a big snake that God had also made, and which afterwards became the big, roaring Devil, the adversary of God, who has since successfully opposed God in every instance and defeated him in every encounter. God told the man he must not eat that fruit, although he had placed it there before him; but while the man was away in some other part of the garden the snake came along and got into conversation with the woman and persuaded her to taste of the fruit. She found it pleasant and induced her "old man" to try some when he came back. This little affair made God very angry and he turned them out of the garden he had prepared for them, cursing them severely, and placed a watchman at the gate.

The man and woman however went into the business of raising children, and in a short time the earth became well populated. It seems the people did not do so well as they ought, and God became very sorry that he had ever made the world, or such a race of troublesome beings. He concluded the best thing he could do would be to drown them out, and begin anew; so, after talking the matter over with Noah, and telling him how to get up a boat that would preserve himself and family, and a pair each of all the animals, birds, and insects, he opened the windows of heaven and let the rain fall down at such a rapid rate that in forty days and nights the whole earth was covered to the tops of the highest mountains, or five and a half miles deep, and everything was drowned except the fishes and the Noah family in the ark.

More than a year passed from the commencement of the rain before Noah and his family could disembark to begin again the business of life; and the whole thing seems to have been another failure; for the people after the flood were just as bad as before it, and nothing was gained by the great freshet. God next felt as though he wanted a small portion of the human race to attach himself to, and who should share his special favors, so he entered into a contract with one Abraham, the son of an idolator; that his children should be his peculiar people, and that they should have more of his care and attention than any other portion of the human race. He agreed to stick to them forever, and that they should become as numerous as the sands of the sea-shore; but he had a great amount of trouble with this chosen tribe of his, and often got vexed with them almost beyond his powers of endurance, and he frequently threatened to wipe them off the face of the earth. In fact he did several times, for trifling offenses slay twenty, and forty, and fifty, and seventy thousand at a time. He also sold them into slavery, and then emancipated them; then led them forty years through a desert wilderness to the land of Canaan, where he caused them to wage most cruel and exterminating wars upon the nations who occupied the country, and after a while they got to fighting among themselves, and ten-twelfths of them wandered away and got lost, and have never been heard of since. The two-twelfths continued to make him great trouble, absolutely destroying his peace of mind. He finally permitted their best city to be taken, and the magnificent temple they had built, to worship and honor him in, to be utterly destroyed, and let them go several times into slavery to be treated like beasts of burden. He finally seems to have given them up as a bad lot, and for two thousand years they have had to shift for themselves, having no more of God's special care than other folks.

Though God met with these repeated failures and disappointments he resolved to carry out the grand plan he had for thousands of years meditated upon, and in a most sublime and god-like manner to rescue from eternal destruction the miserable race he had created. So he came down out of heaven, and was born of a little Jew girl who had never had any sexual connection with any person of the male gender, except one Ghost. After he was born and grew up, he worked at the carpenter trade till he was about thirty years of age, when he began to preach about the country, and had a dozen fishermen who followed him about from place to place something less than two years, when his peculiar and chosen people—the people too, he had come specially to save—put him to death in the most ignominious manner. He did not, however, remain dead; after thirty-six hours he came to life again, and in forty days he ascended up into heaven where he stays now most of the time.

This beautiful doctrine did not spread very fast for two hundred years, and the believers had to live part of the time in caves and other hiding-places; but at last a great heathen emperor named Constantine who had murdered his wife, his brother-in-law, his nephew, his eldest son and his father-in-law, and who was refused absolution for his crimes by the pagan priests, but finding the Christian priests would grant it, and seeing he could use the new sect to his advantage he became a Christian, and though it never has had but about one-twentieth part as many followers as the older systems of religion in Asia, from that day it soon became the most fashionable and aristocratic religion in the southern part of Europe, and at the same time the most cruel and bloody in the whole world. Over fifty millions of unfortunate people have been put to death in its name, and millions of priests have been fed and pampered in idleness, simply to dole out dogmas to the ignorant, superstitious masses, assuring them that those who bow in submission to their dictation shall go to heaven and wear a crown, and a white robe, and bow eternally before a white throne singing a song which has no end; while those who do not thus bow in submission, or cannot believe the story, will be cast into outer darkness and roast for millions of years in the eternal flames of fire and brimstone, with nothing to breathe but "sulphuric gas." Is it not a pretty picture? If it is a true one, it is indeed a great pity that God ever experimented in making a world of human beings. Non-existence would have been infinitely better than such a fate. This is Elder Shelton's grand, beautiful "science of salvation." If it is a science, he, and such as he are welcome to the whole of it! We want no part in it. We much prefer the article of science taught by Galileo, Humboldt, Darwin, Spencer, Huxley and Draper. Their teachings possess so much more of truth and consistency, so much less of superstition, absurdity and falsehood that we altogether prefer them.

A very noticeable trait in Elder Shelton is his demand for living and reliable witnesses. We spoke of the upheavals that have occurred upon the earth, and he demands a living witness. Probably some of these upheavals took place tens of thousands of years ago and perhaps millions of years ago; yet he says, "I want a living witness." We gave as authority Prof. Draper of this city, a man now alive and who is second in scientific attainments and reliability to no man in this country, in proof that upheavals have recently taken place in Europe, that half of Norway was elevated two feet or more, and that parts of the Alps were raised three hundred feet; but as the Bible says nothing about it, Elder Shelton won't believe a word of it. The same when we told him of information we received from an intelligent, honorable gentleman, an officer of the navy and a son of a respected patron of ours. Yes, when we, a man of veracity and a Truth Seeker, narrated a correct account of the happy and peaceful condition of the people of Japan, and which is corroborated by many writers, he hoots at it and calls the gentleman "a liar." While he is so incredulous about events and occurrences of modern times, which, too, are entirely authentic and probable, it is amusing to see how easy it is for him to accept without the slightest difficulty the most absurd tales that unknown persons said occurred 5000 or 6000 years ago, and of an impossible character, written nobody knows when, nobody knows where, and nobody knows by whom; but because they are bound up in a book and called the Bible, and priests affirm it is the "word of God," he can swallow every word of it without a grimace, and look up for more. How would his Bible fare if living witnesses, or known witnesses, even, were required to sustain it? It would certainly go down! But Elder Shelton and all like him are so full of faith, and are so ready to accept every absurd tale marked "Divine," that they care not who the writer was, or whether the story is impossible or absurd. So it purports to be Jewish or Christian, "it is all right"—"it is the word of God."

The Elder talks about producing scientists that sustain the Bible story, and wants us to pay one hundred dollars a piece for them. We happen not to have a very large amount of money to spare, but we hesitate not to guarantee him $100 each for every first-class scientist that will say he believes the Universe was made in six days from nothing, less than 6000 years ago; that the earth is older than the sun, and brought forth trees, and plants, and vegetables, perfecting seeds and fruits before the sun existed to impart light and heat; that it ever rained to the depth of 30,000 feet in forty days over the entire earth, or seven hundred and fifty feet per day, over thirty-one feet an hour, or six inches a minute for six weeks, without intermission; that such a vast body of water could evaporate and be held up by the atmosphere, or otherwise disposed of; that a man could cause the sun and moon to stand still merely by speaking to them; that there ever was a time when neither rain nor dew fell upon the earth for three and a half years; that three men should be thrown into a fiery furnace, made seven times hotter than usual, without their being burned at all, or a thread of their garments scorched; We say, that for every eminent scientist that will affirm he believes all these absurdities, and scores more of similar ones with which the Bible is filled, we will hold ourselves in readiness to pay the Elder his price. But remember they must be Scientists, not Elders, Sunday-school teachers, bigots nor fools. We do not believe a single sound scientist can be found who, for a moment believes any such nonsense; and the men of ordinary common sense are getting very scarce who longer accept such idle tales. Sensible clergymen, even, are fast disavowing such silly stories and are trying to modify these statements, or make the language mean something else. The Rev. O. A. Burgess, Professor in the Theological Seminary of Indianapolis, a man who, in natural and acquired ability, would, in any community, rank several degrees higher than Elder Shelton, in a recent debate with B. F. Underwood admitted that Noah's flood was only local in character, and probably did not extend beyond Asia Minor. But Elder Shelton will have it that it extended to the opposite side of the globe, even to Alabama, and covered the ridge on which Mr. H. Scott lives, in Blount county, with poplar trees, and all with gravel forty feet deep. We presume it requires an ignoramus like the Elder, to believe such an event possible; and it is probably useless to make much effort to get good, hard sense into the heads of such. They have so much faith there is not much room for sense and reason.

As the Elder calls for a living witness to convince him of the truth of upheavals on this continent, we will, before dropping him, humor him in this respect. The witness is one who stands as high as any living man, one who is extensively known over the entire civilized world, and while though his philosophy may not in all cases be accepted, his facts always are. The name of this witness is Professor Charles Darwin A.M., F.R.S., of London. In 1831 and '32 the British Government sent out the ship Beagle to South America on a voyage for scientific purposes. Prof. Darwin was commissioned to accompany the expedition to make observations in Natural History, Geology, etc. While in South America he had excellent opportunities to witness the effects of earthquakes and volcanoes, as well as upheavals which in various places occurred. In describing a severe earthquake which took place in South America, Feb. 20th, 1832, while he was in the country, and which comprised in all, some three hundred separate shocks of greater or lesser magnitude, the effects of which extended over one thousand miles, he mentions the towns that were destroyed; numberless buildings that were utterly demolished; the frightful fissures that were made in the earth, and goes on to say: "The most remarkable effect of this earthquake was the permanent elevation of the land. There can be no doubt that the land around the Bay of Concepcion was upraised two or three feet, at the Island of St. Maria (about thirty miles distant) the elevation was still greater: on one part Capt. Fitz Roy found beds of putrid mussel shells still adhering to the rocks ten feet above high water mark: the inhabitants had formerly dived at low water spring tides for these shells." [This proves the upheaval must have been twenty or thirty feet.] "The elevation in this province is particularly interesting from its having been the theatre of several other violent earthquakes; and from the vast number of sea-shells scattered over the land up to the height of 600, and I believe, 1000 feet. At Valparaiso similar shells are found at the height of 1300 feet. It is hardly possible to doubt that this elevation has been effected by successive small uprisings such as that which accompanied or caused the earthquakes of this year; and likewise by an insensibly slow rise which is certainly in progress in some parts of this coast."

After narrating the powerful effects of the earthquake seven hundred and fifty miles in one direction and four hundred miles in another, he takes occasion to say, "we may confidently come to the conclusion that the forces which slowly and by little starts uplift continents, and those which at successive periods pour forth volcanic matter from open orifices are identical. From many reasons I believe the frequent quakings of the earth, on this line of coast, are caused by the rending of the strata necessarily consequent on the tension of the land when upraised and then injection by fluidified rock. This rending and injection would, if repeated often enough (and we know earthquakes repeatedly effect the same areas in the same manner) form a chain of hills; and the linear island of St. Mary, which was upraised thrice the height of the surrounding country seems to be undergoing this process. I believe the solid axis of a mountain differs in its manner from a volcanic hill only in the molten stone having been repeatedly injected instead of having been repeatedly ejected." In this way he believed the vast mountain ranges were gradually thrown up from time to time as these exterior earthquakes occur, and he also believed the surface of the earth was as variable from the accretions and explosions of internal gasses, as the surface of the water, in a comparative degree.

In speaking of his observations on the northern coast of Chili, he uses this language: "I have convincing proofs that this part of the continent has been elevated near the coast four hundred to five hundred, and in some parts from one thousand to thirteen hundred feet since the epoch of existing shells; and further inland the rise has probably been greater." "At Lima a sea-beach has certainly been upheaved eighty to ninety feet within the Indian-human period."

Mr. Darwin narrates finding sea shells and other washings of the ocean in many places hundreds of feet above the surface of the water, showing at some time or times great upheavals have taken place. He also speaks of a pyramidal island in the ocean, around whose borders soundings are seventeen hundred feet, showing at some time it was thrown up by the internal forces. He also gives an account of a new island coming to the surface by the effects of an earthquake. He also believed in England, France, Switzerland, and many other countries, the same condition of internal commotion had at some age of the world taken place; by which the mountain ranges had been produced, and that quietness had succeeded the spending of their internal forces. But we cannot quote him further now. These interesting statements may be found in his Journal of Researches in Natural History and Geology, during the voyage of H. M. S. Beagle; two volumes; published by Harper & Brothers.

Prof. Darwin is one of the men Elder Shelton thinks resorts to "pitiful subterfuges" in order to get rid of Bible truths, and one whom the Devil ought to get, and immerse in the flames of hell forever, for presuming to bring any facts to light that clash with the Bible story.

We are not sure such ponderous minds as Elder Shelton's can accept such obscure testimony as Prof. Darwin's, and he, doubtless, will still insist that there have been no upheavals on this continent because the Bible says nothing about it, and will still claim that all the mountain ranges were caused by Noah's flood, when the "foundations of the great deep were broken up"; and that no changes have taken place in the earth except what are mentioned in the Bible. Is it not a little curious that the flood which was sent to cover the tops of the highest mountains should at the same time have brought these very mountains into existence? This is a specimen of Elder Shelton's logic. What a great mind!

We will not object, however, should the Elder still believe in the flood and all the other monstrous Bible stories, if he finds they suit his grade of intellect. We are convinced, nevertheless, that people of good sense are ceasing to believe them, and fast turning their attention to scientific authors, and informing themselves upon subjects of which the ignorant writers of the Bible had not the slightest conception.

We will be content to let the Elder continue to imagine in his simple heart that the world is indebted to the Bible for the advances that have been made in knowledge, education, civilization, law, and the arts and sciences; though there is not a word of truth in it. It has given the world none of these; but has been the source of incomparable error, mental blindness, superstition, carnage and bloodshed—which can be easily shown. But if the great Alabamian derives pleasure from the follies and absurdities he fondly clasps to his bosom, it is not in our heart to tear them from him, and thus render him unhappy. Let him be "joined to his idols," let him still dream on about miracles and floods, and ghosts and gods and devils and Bibles and revelations, until he has lived out his days and gives place to those who will exercise their thought, their reason and their common sense.

We must follow Elder Shelton no longer; we have, we fear, already given him more attention than his mental calibre and his low estimate of good-breeding would seem to justify.

[We shall issue the entire discussion between Elder Shelton and ourselves, in a small pamphlet, and those who wish it, can be supplied in any quantity.]

IN OUR LAST we inadvertently failed to notice the marked improvements in our old contemporary, The Investigator, since it entered upon its forty-fifth volume and into its new home in Paine Hall. It is as pleasing, as sprightly, and as vivacious as a young bride. May it retain its charms for many a year to come, and continue its effective labors to make the world better and happier.

KIDDER'S SECRETS OF BEE-KEEPING.—We were in error as to the price of this valuable, practical work as given in this number for May 1st. The corrected prices are 50 cents in paper and 75 cents in boards. The work possesses much value and should be in the hands of every person keeping bees.

In a certain Rensselaer county Sunday-school they offer a chromo to every scholar who shall experience religion and join the church before August first.

M. Altman & Co.

We are in receipt of numerous letters complimentary of the fair dealing and integrity of the above well-known House, and refer with pleasure to those sent us by readers of our own paper, who are induced to purchase of them, and who report satisfaction both in prices of goods and quality.

Our friend Altman can always be seen at his establishments, which are located on 6th Avenue and 19th street, and although being constantly crowded with customers, and having every moment of his time engrossed superintending all the vast details of his business, has always an open hand to welcome his Liberal friends, and finds sufficient time to have a friendly chat with them in his private office.

An idea of his immense place may be had by the fact that he has over 200 salesmen and saleswomen employed, which, together with the vast number of porters, errand-men, entry-clerks, delivery-clerks, cashiers, book-keepers, assistant floor-walkers, ushers, managers, etc., and that the retail sales alone amount to over two million dollars.

Mr. B. F. Underwood, our favorite lecturer, has undertaken to write a graphic and detailed account of his last visit to this establishment, giving the minutiae of the working, and conveying some notion to the Liberal admirers of Mr. Altman of the complete organization controlling every small trifling operation, from the receiving of three pennies for a paper of pins to the taking of an order for a $500 silk costume. This will shortly be published. The house of M. Altman & Co. is as well known in this city as A. T. Stewart, and quite as favorable for prices and grades of goods, and what finds most favor in our eyes with Morris Altman is, that he has been the first and only extensive merchant that had the independence to advertise in the Liberal papers and to openly avow his Liberalism.

His advertisements for the last five years in our well known Liberal papers attest this fact; and although he has spent over $40,000 in advertising with secular papers, confines his advertising now to Liberal papers.

We recommend him and his house to all our readers.

He sends his circulars and price list free of cost. Send for it and try him.

[From The Daily State Journal, Lincoln, Neb., April, 25th, 1875.]

B. F. Underwood.

We had the pleasure last night of listening to this famous lecturer, and we may say the most noted freethinker of the age. To say the least, this gentleman is in our opinion, as well as in the opinion of every other sound-minded individual who has had the pleasure of listening to him, the best lecturer and soundest talker that ever graced the stage before an appreciative audience.

EVOLUTION.

From the Homogeneous to the Heterogeneous.

Evolution affirms that the Universe did not come into existence as we now know it, by a creative fiat, but that its present condition is the final term in an immense series of changes, which have occurred in the course of immense periods of time. These changes have been from the simple to the complex, from the homogeneous to the heterogeneous. The theory advanced by Kant, and afterwards elaborated by Laplace, and now accepted generally by scientific men, known as the nebular hypothesis, is an illustration of astronomical evolution. Our solar system was once a fire-mist; the condition was homogeneous; the progressive condensation and differentiation of this nebulous mass, through successive stages, to more and more concrete and specialized bodies, have given us our solar system, with its one hundred and fifty orbs moving and revolving according to one grand method. The fire-mist became first, immense globes of gas, gradually condensing into featureless balls of fire, the bodies cooling and vapors condensing, oceans appeared. In course of time, when the crust was formed and by escape of heat condensation took place; mountains and rivers, and finally all those diversities of surface we now observe characterized it.

THE BEGINNING OF LIFE.

Life appeared in the same way, mere specks of albumen floating on the oceans of antiquity. It is often asked how life could have been evolved from a mere nebulous mass of fire-mist. Modern science shows that life is a form of force, a mode of motion. There are no elements in the egg that are not found in the inorganic world. There are no forces in the egg that are not in the rocks, the seas, and clouds. But just as heat is converted to light, light into electricity, electricity into magnetism, and reconverted back, so are the unconscious forces of the egg converted into the life of a chicken. How it is done we pretend not to explain. The fact is indisputable. The grand discovery of the convertibility and persistence of force and researches into biology, have dissipated the old notions that life is essentially distinct from other forms of force. We know that life is simply one of the forms or manifestations of that same force, which under other circumstances, and with molecular arrangement, appears as electricity, heat, magnetism, etc. The experiments of Hæckel and Justin make it probable that life has appeared in liquids, heated to between 300 and 400 deg. Fahrenheit, and under conditions excluding the possibility of germs. When the fluid first begins to grow clouded it is seen with a powerful microscope swarming with multitudes of moving specks, varying from one twenty-thousandth to one one-hundred-thousandth of an inch in diameter. These are regarded by Dr. Bastian as primordial particles of living matter. They are mere specks of albumen-like organic matter with irregular external form, continually changing, without any trace of internal structure or of formation from dissimilar parts. The whole body consists of a homogeneous protoplasm that does not reach the importance of even the simplest cell. Prof. Hæckel says these monera are neither animals nor plants. Indeed it is certain that, as the animal kingdom runs into the vegetable, forming what Huxley calls the biological "No Mans," so the organic runs into the inorganic world, and it is impossible to say where the former begins and the latter ends.

ALL SPECIES RELATED TO ONE ANOTHER.

Evolution shows that there is a genetic relationship, a primordial kinship between all the animals of the globe. In the first place among all the multitude of animals that present such a variety of appearances, there are but five, at most seven distinct types. The wing of the bat, the flipper of the seal, the fore legs of a horse, the arm of a man, are but modifications of the same part. The farther back we go, the less difference there is between the species, and in those the most widely divergent we can discover unmistakable trace of a common starting point.

Looking at the facts of embryology—every animal in its embryological development passes through different stages representing every animal below it. The consecutive changes which a human passes through in its anti-natal progress until its birth corresponds exactly with our zoological classification of animals. Why does a man commence to develop as though he were to become a fish, then as though he were to become a reptile and then pass through and represent the condition of the bird and the quadruped before assuming the human form, forming an epitome of the whole animal world? The answer is evident: Because man himself is an evolution from these lower forms. The development of a human being, from a speck of albumen, epitomizes the development of the various species of animal from the homogeneous condition we have mentioned as the beginning of organic life.

The facts of rudimentary structure are no less convincing. The Guinea-pig has teeth which it sheds before it is born. The female Dugong has tusks that never cut the gum. Some birds have teeth in their beaks during the embryonic condition. Snakes have hind legs beneath the integuments of the skin. Seals have nails inside the flesh at the end of their toes. Some species of whales have teeth that they lose before birth, and which are superseded by a filtering apparatus through which the food passes. Let the theologian explain these facts on the hypothesis that species were created as we see them. These rudimentary structures are recollections of a former condition. They show that animals having changed their surroundings, and lost the need for, and use of certain organs, those parts have become abated, or reduced to mere rudiments. All animals are full of rudimentary parts, that point back to the time when they belonged to different species just as clearly as the minute dangling horns in hornless breeds of cattle point back to the time when those cattle had horns. Man is no exception as Darwin shows; he has even rudimentary muscles in the ears, by which his ancient progenitor moved those parts, and by which occasionally, a man is now found to do the same, by mere act of volition. The human body is full of these indications of a low and humble origin. Were they thoroughly comprehended says Hæckel, the opponents of development would be overwhelmed with despair.

OUR APE-LIKE ANCESTORS

It has often been said that it is impossible that a Shakespeare or Newton could have jumped up from the condition of a monkey—of course. But when we consider some of the lower men in Africa, who live chiefly in trees, gesticulate like apes, that have not sufficient language to converse in the language of humans, that live on toads and serpents, and mice, have no tribal property, no love, no idea of religion, that meet and propagate like beasts, that have been given up by the missionaries as mere two-handed apes, and then think of some higher apes that ascend trees with stones in their hands with which they pelt travelers, that take their young to the brook and wash their faces (which some civilized mothers neglect to do), the difference between men and animals is very much lessened. And then the theory of Darwin forbids the supposition that man is an evolution from any existing species of monkeys. There has been a survival of the fittest. Man's ancestors must necessarily have perished—we must not look for links between man and existing monkeys. Man we hold, came from an ape-like ancestor. When we shall have had opportunities to examine the crust of the earth, in those regions where man first appeared, we shall undoubtedly find all the "links" required by the Darwinian theory.

PRIMITIVE MAN.

We know early man was a savage. Pre-historic archaeology demonstrates this. The caves of Amiens and Abbeville show us that man existed when the river Somme was running 110 feet higher than it now is; when the woolly rhinoceros, the cave bear, and the mammoth roamed the earth. Their bones are found mingled with the remains of our savage ancestors. Every-where man has existed, the rude unpolished stone age is found first, then the middle stone age, the polished stone age, afterwards the age of bronze, the age of iron, the age of steam, electricity and printing.

HUMANITY A DEVELOPMENT.

Man, originally a savage, without culture or civilization, has become an enlightened, educated being. He once made known his rudest, coarsest wants by a few guttural sounds. Some of the savages now indicate the approach of the lion by imitating the roar of that beast. Language was originally chiefly gesture. The old languages, Hebrew, Sanscrit, etc., can be traced back to a few, about 500 root words. Could we trace those words to their origin, a low, coarse, hideous growl would be found, the origin of the homogeneous beginning of the language of Cicero, Webster and Longfellow. Prof. Max Muller, one of the greatest living philologists, is an evolutionist.

MARRIAGE AN EVOLUTION.

Among low tribes, marriage is communal; men go from their own tribe to other tribes and capture females and make them their mistresses and slaves. Here is the beginning of marriage, brutal capture on the part of man, unwilling submission on the part of woman—finally, men wishing additional slaves or mistresses, made additional captures—hence polygamy, and finally, the relation becoming refined and elevated, assumed the form of monogamic marriage. Until within twenty-five years it was customary in Wales whenever there was a marriage, for the intended bride to start out at full gallop accompanied by her friends, and for the intended husband to follow in pursuit. This was simply a symbol that pointed back to the time when the woman did not ride gracefully away, hoping soon to be overtaken by her lord, but when she knew that if overtaken, she would be treated with brutality, and torn forever from her friends.

RELIGION NO EXCEPTION.

Religion is an evolution. Man in his lowest state has no religion. He looks on the Universe like an ox.

He believes everything and disbelieves nothing. Soon the wonders of the Universe force themselves upon his attention, the sun shines with genial warmth, the stars like the eyes of time look down on him, and the beauties of nature impress him with admiration. But the lightning destroys his hut, the thunder terrifies him, the pestilence fills him with fear, the fire burns, the water drowns, his own qualities are reflected in nature. He declares there is a good God and an evil God. He prays to one in gratitude, to the other in fear, hoping to avert anticipated calamities. The habit of worship is evolved through countless generations. It has become stereotyped in man's nature. A man acquiring the habit of intemperance may cause his son to have an instinctive tendency to become a drunkard. This can be done in two generations. Given a hundred thousand years, would not the habits of our ancestors become stereotyped in our natures, so that men and women would be born with religious tendencies? Hence the difficulty with which the Freethinker has to contend. He may show the unreasonableness of a religion or dogma, but the tendency to believe and to worship resists all argument and all logic. From the simple worship of the savage have been evolved the complicated systems of Buddhism, Mohammedanism, Christianity. Art, and commerce, government, and every other condition and enterprise have been evolved in the same way from the homogeneous. The method we can ascertain, and some of the principles we can positively assert. Selection being hereditary, the survival of the fittest is a principle no longer questioned by intelligent minds.

Mr. Underwood closed his lecture by an eloquent appeal for the elevation of the human race by living harmonious lives. Referring to the care taken by men in improving stock, he thought the propagation of the human species deserved the attention of men. Diseased and degenerating persons should not become the parents of offspring. He did not believe in any redemption of man from the consequences of his own condition. If people were born right the first time, they would not need to be born again.

The Inquisition still at Work.

MR. EDITOR:—The caption of this communication is suggested by some recent occurrences in which the writer unwillingly played the part of "heretic, and as all means of redress is denied me here, I appeal to your columns, not so much to publish my private wrongs as to ascertain whether a church calling itself Christian, and boasting of the "liberty of Christ wherewith he hath made us free," can in this year of grace, 1875, re-enact the scenes of the Spanish Inquisition, or the "Star Chamber" with impunity? I live in the town of L—c, Pa., am a mechanic, and work to earn an honest living for myself and family. Am (or was) a member of the United Presbyterian Church, and tried to discharge my duty to God and man. But I made a fatal mistake. I was innocent enough to suppose that all the "glittering generalities" about the right of "private interpretation," "liberty of conscience," "liberty of the gospel," etc., heard in Protestant churches from the time of Martin Luther to the present time was genuine; was intended to be useful as well as ornamental, and being anxious to learn as much as possible of my relation to my surroundings, that I had a right to think for myself while a member of church, I infiduously or otherwise did so; and the simplest exercise of reason soon showed me that if astronomy, geology and chemistry were to be relied upon at all, then some of the principal dogmas of my church, such as the creation, the fall of man, total depravity, eternal punishment, etc., could not be true. I strove to resist the conviction, but the more I studied Nature, the more did I lose confidence in a pretended revelation. Feeling that I could no longer profess to believe doctrines which I did not believe, and wishing to do as I would be done by, I went before the church, and frankly stated the fact, and desired to withdraw my membership. I received no satisfactory reply, but deeming my allegiance dissolved I paid up my dues and ceased to attend church. This was near a year ago. On the 25th of March last, I received a written notice to appear before the session April 3, and answer to the following charges: "Absenting himself from the ordinances of Lord's supper, and non-attendance on the preaching of the gospel when opportunity presented."

Somewhat surprised at this, I repaired at the appointed time to the church, inquired for my accusers, and demanded a hearing. Instead of proceeding to try me "decently and in order," I was assailed by a torrent of abuse; the language more befitting a pot-house politician than a minister of the gospel of peace. Threats were freely bandied, and seeing that I could not remain and retain my self-respect, I arose, remarking that "it was quite plain that I had been called up, not for trial, but condemnation," and left the house. On the 5th of April following, I received the following precious document which I quote verbatim: "Where, J. L—, a member has been convicted by the session L—c congregation and wherease, the session by one of its members endeavour without effect to reclaim the offending brother and wherease, his continuing in his sin and refusing to listen to the admonitions of his brethren, render it necessary for the honour of Christ Jesus for the purity of his religion for a warning to others, and for his own good to inflict on him a public censure of the Lords house, the session did and hereby do in the name of the Lord Jesus as a court constituted in his name suspend and exclude the said J. L. from the privileges of the church until he gives good evidence of unfeigned repentance for the neglect of sealing and public ordinances. Done at L. C. this 3d day of April A. D. 1875 R. C. H. (S. C.)

The gist of this fine specimen of shoddy Vatican thunder is found in the phrase "for a warning to others," and it only needs a little correction in orthography, and the usual closing sentence "let him be anathema," for one to imagine that he hears the genuine bellowing of a veritable Pope's "bull." It has been evident for some time that they had given up all idea of scaring me into a confession of guilt I did not feel, and a profession of faith I did not entertain, and were determined to make of me a "terrible example" to other members who might be foolish enough to suppose for an instant that religion was a reasonable thing, and would bear investigation in the light of science.

I am now a "marked man." My good name is to be systematically blackened; my character traduced; my business injured, and my family reduced to want; all because I could not believe impossible dogmas, and would not act the hypocrite. And yet this holy Inquisitor-General, the Rev. G., has the unblushing effrontery to tell me that it is "for the honor of Christ, and the purity of his religion." If that is "Christian religion" I would infinitely prefer being decently damned with human heathen to being housed in heaven with such Christians.

I did not go to church on Sunday to hear myself "publicly censured," but am told that the Rev. gentleman showed his "good will to men" by imitating (as far as his ability permitted,) Pope Alexander III. when he cursed the Albigenses.

When the Spanish physician, Michael Servetus, was so unfortunate as to differ in opinion from the saintly Calvin, he was "admonished" by being burnt alive. The degeneracy of the present times does not permit clergymen to burn those who differ from them, or whose arguments they cannot answer, and they are obliged to content themselves with fulminating ecclesiastical lightning and sheet-iron thunder from the pulpit. But there is hope ahead; "there is a good time coming, it is almost here."

Not long since this same Rev. G. preached a sermon noted equally for its violence of language and its logical weakness, wherein he vehemently advocated the "God in the Constitution" dodge, by which the clergy expect to regain their lost prestige and re-enslave the minds of men. They confidently expect to attain their ends in 1876, and when that is accomplished, "the Bible made the supreme law of the land," instead of the Constitution of the United States; the clergy the interpreters of that law, instead of the supreme court; if we may judge the future by the past, we may naturally expect to see such scenes enacted as will "make angels weep and devils blush." The little petty persecutions that we suffer now are but "a foretaste of the joys" (?) held in reservation for us "poor, miserable sinners" when these blood-hounds of Zion acquire unlimited power. Yours for the right of private judgment, J. W. L.

[TWO HUNDRED AND NINETY-SECOND MEETING.]

A paper was read by the Vice-President, W. J. OUNSBY, entitled Educational Problems.

In this stage of the world's progress, there is no necessity for an argument in favor of Education. We may state it as an axiom, that education is generally believed to be a necessity. The great problem is, then, not one of the results to be obtained, but it is a problem of methods, of means, of how best to achieve a desired object. Now there are to be observed at the outset two distinctly marked and diverse theories of education. One of them, and the one that seems to have attained the widest sanction, is based on the idea of force. The broad theory of it, is that only a part of the world duly appreciates the value of education—that it is the duty of this part of the world to compel the other part of the world to be educated, and that human progress can best be secured by such compulsion.

The other theory—the one held by the fewest numbers—is that education is really appreciated by the mass, and is in itself sufficiently attractive to be voluntarily sought and obtained.

The question, therefore, to be argued is one of methods. How best to educate? It is the object of this paper to advocate the attractive method of education, opposing the compulsory, and to show that in education, as in religion, the free method is the best. That we can dispense with the soldier and the policeman and entrust the future welfare of the race to the ever-triumphant principles of liberty.

How strange it seems in this "land of the free," to see the many tendencies to follow despotic examples, to witness the stealthy steps by which the educational methods of the most tyrannical government of the world are being engrafted upon our American educational system. It is indeed too true that under the pretense of progress, we have been slowly following in the footsteps of Prussia, Austria and China—year by year placing more of the control of education in the hands of the government.

It is true that in this country there has been a pretense of avoiding the objections that have characterized despotic governments in the control of education, and in theory our education is unsectarian, completely divorced from religion; but a close examination will expose the falsity of this pretense. There have been complaints on many hands and from many citizens that the unsectarian character of the schools has not been preserved, in many insidious, indirect as well as direct ways, religious tenets have been inculcated and the public fund misappropriated for the advancement of sects.

Take for illustration the schools of New York city. No one at all familiar with them can deny that nearly all of them, in one way and another are made the avenues of religious instruction. By the reading of the Bible, by the adoption of text books with religious peculiarities, by the singing of religious hymns, by the frequent speeches of ministers a religious character is given to the schools which has awakened the indignant protests of large bodies of citizens. Not only have the Jews and the Catholics found cause for complaint, but especially have the champions of free-thought and liberal ideas have had good cause to protest that the public funds were used to teach ideas worthy only an age of ignorance and superstition, instead of unfolding to the young the various arguments that are advanced for conflicting theories of creation and the Universe, which would be the only fair method. If anything was to be taught on the subject, the public public schools countenance an exploded and superstitious theology.

An appropriate illustration of the non-progressive character of government education as seen in the extraordinary efforts made by Prof. Doremus, in the New York College, is reconciled literally to the Mosaic account of the creation with the undisputed revelations of modern science, and this, too, at a time when the scientific world almost en masse is of the opinion that the Mosaic account is more poetic and imaginative than literally true. Prof. Doremus seems animated by a conviction that it is his duty to brave the decision of the scientific world, and to endeavor to inculcate in the minds of his people a theory of the creation which the weight of scientific wisdom most unquestionably condemns. There are even pulpits now where the Mosaic account is not taught as literally true, and it is enough questioned by modern research to make any course of education incomplete which does not fairly state both sides of the question. It is undoubtedly most unfair for such partisan and one-sided views as those taught by Prof. Doremus to be imparted at the public expense, and to be taught with the sanction of government endorsement.

Look at the books of the schools, and you will see how large a proportion of them are productions of "Reverends" and D.D.'s, who audaciously and pertinaciously obtrude their antiquated superstitions at the public expense—a proceeding, in fact, when analyzed, will be found to be merely an ingenious form of theft. Every dollar of the public money expended for this method of instruction is forcibly taken from the taxpayers, on the false pretense of secular education.

Of course it is agreed in palliation of these outrages that they are matters of detail, that they are purely personal offenses. But it may justly be replied that these things make their appearance in all systems of public education, and may properly be attributed to such systems of which they are the natural result. The temptation of public officials to advance their own peculiar ideas at the public expense is irresistible, and the school officer will invariably introduce his pastor or his priest into the schools, so that in some localities we have the Protestant Bible and the parson, and in another the Duay Bible and the priest impudently obtruded in schools paid for by the taxes wrung from those who have no reverence for either Bible, parson or priest.

The theory of our government is the entire separation of Church and State. We have a constitution without God in it, and the laws of the State forbid the further appropriation of the public funds for religious purposes, common justice requires that in further particulars the letter of the law is to be observed, and we are to have public schools that shall be in fact as well as in theory, purely secular.

It is a common thing when anything is said against the public school system to raise the cry of "Catholic" and "popery," and to declare that the opposition to the public school system arise from Catholic antipathy to all education whatever, and a Catholic desire to keep the people in ignorance. Such a cry comes with an ill grace in a community like this, where the Catholics in addition to the burden of taxation for public schools have borne the burden of private schools, which in the city of New York alone, have taught annually 50,000 scholars. True, a part of the expenses of this has heretofore been taken from the public purse. True, the enactment of recent laws rendering such an appropriation of public funds impossible has caused the Catholics to desire the merging of their schools with the public schools. But the broad fact remains that the Catholics in common with the Jews and the Freethinkers have had just cause of complaint at the administration of the public school system.

And here may be noticed a very great misapprehension of the pending project for the absorption of the Catholic parochial schools with the public school system of New York. The plan is regarded by many as a Jesuitical attempt to evade the law and to secure the surreptitious use of the public funds for the purpose of advancing the interest of the Catholic Church. If this charge could be substantiated, and a plan of union should be adopted that should give any reasonable ground for the belief that such an object was intended none could oppose and denounce it more than myself. Such a course would be entirely foreign to the spirit of our government, and should be opposed by all lovers of liberty and progress. But I don't so regard it. I look upon the abolition of Catholic schools as a step in advance. I cannot think that those 50,000 Catholic children could be taken out of the influence of a distinctively Catholic tuition and placed under a pure secular method of instruction it would be a step forward. It would be an improvement upon the religious education they have heretofore had; and instead of opposing it, I should think Protestants would hail it as a measure of progress. It is lessening the power of the priest, and weakening the power of the Catholic Church. No more convincing proof of the fact that such would be the result is needed than the violent opposition to the measure that is manifested in the Catholic Church itself.

It is true, that this opposition is believed to be insincere, and many clear-headed, sensible people are of the opinion that the plan is only a subterfuge to make the public pay for Catholic education. But I must say I regard such fears as groundless, and I have no dread that our public officers would dare to so palpably betray their trust, or fly in the face of common sense, common justice and the unmistakably expressed will of the people of this State, as expressed in the recent Constitutional Amendment.

Indeed, the plan has already been tried in Poughkeepsie, with marked success. The Catholic schools there were placed in the charge of public school officers and conducted by them. Permission was given to the Catholics to conduct religious service in school buildings outside of school hours, the attendance of pupils being voluntary. The result was that very few pupils remained, and the priests mumbled their mockeries to a beggarly account of empty benches. The practical result in the case being that fewer children have received Catholic religious teaching every day. I see no reason why the same result would not occur here. So far as we are advised of the union of the Catholic parochial schools with the public schools, I can see in it only a confession of the weakness on the part of the Catholics. But it must be borne in mind, that my approval of the plan is based solely on the supposition that it can be accomplished by making them so far as the public administration of them is concerned, purely secular, according to law.

But, if the public school could be made purely secular, if the course of education in them could be made such that its considerable class of citizens could take offense on the ground of their religious bias, I should still claim that the public school system is not the best system, because it is not the attractive system, nor consistent with the most advanced ideas of liberty and progress. I do not believe that education is the business of the State at all. There is no more sense in having the government attend to education, than it is for the government to attend to food and clothing and amusements, for all these are equally as indispensable as education; indeed they are a very large part of education. There is no argument in favor of a government school that does not equally point to the justification for a government shoe-shop, or a government lodging-house, or a government theatre. All these things are equally necessary for civilized society, and to the promotion of good citizens.

It is now a received axiom by the most advanced authorities upon the subject of government that anything which can best be done by the individual had better be done by the individual.

The question then is simply this: Can education be best promoted by the government, or by individual effort? Which is the best method? Let us not lose sight of that. We are discussing simply a question of method. What is the best plan for securing the utmost education? Is it best that government should take charge of this important matter? Let us see. So far as I am able to judge, the government system fails in every essential requisite of education.

No more signal proof of the utter failure of government education could be offered than the startling fact that we see every-where the movement for compulsory education. It is thus admitted that the very class for which, above all others, the public system is maintained, are not now attracted to it, but must be forcibly brought in by the use of the policeman's club! Has it, indeed, come to this? Is there in fact so little dependence to be placed upon the natural affection of parents, that the brute force of the policeman can be made to take its place? Can we place any reliance on the education and progress which is to be thus secured? Have we any reasonable hope of making good citizens by this summary and tyrannical method? Why Prussia and Austria, and even China, have tried it for generations. Is there anything in their success that the free American citizen should envy? If there is, then is our centennial a mockery, and the sooner we get a tyranny the better?

Suppose, for an instant, that you can drag into the public schools the children of the very poor, who are now assisting to support their parents? Suppose you can drag in the scum and offscourings of the cities, what then? Where does the government duty end? Will not the same train of reasoning that has justified the bringing of these classes into the public schools also justify the clothing and feeding of them, so that they can take the benefit of public education? Where is the line to be drawn? Will the child be less likely to steal when it has learned the multiplication table? Must the State furnish subsistence until the pupil has passed through a college course?

Why, the fact that there are so many neglected children, is one of the natural outcomings of this infernal theory, that it is the duty of the State to perform the duties of the parent. The whole system of public education has a pernicious effect for this very reason, that it weakens parental responsibility, and offers a premium to bring children into the world for others to take care of. While the children are being educated by the State, the parents are being educated in neglecting their parental duties, and quieting their consciences by the monstrous assumption that it is the business of society to do their work for them.

What is the reason why so many children now, as in Shakespeare's time, are creeping like snails unwillingly to school? Why, it is simply because the pretense of the necessity for the public school is entirely lost sight of in the administration of the school. Instead of the very poor and ragged and mischievous being welcomed and specially cared for and attracted, they find that it is the children of the rich and the politicians who are petted and cared for; that the pupils who have the best natural capacity are put forward and held up as the results of the teacher's skill, while the dull-brained and backward, for whom, on the same principle the teacher ought to take discredit, are discouraged and dispirited.

Is there any pretense that our public school teachers are selected for the fitness to teach, or is it not rather notorious that too many of them are merely the creatures of political favoritism.

Look at our school boards! Are they generally composed of educated, upright, moral citizens, or are they not too often scheming politicians who are anxious to get their relatives into good positions, or to get commissions for the introduction of school books, or to profit by the purchase of school sites and school buildings? The history of private efforts in teaching is replete with instances of the successful education of ragged urchins and street waifs by the intelligent use of attractive methods. Have we seen anything like it in the public system? Not much. The failure is confessed by this insane outcry for a compulsory education.

Did I say insane outcry for public education? Why insanity is too distinguished an appellation for that presumes the pre-existence of more intellect. I should rather say it is idiotic. It is idiotic to suppose that government control of a child for six hours out of the twenty-four is enough to make good citizens—even though the six hours were judiciously employed. If government ought to take care of the child during these six hours of the day, there is so much the more reason why government ought to take care of the child the other eighteen hours. Let the advocates of the public system be consistent, then, and establish the government nursery at once.

The government system is a confessed failure because the best schools and colleges are private institutions, which have quietly but securely been established in accordance with the natural laws of supply and demand, and were the all-powerful forces of competition allowed free play, there is every reason to suppose that, in the eager strife to secure the cheapest and best that has done so much for us in other departments of social life, would give us the cheapest and best education by private effort.

The government system is a system of stagnation; it is essentially non-progressive, and unequal to the demands of the times. Witness the wonderful growth of commercial schools in all parts of the country, supplying a want that would be supplied above all others by the public system, if there was the slightest spark of common sense in it.

Suppose it admitted that it is the duty of the government to educate the street Arabs, would it not be common sense to teach them how to get a living honestly, first and foremost? But does the government do that? It makes soldiers at West Point, and sailors at Annapolis, and is going to make sailors in New York, but as yet finds no warrant for instruction in the peaceful arts.

O, yes, they do teach short-hand in the New York college. But mark the idiotic plan of it; if a student takes the advanced course, he is not permitted to learn short-hand, while if he stays only a year and learns minor branches, they teach him short-hand. The very reverse should be the case, as a good short-hand writer must be a person of advanced education. But I shall be told this is a matter of detail. I tell you it is a straw which shows the way the wind blows, and is illustrative of the idiotic way of doing things by government.

This idea of the necessity of government doing so much for the individual, is an old and absurd notion. It belongs to the time when government regulated the style of clothing, the quality of diet, the hour of going to bed, or the standard of religious truth. It is totally at variance with all true ideas of progress. We are in a sad way, indeed, if the best we can do is to have our hot-house politicians attend to education for us. Why, there is hardly one of the school boards that does not suggest the "Rogue's Gallery." They are so proverbially ignorant that one of the illustrated papers made a palpable hit by a picture representing a scholar at a spelling-match saying to a member of the school board: "Now, sir, let us give you some words."

Nothing could be more preposterous than the absurd notion that public school education prevents crime. The advocates of education by government are never tired of compiling statistics to show that education prevents crime. But the statistics, as usual in cases where anything is to be proved, are not all on one side. The fact is, that reliable statistics are available to show that education does not prevent crime. Mr. Spencer has cited a number of them in his work on "Social Statics." The New York School Journal some time since had a curious article to the same purport, based on the police statistics of New York city. But the most striking article on the subject appeared in the New York Daily Times of Sunday before last, (May 2d, 1875,) reviewing the joint reports of the Register-General for England and the Register-General for Ireland for the year 1872. I will not recapitulate the figures, which are full of interest. But the Times, in commenting upon them, uses this extraordinary language:

"As it stands, the report shows the Irish to be the worst educated, but the most virtuous and the most healthy, despite all that has been said about their miseries. It shows the Scotch to be the best educated, but the most given to immorality."

The total number of arrests in New York city in the year 1871-2, according to the report of the Board of Police, was 84,514, and out of this number only 3,423 were unable to read and write, and 3,423 were unable to write, but could read. Thus, in round numbers, 77,000 out of 84,000 persons arrested, possessed the rudiments of knowledge.

We are apt to place undue value upon the knowledge of books, upon the mere acquisition of facts, to make the mistake of supposing the mind to be a vessel to be filled, rather than an organism to be improved by exercise and nutrition to inform the mind rather than to reform it, to instruct rather than to educate. There is a vast amount of purposeless, aimless, objectless teaching and learning in the public schools necessarily resulting from such a wholesale system.

But, the idea that the public school system is the cheapest is fallacious. Whatever is gained by purchasing at wholesale, is lost by extravagant, unnecessary and injudicious purchases by the same jobbery, speculation and corruption that characterizes other departments of government. The most that the government can do is to return to the people what they take away in taxes—minus the cost of administration. How could it be economical when all the tendencies are due to extravagance? Think of the vast political machines that the department of education can be made with its appointment of 200,000 teachers, and the expenditure of $70,000,000 annually. Is it possible that the public schools shall progress and improve when they have to go through the dirty medium of politics? There can be no question, that if the matter of education were left open to free competition a much more efficient and cheaper method would naturally result.

Do you think the poor would not be provided for under a free voluntary system? You need have no fear that human sympathy is to be extinguished, that benevolence will cease. The very public sentiment that now sustains the public school system would see to it, that the needful education was supplied to all. Only this would result, that instead of having their charity done for them by government, people would, by the exercise of it themselves learn to be more truly charitable and benevolent. There is no danger that human sympathy can be extinguished by act of the Legislature. But there is danger that by the too free use of government charity, a premium shall be offered to laziness, and men be encouraged to expend on rum, tobacco and dissipation the money that should be devoted to the education of their children. Do you say that without the public school system there would be less education? I declare that there would be more and better, because no act of the Legislature can either make or diminish parental solicitude. Neither is there any ground for the belief that there is a sufficient excess of parental forethought and discrimination in politicians to make up for the want of it in parents. If the seed is bad, there is no hope of making a sound plant grow by government aid. If the seed is good—not even government prohibition will prevent its growing and fructifying—the very birds shall carry it to congenial soil, and the birds carry it to the mountain top.

There is the same warrant for a public school that there is for a public almshouse, and no more. The principle of the two is the same, and the time will yet come when people will have the same chance for sending their children to the public school that they could have for sending them to the almshouse. There is no sense in pursuing the same plan with the children who are willing and anxious to attend school, and those who are reluctant and unappreciating. The public sentiment that sustains free schools is erroneous. If education is worth having, it is worth paying for. Of course it is paid for, and more than paid for by the majority of those who attend; and as to them the name "free school" is a misnomer. There is no reason why it should not be just as discreditable to attend a public school as a public almshouse; the discredit arising not from an undervaluation of education, but rather from a full appreciation of it.

To say that the state can manufacture good citizens by the mere process of intellectual education is to confess a total misconception of the process by which good citizens are made. If the state is to go into the business of making good citizens it must begin earlier than the schools, and continue the work longer. It must see to it that children are born only of healthy parents, that they have the best of clothes and food; that they have healthy sleeping rooms; that they are surrounded by good associations; harmless recreations, stimulants to the acquisition of knowledge; that their natural powers are noted and developed; that they waste no time in the vain endeavor to do what they have no natural capacity to perform; that they are provided with some honest means of obtaining a livelihood; that they are judiciously and happily married. All of these matters are essential in the formation of good moral citizens. And any argument that it is the duty of the state to attend to any one of these matters will equally apply to any of the rest. But, for the State to attend to any of them is too do for the individual, what the individual can best do for himself—an interference with the order of nature that merely retards instead of accelerating progress.

Why the bees that were imported to Barbadoes, instead of making honey went to loafing around the sugar houses, because they found their honey ready-made. The English sparrows in New York city have been pampered and fed until they have no stomach for the angle worms, and prefer to loaf in their comfortable houses. Even our horses have become demoralized so that they take cold and have to be doctored. So universal is the law, that the more you do for people, the less will they be likely to do for themselves.

Our Reformers have got things twisted. The fact is, that instead of the government making the people, it is the people who make the government. According to the census of 1870, in a total population of thirty-eight millions, over ten millions are set down as illiterate, and over a million and a half of them vote. The problem is: what shall we do with them? There they are in their ignorance. Here are we with our knowledge—What shall we do with them? Can it be possible that the sum of our intelligence can only determine upon sending forth the policeman with his club to compel them to be educated? Oh shame upon the 19th century if this is the best that we can do. Oh lame and impotent conclusion that compulsory education is our only refuge!

No, Americans, it is not true. But rather it is true that our only hope is in making education attractive, in presenting its advantages so that year by year the masses shall see more and more that it is to their interest, in the broadest sense of the term, to be educated, in separating the great business of education from the dirty routine of politics, in stimulating an honorable competition that shall secure the very best system of education, in encouraging parents to pay for the education of their own children, with a firm reliance upon the never-failing fountain of human sympathy to render sufficient aid to the unfortunate.

Dr. R. T. HALLOCK followed the lecture in defense of the public school system and of compulsory education.

Mr. JOHNSON followed in the same vein, and defended teachers from the criticisms that had been made upon them. He knew many who were self-denying and devoted to their avocation.

Mr. DAWSON dissented entirely from the lecturer, and had heard but little he could approve. He eulogized our public school system in glowing language.

Mr. DUGDALE, Dr. GUNN, Mrs. HALLOCK, Dr. LAMBERT and another gentleman continued the debate, some for and some against our common school system, and for and against compulsory education.

Mr. ORMSBY closed, advocating that children be taught habits of useful industry, as well as other branches of education, to the exclusion of the moral cesspools of antiquated theologies and pernicious sectarianism now taught in our schools, at the cost of the general public.

[TWO HUNDRED AND NINETY-THIRD MEETING]

Mr. J. B. HODGSKIN read a very interesting paper on "Darwinism!"

but for want of room we can only give detached parts of it.

Among the feeblest and most ignorant of human races now existing, knowledge has barely reached to a consciousness of the most simple wants, and to the means of satisfying them. They have no thought of their origin, or of their present existence, or of their future. They are so ignorant that they have not discovered the Unknowable. They know of no Creator, no Deity, no future life. But as their knowledge grows, they learn that there are other powers besides their own. They notice that they do not control their own health or their own sickness, that they cannot influence the growth of their crops or the straying of their cattle. Their first knowledge of their impotence is their first lesson in the Unknowable, is the first feeble growth of their religion. But what a religion! To them the Unknowable finds a lodgement in a stone, a stick, a tree, a bunch of leaves, the withered ear of a dead animal. "The negro of Guinea beats his fetish if his prayers are not complied with, and hides it in his waist-cloth if about to do anything of which he is ashamed."

But as knowledge progresses, men learn that the sun and moon and stars exert over them and their affairs an influence which they do not understand; or they are driven into abject terror by the superior power of savage animals; or they perceive that other animals are beneficial to them by destroying their enemies; or they are struck with wonder at the light and warmth of fire, which consumes the hardest substances and then vanishes itself; and thus to them the sun and moon and stars become objects of wonder, before which they prostrate themselves in humiliation and submission, and do worship. Thus men worship fire and the elements, the serpent or the crocodile, the ibis or the ox.

And as, age after age, men learn that beyond the powers they once worshiped there are other powers stronger than the first, and as in each step of progress the powers they learn to recognize are higher and more mysterious than those they have abandoned, so with each step of progress in knowledge, man's sense of humility and dependence increases, his religion becomes ennobled, his worship refined, his theology more impressive, his morality more practical, his life more virtuous. Regard it, as we will, whether we look amongst the lowest type of savages or amongst the most civilized races of men, increased knowledge ever means increased recognition of the Unknowable, increased humility and greater virtue.

Yet the theologians of our day would teach us that there is a conflict between science and religion! There is a conflict! But it is not a conflict between science and religion. It is a conflict between science and their religion; a conflict between science and a false dogma of their religion; a dogma which they have set up without warrant, without humility, but in ignorance and unconscious selfishness and undiscovered pride; the dogma that the boundaries between science and religion are fixed, and that they are the divinely appointed guardians to see that the boundaries are not transgressed. In their blindness, they fail to see that every growth of knowledge is a growth of faith; that the farther we extend the sphere of the known the farther do we extend the unknowable; that all progress in religion is based upon progress in knowledge; and that in barring out science they are setting a limit to the growth of true religion.

Science during the last few years has made great strides. It has lifted a veil from some few parts of the unknowable; has brought within the sphere of knowledge a wide field that, but a few years since, lay within the realms of faith. Within the last twenty years science has uncovered, revealed more of the impenetrable mystery of man's existence than has been revealed in all the ages of the past. It has revealed to us mysteries that have for thousands of years been objects of man's worship; and from out of its revelations the mystery of the Unknowable rises afresh a million-fold greater magnitude, man sinks afresh in humility, more deep and more sincere, and recognizes a "sway and sovereign empire" more just, more powerful, more benevolent, more conceivable than has yet been taught by any religion upon earth.

Take a tiny drop of water. Examine it under the microscope. It is a world within itself. Full of life, animal life; things that are born and die; that breathe and eat and live, quarrel and fight; that prey upon one another and devour one another, that have offspring like unto themselves, who in their turn breathe and eat and live and die and perish and decay—all within that tiny globule of water. And of such drops of water millions fall upon a space no bigger than your hand, and a million of your hands would not cover half an acre of ground. And what is half an acre of ground compared to the size of this city, this State, this continent—and this continent is but a small portion of the surface of our globe. Yet upon every hand's breadth, every half acre, every city, every State, over the whole continent, over the entire surface of our globe rain falls nearly every day, millions upon millions of drops upon every hand's breadth, and every drop full of life, full of beings that live and eat and struggle and die and perish and decay.

Watch the motes dancing in a sunbeam. Let a ray of sunlight fall athwart a darkened room through a tiny opening in the shutter. Watch it. It seems at first but a spray of light. Look more closely and you will see it move; it is full of life. So closely packed with moving particles, you wonder how they all find room; you think you can grasp them with your hand. You have, perhaps, been told that what you see are particles of dust afloat. But closely examined you will find that mingled with the particles of dust are innumerable, countless organisms, which, like the organisms in the water-drop, though different, have life and growth and motion, and breed and increase and die, passing into our lungs at every breath, passing out as we exhale, sometimes the same, sometimes changed, sometimes harmless, sometimes bringing discomfort or disease, sometimes death. And as that little ray of sunlight which you see through the crevice in the shutter is filled with life, as is every particle of air, within the whole room, throughout the house, the streets, the fields, over the broad prairie, the seemingly limitless expanse of the wide ocean, the whole globe, and for miles up into the spheres, as far as our atmosphere extends—life everywhere, life inconceivable, life omnipresent!

A grain of sand is but a dead, lifeless thing. It seems so, but it is not. The smallest grain of sand that is visible to the eye, or that even the microscope can scarcely reveal in its infinitesimal insignificance, is full of life—life like the light in the sunbeam, life like the life in the water-drop, different, but still full of life. Each grain of sand, though never so still to our imperfect eye, is yet ever in motion. Each grain is incessantly struggling to unite with every other grain of its own kind, or to commingle with other grains of different kinds, and so lose its own identity, or its struggles to come into contact with air, with the oxygen of the air, to breathe it, to absorb it, to burn in it, and thus to change its life. And all these various tendencies or struggles constitute the life of the grain of sand, and such life is in each of them and in all the varied elements that constitute the solid portion of the earth. And this life is incessantly moving them upon the earth in myriads of various ways—in one place untold billions of grains growing faster to one another, growing together into close, compact masses and forming immense layers of stone and rock beneath, and in the course of ages forcing them all into different shape and forms and pressing them hither and thither, at one time raising continents from beneath the sea, and again submerging them until the waters overflow; at one time forcing out the molten fires from below into fierce outbursts of volcanic fury; or again raising up by the irresistible force of their silent pressure gigantic mountain ranges reaching to the skies. And every grain of sand at the bottom of the sea, and every particle of earth upon the plain and boulder upon the hill-side, every mountain towering into the heavens is thus full of such life, ever in motion, full of tendencies as irresistible as the desires and tendencies of the living beings in the water and in the air.

How small is a drop of water compared with a little stream, a river, a lake, the ocean that covers more than half the globe! How infinitely small the ray of sunlight in your room compared to the miles of atmosphere that envelop the entire earth! How small the grain of sand compared to the bed of the sea, the vast desert, the snow-clad mountain ranges, the deeps upon deeps that fill the bowels of the earth! Yet, as the drop of water or the grain of sand compared to our entire globe, so our entire globe itself is but as a drop of water, or grain of sand, compared with the magnitude of the visible Universe. Millions of globes like our own move around the heavens, career with a rapidity inconceivable to us around our sun, millions of miles distant; while our sun itself, with all its countless millions of earth surrounding it, itself careers as but one of other millions around some other still more distant sun, of such infinite magnitude, such unfathomable distance, that our miserable, puny thought is palsied in the mere effort to conceive it. Yet this distant sun, around which our sun careers through space, and all the millions of earths and stars that career with it, and each globule of air on each, each grain of sand on each, each drop of water on each, is full to overflowing with life, and all this life obeys one law, the law of our Creator. Where, in all the teachings of revealed religion do you find an illustration more sublime of the omnipotence of the Creator, of the insignificance of man than in this lesson taught by science?

Not, however, for the sole purpose of presenting to you this illustration, striking as it is, of the religious picture of science, have I sought to bring before you this teaching of the endless wealth of life that pervades the universe. I have at the same time been introducing you unawares to the first principles of Darwinism, the theory of science that has done more to excite the conflict between Science and Religion than all the scientific discoveries of the last three centuries. The first principle, the first assertion, the first fact or corner stone of Darwinism is this: that the whole universe is full of life, not full only in the ordinary sense of the word, as holding much life, but full in the absolute sense of the word, so full that it can hold no more. This, idea of the earth being so full of life that it can hold no more is probably startling to many of you. It seems especially striking here, where we are surrounded by so much vacant land—but it is nevertheless true, and is the starting point of Darwin's theory. Let me illustrate. And here allow me to state that I do not propose to enter into a scientific discussion of Darwinism, but merely to offer you a popular and intelligible explanation of its essential principles. To illustrate, then, the fullness of the earth with life:

We speak of our vast, uncultivated Western prairies, that might afford a home for countless millions. To settle these with populous towns, and raise upon them immense crops of grain and vast herds of cattle, certainly seems like adding an immensity of life to what before was lifeless. But it is in truth not so. Before the white man can live upon the plains, he must first drive out the Indian; before our same cattle can graze there, the deer, antelope and buffalo must first die out; before our grain can thrive, the rich grass of the prairie must be destroyed as a weed, the flight of prairie chickens and quail, and the swarms of hares and pheasants and locusts and the thousands of beasts and birds and insects must be exterminated; the existing forms of life must give way first before other forms of life can have their being. All change is but the extermination of what was, and the substitution of what is; all progress is but the removal of the old, the upgrowth of the new. No infusion is born within the water-drop, but deprives some other of a portion of its life; no leaf of grass grows but what dooms some other leaf to droop and die; no animal draws its first breath but what it takes from some other mouth a portion of its accustomed food; no man is born to life but what some other life—not necessarily a human life—must yield to give it place. Where the numbers of men increase, trees must decrease; wherever man makes his home, wild animals must die out; wherever man raises a crop, all other flowers, and shrubs and herbs, and grasses of the field are doomed as weeds. There is no room for new life, except where old life makes room by death. It is in this sense that the earth is full of life, so full that it can hold no more.

Yet the increase of life is almost more startling than the fullness of it. If there were but one pair of fish in the ocean, and all their progeny reached the term of their natural life, in a few hundred years they would fill the sea and overflow to the land. If there were but one pair of pigeons in the air, and all their young should reach maturity, in a few centuries they would be numerous enough to shut out the sunlight. If there were but one pair of man, and all their children lived and grew, and lived out man's allotted term, in four or five thousand years neither earth nor sea would afford them standing-room. "There is no exception to this rule, that every organic being naturally increases at so high a rate, that if not destroyed the earth would soon be covered with the offspring of a single pair."

The earth is full of life. Yet in every instant of time new millions are born into life, but few of which could live were they even born into a world unoccupied. It is evident that of these countless millions born, but few survive. Yet all are gifted alike with the desire to live, the love of life, which is the very essence of existence. All enter, the very moment of their birth, into what Darwin calls "the struggle for existence," the race for life. The essential fact is, that more are born than can live. The essential question is: Who shall survive?

Have you ever seen two grains of corn exactly alike? Have you ever seen two leaves of a tree that did not somewhat differ? Have you ever known two animals, horses, dogs, cats, so much alike, that you could not tell them apart? Did you ever see two persons who resembled one another so much that you could not distinguish them when you saw them together? Never! neither you have, nor has anyone else. No two animals, or plants, or human beings are precisely alike in outward appearance and the difference in the outward appearance are only another expression of similar differences of character and disposition. Of the organisms born each instant into life, no two of any one kind are ever precisely alike. No matter how slight the difference, it will be there, a difference of some kind or other and it is this difference which determines who of them shall survive. Let me illustrate: The largest number of all new born organisms is destroyed by being devoured as food by other larger organisms. If any animal differs from others of its species ever so slightly in a manner that helps it to escape from its persecutors, its chances of life are thereby increased.

The young of the fox, for example, are preyed upon by a great variety of carnivorous birds. It is well known that most birds of prey discover their food by sight. Now the young of the fox are of all shades of dark grey, almost black, to light grey and nearly perfect white. It is evident that those among the young foxes, all other things being equal, whose color is most easily seen, will be most readily caught, will have the least chance to survive. If it is a northern region, where the ground is covered with snow nine months of the year, the black or dark grey fox will be seen from a great distance, will be easily followed, pursued and taken; while the light grey or white fox, almost the same color as the snow, will be less readily seen, will have a better chance to hide, to elude his pursuers, to escape and live.

After the lecture a spirited discussion was participated in by Mr. WILCOX, DR. HALLOCK, PROF. VANDERWEYDE and Mr. HODGSKIN. The whole was particularly interesting to the full audience in attendance.

THE Rev. J. L. Howell, a Presbyterian pastor in Minneapolis, Minn., hung himself a few days ago. Within a year his wife had been found dead in her bed, one daughter had been drowned, and another had been thrown from a horse and killed. These afflictions had greatly depressed him. It is to be feared Providence did not pay much attention to that family.

Constitution of the United States, with Amendments, the whole action of the Government in relation to Reconstruction and the Freeman, Seals of the different States, with descriptions, etc.

There is no class of the community, male or female, who have, or expect to have any property, or who have any rights or privileges which require protection, who will not be greatly benefited and advantaged by the possession of the book. It will save them money, save them trouble, save them time, save them litigation and lawyers' fees, and give them information which nobody can afford to be without.

We have no hesitation in saying that this Work will be found the most comprehensive, reliable, and indispensable BUSINESS MAN'S GUIDE ever published in this or any other country; in fact, a work which individuals in any class, in any community, cannot afford to be without.

As an attest of what we state, we refer to the free encomiums of the leading press of this country; or to any of the 100,000 individuals who have purchased the present edition, and have had occasion to use the work, or have taken the trouble to examine it.

A Few Extracts from the Many Flattering Notices of the Press.

Wells' Every Man his Own Lawyer, and Business Form Book. New York: John G. Wells. As a legal adviser always at hand to instruct the reader how to proceed in suits and business transactions of all kinds; as a form book, to enable the best learned to draw deeds, mortgages, leases, orders, wills, etc.; as a guide in regard to the laws of the various States, concerning exemptions, liens, limitations of actions, and so on, the volume in question is certainly invaluable to men of business; and it is not surprising that a hundred thousand copies soon found their way into the homes and counting-houses of the multitude. Here we have not only all the various changes in the laws of the different States; the Patent Laws, the Pension Laws, the Homestead Laws, the Internal Revenue Laws, etc., with full instructions to all who may be interested in them. The publisher has been determined to make this work complete, and, to our thinking, he has succeeded. No business man or woman can with safety be without a copy of it.—New York Times.

This work has been received with great favor, and attained a large sale. The most implicit confidence can be placed upon the work as an authority on all the subjects which it treats.—Philadelphia Age.

As to the utility and convenience of this work to all business men, there can be no question.—Chicago Republican.

It is in fact, a book filled with the most valuable information for every citizen: you can purchase in this book what may be worth hundreds of dollars to you.—St. Louis Dispatch.

It is emphatically of the highest utility to every man, be our business what it may.—Pittston Gazette.

For every-day reference we have found it the most convenient of all books. For practical utility to every one cannot be over-estimated. Men of every class will find in this work just what they want, plainly, clearly, and practically stated.—Bangor Democrat.

This excellent work should be in the hands of every farmer and business man.—Cincinnati Times.

The work embraces 650 large 12mo pp. and is printed on fine paper, handsomely bound.

A NEW BOOK. THE Doctrine of Descent AND DARWINISM.

By PROF. OSCAR SCHMIDT, of the University of Strasburg.

This is No. 13 of Appleton's International Scientific Series, and is not excelled by any one of its fellows, and is richly worthy the perusal of every enquiring mind. It is a work of 334 pages, 12 mo., and contains twenty-six illustrations. It is an elaborate review and survey of the whole subject of Evolution and Darwin's special philosophy, giving in clear language a comprehensive view of the subject.

It is eminently a whole library in one volume, and we recommend it in the highest terms. Sent by mail. Price, $1.50; postage, 15 cts. Address, Eating For Strength.

A NEW HEALTH COOKERY BOOK.

By M. L. HOLBROOK, M.D.

Which should be in the hands of every person who would eat to retain and regain health, strength and beauty. It contains, besides the science of eating and one hundred answers to questions which most people are anxious to know, nearly one hundred pages devoted to the best healthful recipes for foods and drinks, how to feed one's self, feeble babes and delicate children so as to get the best bodily development. Mothers who cannot nurse their children will find full directions for feeding them, and so will mothers who have delicate children, and invalids who wish to know the best foods.

THE Boston Investigator!

THE OLDEST REFORM JOURNAL
IN THE UNITED STATES

Will commence its 45th year April 18, 1875.
PUBLISHED EVERY WEDNESDAY

at 84 Washington street, Boston, Mass., by JOSIAH P. MENDUM.

HORACE SEAVER, Editor.

PRICE: $3.50 per annum. Single copies, 7 cents. Specimen copies sent on receipt of a Two-Cent Stamp to pay the postage.

The Investigator is devoted to the Liberal cause in religion; or, in other words, to Universal Mental Liberty. Independent in all its discussions, discarding superstitious theories of what never can be known it devotes its columns to things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who have entered its unknown shores. Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interest of this world, it confines itself to things of this life entirely. It will soon commence its FORTY-FIFTH year and asks for support from those who are fond of sound reasoning, good reading, reliable news, anecdotes, science, art, and a useful Family Journal. Reader, please send your subscriptions for six months or one year; and if you are not satisfied with the way the Investigator is conducted, we won't ask you to continue with us any longer. Now is the time to subscribe.

THE BHAGAVAD-GITA; Or, a Discourse on Divine Matters, between Krishna and Arjuna.

A SANSKRIT PHILOSOPHICAL POEM,

TRANSLATED, WITH COPIOUS NOTES, AN INTRODUCTION ON SANSKRIT PHILOSOPHY, AND OTHER MATTERS.

BY J. COCKBURN THOMSON,

MEMBER OF THE ASIATIC SOCIETY OF FRANCE, AND OF THE ANTIQUARIAN SOCIETY OF NORMANDY.

This work contains curious details of the Manners, Customs, Mythology, Worship, etc., of the Hindus. The principal design of these dialogues seems to have been to unite all the prevailing modes of worship of those days: the Brahmins esteem it to contain all the grand mysteries of their religion, and have exercised particular care to conceal it from the knowledge of those of a different persuasion.

The spirit of the age prompts thoughtful people to inquire into the traditions of the past. In doing so, it is found that Mythology has played her part well. The traditions of the fathers have been systematized by thoughtful men, from time to time, in different ages of the world. Later generations have believed such traditions, so systematized, to be nothing less than divine commands. Imaginary gods have been constructed, to whom the world has paid homage and divine honors.

If we receive as truth all that is believed by credulous devotees, the world has had numerous incarnate deities.

Those who have been educated to belief in the Christian religion, and to regard the gentle Nazarene as the only Son of God, take a very limited view of the various religious systems of the present and of the past ages.

Among the incarnate deities that different systems of religion have recognized as having existed, through omnipotent love for fallen humanity, by the overshadowing of females of vestal purity, Krishna was a character as important in the Brahminical system of religion, as Christ is "in the plan of salvation" instituted by the Jews' Great Jehovah, believed in by Christians.

His coming was foretold, even as was Christ's.

At the age of sixteen Krishna began to preach, and was, like Christ, the founder of a new religion.

Prior to the great Chicago fire, the Religio-Philosophical Publishing House published the Bhagavad-Gita, from a translation of the Sanskrit by that celebrated scholar, Charles Wilkins. Nearly two editions of that work were sold when the fire-flend came and destroyed the stereotype plates. The demand for the work being so great, we were induced to send to England for a copy of a more recent translation, by J. Cockburn Thomson, member of the Asiatic Society of France, and the Antiquarian Society of Normandy.

The translator accompanied the work with copious notes, which are doubtless of more or less value, as explanatory of the text, but the reader will take them for just what they are worth—nothing more is expected.

The text, as correctly translated, contains gems of thought, transmitted from antiquity, which are of real intrinsic value to the thoughtful people of the age, and to them the work is most respectfully recommended by the American publisher.

PRESS COMMENTS ON THE BHAGAVAD-GITA:

"More than ordinary care and trouble have been spent upon this work. It is in every way creditable to the scholarship and enterprise of the west."—Inter-Ocean.

"This curious volume purports to give a full and accurate compilation of the tenets taught by Krishna. . . . The text contains many brilliant thoughts, well worth the attention of the thoughtful student of history, literature or science."—Our Fireside Friend.

"This translation of a Hindoo poem, dedicated by Mr. Thomson to his sometime instructor, Professor Wilson of Oxford, is one of a class of works demanding all the consideration and assistance that scholars everywhere can afford. It belongs to a class of books believed by great numbers of our fellow-men to have been supernaturally inspired, and trusted by them for their guidance in the ways of this life, and for light to pierce the dividing darkness between death and a future existence. No such book can, in the nature of things, have been thus esteemed by rational beings without having in itself much that is intrinsically valuable for comfort and instruction in righteousness, or at least, considered at its lowest, much that is curious and suggestive, as affording insight into the desires and needs of the souls that found therein their bread and water of life."—Overland Monthly.

"This is an unusually interesting publication. Mr. Thomson has rendered good service to the more thoughtful class of readers. There is a peculiar charm about ancient literature of the profounder sort. The old Hindoos were an intellectual people. The poem before us is probably older than the time formerly fixed in Christian chronology for the creation of the world. It breathes a lofty spirit of unselfish devotion to good objects. We cannot refrain from complimenting the Religio-Philosophical Publishing House, upon giving to the public so excellent a book. . . . Grandly useful, especially as it is thoroughly indexed."—Chicago Evening Journal.

"A rare work from the ancient Sanskrit, in which will be found many of the religious ideas and notions which the Christian Church adopted long after. . . . It contains some 275 pages, printed on beautiful paper, and richly bound. . . . It is profusely supplied with notes, definitions, and explanations."—Truth Seeker.

"This is a rare book, which sheds more light upon the subjects of which it treats than any we have ever read. We heartily recommend it to those who wish to look into antiquity in regard to the religious views of a most remarkable people."—Samuel Watson, D.D., Editor Spiritual Magazine.

The book is a 12mo. of 278 pages, and the mechanical part is finished in a superior manner, being printed on heavy tinted paper, and bound in extra heavy cloth with richly illuminated back, borders and side title.

Correspondent Wanted.

A young man desires to correspond with a young lady, with a view to matrimony. One of Liberal views preferred.

Odds and Ends.

To get on the wrong tack: Start barefooted on a tour through a newly carpeted bedroom in the dark.

"MARRY a widow! Not I!" said Matilda. "Babies are like tooth-brushes. Everybody wants her own."

A VIRGINIA photographer can take photographs in the night. He took 150 from a brother artist, and was then taken to jail.

"THE prisoner has a very smooth countenance." "Yes; he was ironed just before he was brought in. That accounts for it."

A CRUSTY old bachelor says that love is a wretched business, consisting of a little sighing, a little crying, a little dying and a deal of lying.

"Sinful sectarianism" is what a Unitarian theological student called it because a Methodist girl refused to let him hug her in a camp-meeting tent.

MRS. PARDINGTON writes that she doesn't see what fun there can be in spelling matches, about which all the papers are full. She always spells them m-a-t-c-h-e-s.

"EVERY tree is subject to disease," said a speaker in a fruit-grower's convention. "What ailment can you find on an oak?" asked the chairman. "A-corn," was the triumphant reply.

THIS conundrum is respectfully submitted to the best speller: If s-i-o-u-x spells su, and e-y-e spells i, and s-i-g-h-e-d spells side, why doesn't s-i-o-u-x-e-y-e-s-i-g-h-e-d spell suicide?

We saw a young lady this morning wearing a pretty badge lettered "Press." But we didn't.—Biddeford Times.

We would have been a better man in his place.—Boston News.

A MAN recently arrested for being the husband of four wives, says he has no recollection of having married so many times, and thinks it must have happened while he was away from home.

PHYSICIAN—"Why don't you set a bound to your drinking, and not exceed it?" Patient—"So I do, old fellow, so I do; but then, you see, it's so far off, that I always get drunk before I reach it."

OLD lady to her niece—"Goodness gracious, Matilda! but it's cold. My teeth are actually chattering." Loving niece—"Well, don't let them chatter too much, or they may tell where you bought 'em."

AN ingenious observer has discovered that there is a remarkable resemblance between a baby and wheat, since it is first cradled, then "thrashed," and finally becomes the "flour" of the family.

OVER the shop door of a pork butcher in an English village in an eastern country may be seen a sign-board representing a man in a black coat brandishing a hatchet, with the inscription, "John Smith kills pigs like his father."

A TEACHER in one of the Port Jervis public school was last week explaining to the children that usually all words ending with "let" meant something small, as streamlet, rivulet, hamlet, etc. Whereupon a smart boy wanted to know if hamlet meant a small ham!

"My dear," said an affectionate husband, "I'm surprised that you will consent to the degradation of wearing another woman's hair on your head." "Is that any worse than your wearing another sheep's wool on your back?" retorted the affectionate wife.

"Ah!" said a teacher, "ah, Caroline Jones, what do you think you would have been without your good father and pious mother?" "I suppose, mam," said Caroline, who was very much struck with the soft appeal, "I suppose, mam, as I should have been a orphan."

WE regret to hear that the New Haven girls are breaking off their marriage engagements with theological students, and looking around for "heaven" husbands. They seem to have an idea that theology in these later days is a trifle too much leavened with "true inwardness."

AN Arkansas youth came to his father and said: "Dad, they ain't knives enuff to sot the table." Dad—"Whar's big butch, little butch, the case, cob-handle, granny's knife, and the one I handled yesterday? That's enuff to sot any gentleman's table, without you've lost um."

INSPECTOR (who notices a backwardness in history)—Who signed Magna Charta? (No answer.) Inspector (more urgently)—Who signed Magna Charta? (No answer.) Inspector (angrily)—Who signed Magna Charta? Scapegrace (thinking matters are beginning to look serious)—Please, sir, 'twasn't me, sir!—Punch.

A RED haired lady, who was ambitious of literary distinction, found but a poor sale for her book. A gentleman, in speaking of her disappointment, said: "She is red [read] if her book is not." An auditor, in attempting to relate the joke elsewhere, said: "She has red hair, if her book hasn't."

THREE Saginaw girls of the Methodist persuasion having met together, concluded to pray for the welfare of their lovers, but the first one had not got very far along in her petition when it was discovered that they were all engaged to the same man. The religious exercises were at once terminated.

A FELLOW on a race course was staggering about with more liquor than he could carry. "Hello, what's the matter now?" said a chap whom the inebriated individual had just run against. "Why—hic—why, the fact is, a lot of my friends have been betting liquor on the race to-day, and they got me to hold the stakes."

BLIFKINS was in Chicago the other day when he received a letter from his young wife, saying to him that "on this spring morning a bird is singing in my heart," and old Blif. just looked wild a minute and then took a freight train for home, muttering to himself, "Them's Beecher's sentiments, old man keep yer eye peeled."

JULIA—"O, Carrie, I've got a new feller; perfectly splendid! The other was too miserable for anything." Bings overhears this extraordinary language of his beloved Julia, and thinks it is all over with him, and that the world is hollow. Poor "feller!" how was he to know that the dear girl is only talking about the sewing-machine?

"ARE you an Odd Fellow?" "No, sir; I've been married for a week." "I mean, do you belong to the order of Odd Fellows?" "No, no; I belong to the order of married men." "Mercy, how dumb! Are you a Mason?" "No, I'm a carpenter by trade." "Worse and worse! Are you a Son of Temperance?" "Bother you! no; I'm a son of Mr. John Goslings."

"I HAVE come for my umbrella," said a benevolent party on a rainy day to a friend. "Can't help that," said the borrower; "don't you see that I am going out with it?" "Well, yes," replied the lender, astonished at such outrageous impudence; "yes, but—but—what am I to do?" "Do!" said the other, as he opened the umbrella and walked off; "do as I did—borrow one."

"ARRAH, medarlint," cried Jamie O'Flannigan to his loquacious sweetheart, who had not given him the opportunity to "get in a word even edgewise," during a two hours' ride behind the little bay nags in his oyster wagon, "are ye ather knowin' who your cheeks are like my ponies there?" "Shure and it's because they're red, is it?" quoth the blushing Bridget. "Faith, and a better reason than that, mavourneen. Because there is one o' them aich side of a waggin' tongue."

JIMMY BROWN came running into Mrs. Jones' house the other day, saying: "On, dear, Mrs. Jones! Such an accident has happened. Your son John got under a four-horse wagon load of pig iron down at the river, and it ran right over his head. 'Oh, dear!' Poor Mrs. Jones screamed and nearly fainted, when the little rascal added: 'Don't cry, Mrs. Jones, he wasn't hurt a bit.' 'Why, what do you mean?' Run over by a four-horse wagon load of pig iron and not hurt?" "Well, you see, the wagon was passing over the bridge and he was setting under it fishing," replied the little rascal, shooting out at the open door.

Notes and Clippings.

UPON the authority of Mr. Axon, an English Statistician, in the year 2000 the British Isles will have a population of 91,000,000, and the United States 546,000,000.

A BAPTIST congregation in Brownville, Tenn., quarreled about the control of its church. One faction got possession after a long contest, and on the same night the building was set on fire and destroyed.

A NEGRO, expounding the Beecher Scandal, said he believed Mr. Beecher was innocent, but yet he was afraid that when Beecher wrote the "ragged-edge letter," he was himself under the delusion that he was guilty.

ANOTHER FALLEN PASTOR.—Rev. Samuel R. Wilson, of the First Presbyterian church of Louisville, Ky., has been by the Presbytery deposed from further services in his clerical capacity upon the grounds of certain immoral conduct.

THIS year the southern counties of California sent to San Francisco 5,380,000 oranges, 720,000 lemons, and 80,000 limes. The consumption of California is about 10,000,000 oranges a year, and 5,000,000 are brought from Mexico and the Pacific Isles.

HAMMOND the Pacific coast revivalist, having boasted that he had converted over a dozen Jews to Christianity, the San Francisco Hebrew Observer offers him a thousand dollars if he will produce one acknowledged Israelite that has been converted.

A COUNTRY divine of Georgia thus condoled with the widow of a deceased member of the Legislature: "I cannot tell how pained I was to hear that your husband had gone to heaven. We were bosom friends, but now we shall never meet again."

THE Secretary of the Presbyterian board of Foreign Missions says, that if money contributions continue to fall off, the question will soon be, "Has not the mission work of the Church outrun the giving disposition of the Church?" The general answer will be, Yes!

M. LEVAN argues before the French Academy of Medicine, that the intestines are the chief apparatus of digestion, the stomach being of minor consequence. According to his theory the stomach only begins the digestion of nitrogenous substances, and does not affect fatty or starchy matters.

T. L. STRANGE, Esq., formerly Judge in Madras, India, author of "The Bible, is it the Word of God?" "Legends of the Old Testament," and who for many years labored to convert the East Indians to Christianity, has himself become a convert to Buddhism, and openly accepted it as a true system.

THE MASONIC DEDICATION of their new Temple on 6th Avenue and 23rd street, on the 2d inst., was a magnificent affair. Over 15,000 masons formed the procession, which was two hours passing a given point. The speeches made in the Temple were said to be very fine. Many persons were here from a distance.

MR. EVARTS lashes Tilton with irony because he calls his wife a pure, white-souled woman even after he said he found her to be an adulteress. How about BEECHER, who thought her a shining example of spiritual mindedness even after she had according to his testimony, falsely accused him of adultery or improper solicitations?—N. Y. Sun.

A PARODY OF MOTHER GOOSE, as rendered by one of our principal New York periodicals:

Hush a by Beecher, On the Church top,
If Tracy bends, Poor Beecher will drop,
If Evarts breaks, Poor Beecher will fall,
Down will come Halliday, Plymouth and all.

SOLIDIFIED carbonic acid gas dissolved in ether reduces the temperature to 140° below zero. By evaporating the mixture in vacuo the temperature falls to 160°. Solid carbonic acid mixed with nitrous oxide and ether reduces it to 200°. By adding bi-sulphate of carbon to this mixture and evaporating in vacuo, the temperature falls to 220°, which is the greatest degree of cold yet attained.—Pharm. Gazette.

THE N. Y. Sun in closing a pungent article on the scandal case, puts this conundrum: "Which theory is the more probable, that the husband concocted the adultery, and made the wife confess it to him, and when away from him to women friends, or that the pastor debauched her person and then ruined her soul that he might escape earthly punishment for offenses against which the Divine Justice has thundered out his most terrible anathemas?"

EIGHT THOUSAND DOLLARS ON ACCOUNT.—Where does the money come from to carry on the Beecher trial? That is almost as great a puzzle as anything connected with the case. On the Tilton side there cannot be a great deal of the "needful" to spare, but there seems to be a gold mine at the command of the defense. The counsel are probably rather an expensive set, and then a good deal is said to have been paid out in one way and another to the newspapers.

MRS. CORA TAPPAN and Mrs. Conant are Spiritual mediums who profess to speak inspirationally. Almost simultaneously Mrs. Tappan in London and Mrs. Conant in Boston, delivered addresses purporting to come from the late Judge Edmonds, and so conflicting in substance that the Spiritual Scientist declares "The conclusion is inevitable that a spirit speaking through one of these mediums, wilfully falsifies when he declares himself as Judge Edmonds." It is certainly very culpable in those mischievous spirits to thus impose upon these the two most reliable of all our mediums.

THE EIGHT ANNUAL MEETING of the Free Religious Association which was held at Horticultural Hall, Boston, on the 27th ult. passed off very pleasantly. The previous officers were re-elected, with the exception of two new Vice-Presidents, Hon. N. G. Holmes and Hon. R. G. Hazard in place of Gerrit Smith, and E. B. Ward deceased. The principal paper read was by W. C. Gannett, and speeches were also made by Mr. Frothingham, Col. Higginson, B. F. Underwood, S. P. Putnam, Prof. Morse, Mr. Ames, Lucretia Mott and others. At a meeting held in Parker Memorial Hall, D. H. Clark delivered a fine address.

A FINE NEW JERSEY PREACHER.—Rev. John W. Porter had until recently charge of a church at Van Syck's Corners, Hunterdon Co., N. J. In addition to preaching, he also taught school. It turns out the villain had basely seduced one of his young pupils, Selinda Stires, youngest daughter of Peter W. Stires, a well-to-do farmer, and the girl but a mere child, yet is about to become a mother. She told her parents what lessons the Reverend teacher had given her, and upon being arraigned before the injured father, he confessed his sin, gave up his horse and buggy, and, with his wife, left on the first train for another field of labor. He still wishes to bring souls to Jesus.

ANOTHER SINFUL CLERGYMAN.—Elder Sands, of the Baptist church in Hoosick, N. Y., and formerly insurance agent in this city, has been "acting naughty." The authorities of his church have been investigating charges of immoral conduct on his part—of being criminally intimate with a young ewe lamb of his flock. It was proved he visited her very often, and was in a room alone with her. The girl's brother stated he heard his sister cry out on an occasion, and going suddenly into the room, found the Elder in a very improper connection with his sister. The girl, upon being visited by a committee of three sisters of the church, was entirely mum. Unlike Elizabeth, she confessed nothing. Elder Sands admitted he had his hand under the young lady's clothes, but further than this he had nothing to say. He has been quite a gay Lothario with several young ladies in the vicinity. Who can doubt our clergymen are an excellent class of people, and do a vast amount of good? How could the young and inexperienced get along without them?

THE TERRIBLE CALAMITY by fire which happened at a Catholic Church in Holyoke, Mass., on the evening of May 27th, by which some seventy-five worshippers were quickly hurried into eternity, reminds one of the still more fearful calamity, which, in a similar manner, a few years ago occurred in a Church in a South American town, by which hundreds lost their lives. These occurrences are calculated to shake the general confidence in the kind care of a watchful providence, and to lead them to think there is no more immunity from danger within the walls of a Church than in any other place of amusement. Such lessons teach us Nature's laws are unvarying, and that they neither regard location, creed or sentiment. It is frequently proven at such events, that the efforts of one cool, self-possessed man, though a sinner, are more effective for good than the prayers and entreaties of scores of priests and pious devotees.

"FOR thirteen days the jury and the public have been half deafened by the denunciations of Theodore Tilton, and they have become very tired of hearing them, and wonder how it is that the 'ablest lawyers of the day' could find so little to say in defense of Mr. Beecher's letters and behavior. But the sentiment of fair play has been aroused—the solitary figure of a man who has been stripped of wife, home and employment contrasts strangely with the arrogant crowds which surround the popular defendant. When, therefore, the advocate for the plaintiff gets up to speak for him, there is an outburst of applause, for the people like fairness and justice, and do not care to see any man crushed by mere wealth and numbers, especially when he has gone into a court of law to sue for justice. When the friends of the defendant go a step further, and boast that they have 'fixed' the jury, and know perfectly well what the verdict will be, they commit a still more grave offense, and one which will not be lost sight of when the trial is over."—N. Y. Times.

THE GREAT BEECHER ADULTERY TRIAL is still in existence, but evidently rapidly drawing to a close. Messrs. Porter and Evarts occupied thirteen days in endeavors to make the jury believe Theodore Tilton one of the worst men that ever lived, and Henry Ward Beecher one of the purest, grandest and best. As we go to press Mr. Beach on the side of the plaintiff is making a very effective speech. He throws a very different light upon the subject from his opponents, and draws very different conclusions. That he will succeed in convincing all the jury of the correctness of his convictions is hardly to be expected. There is too much money in Plymouth church ready to be lavishly poured out, to expect that strict, stern justice will be executed in this suit. Men can be bought. Among the mournful features of the case are the persistent efforts on the part of leading members of Plymouth church to conceal the truth. Developments are showing they were fully aware of their pastor's guilt long ago. When Mr. Richards testified before their Committee last summer, they knew his sister, Mrs. Tilton, had acknowledged to himself and wife her guilt with Mr. Beecher, and the questions were so put to him as not to draw out this truth. It is a saddening fact that the first Christian Church in the land should purposely suppress truth and uphold falsehood, and that the leading lawyers of our country should, in opposition to positive facts, labor hard to make the false appear true—an adulterer and perjurer a saint! What will not men do for self-interest and for money?

The Pro and Con of Supernatural Religion; or,

An Answer to the Question: Have We a Supernaturally Revealed, Infinitely Inspired and Miraculously Attested Religion in the World?

BY E. E. GUILD.

13. "The fact that so many unbelievers renounce their opinions, and become believers when they come to die, is proof that unbelief is wrong." If by this is meant that renunciation of unbelief is a common thing among unbelievers, we deny the alleged fact. That some nominal unbelievers may have been induced, through undue influences brought to bear upon them, when protracted in body and mind, to renounce opinions which they professed, but never possessed, is undoubtedly true. But in all such cases it is more than probable that the individuals could not tell the difference between belief and unbelief. Besides, is a dying hour the proper time to investigate and decide on a question which requires years to properly investigate and make up an opinion upon? Seldom do intelligent men change opinions which are well defined and understood in their own mind, on a dying bed. The ignorant and superstitious often seem to do so; but, even in their case, it is not true as relates to the subject before us, because, on that subject they have no opinions that are worthy of the name. Much sectarian capital has been sought to be made out of these death-bed renunciations and conversions, by sectarian propagandists and proselyters. It is well known that early impressions on the mind are apt to be the most lasting, and to be uppermost in the case of weak-minded persons, in the time of sickness and death. Only a comparative few among men can rise above the influence of early education. Priests, knowing this, take advantage of this weakness, go to the sick and dying, and, by appeals to their superstitious fears, representing to them that their eternal welfare depends on their embracing a particular creed, easily gain their assent to it. In this way Catholic converts to Protestantism are often converted back again, and Heathen proselytes to Christianity recovered back to Paganism. Could anything be more disreputable, more beneath the dignity of sensible men, or more deserving of the scorn of mankind?

14. "The style and language of the Bible is so beautiful, its sentiments so sublime, its picture of the life and character of Christ so much transcends the efforts of human genius, and the loftiest flights of any man's ideal, as to prove that it must have had a divine origin." This is precisely what is said by Hindoos and Mohammedans about their Bibles. The Mohammedan can find in no book so much beauty and sublimity, both of style and sentiment, as in the Koran. He bases an argument on this for its divine inspiration, and with as much sincerity as it is urged in favor of the Bible. Now what are the facts? The style of the Koran is miserably poor and mean, so is that of much of the Bible. The Koran contains some correct and grand ideas about God and religion, as are found anywhere in the Bible. So does the Veda of the Hindoos. If the sublime passages in the Bible prove its divinity, what do its low, mean passages prove? There is more or less of imagination connected with the belief in Bibles, as is evinced by the fact that the believers in each one of them claim that the one which they possess is by far the superior of all the rest. The followers of the great founders of religious systems in the world are infected with the same imagination. Mankind are prone to hero worship. They invest their heroes with every quality and attribute that they have power to conceive of. Just as the young lover invests the lady of his love with the attributes of an angel, and supposes her to be something more than human. For hundreds of years the greatest genius of man has been employed in picturing to the mind an ideal Christ. This ideal has been impressed on the minds of men. They go to the New Testament expecting to find it there, and they find what they seek for. Henry Ward Beecher has written a "Life of Christ," but it is not his life as recorded in the New Testament: it is Beecher's ideal of his life. Aside from the miracles attributed to Christ in the New Testament, we can see nothing that involves the idea of the supernatural in his history.

15. "The Bible is rejected only by bad men, and all opposition to it proceeds from hatred to God, to religion and to truth." This argument, if it is deserving of that name, is scarcely entitled to a reply. It impeaches the character of every man who denies the divine origin of the Bible, and is therefore a direct insult to them. Were it not that it is contained in so many books, and put forward in so many thousands of pulpits, I should treat it with the silence and scorn that it deserves. The fact that such an argument should be used by those who employ it, may be made the basis of a scathing objection to the belief it is adduced to sustain, and will be in the proper place. Let it suffice for the present for me to say, that the alleged fact on which it rests we utterly deny. That there are some bad men who reject the popular belief concerning the Bible, we admit. So there are bad men who are staunch believers in the authority of the Bible. The most ignorant portion of community, the criminals of the country, the inmates of our jails and prisons are generally professed believers in supernaturalism and the Bible. Attempts have been made to blacken the character of some prominent men who have been found in the ranks of the unbelievers. The memory of Thomas Paine and Voltaire has been assailed with all sorts of misrepresentation, vituperation and abuse. And for what? Why, simply because they did not believe in the divine authority of priest or book, and had the courage to openly avow their opinions. We do not claim that these men were saints. But we do claim that, whatever their character can be proved to have been, we can point to worse ones in the ranks of those who held exactly opposite opinions. Voltaire saw in the degradation of the French people, the effect of the influence of a corrupt Church and Priesthood, which claimed divine authority for their existence, and appealed to the Bible to prove it. He sought to emancipate the people from this cruel mental bondage by striking at the cause which produced it. Thomas Paine was a lover of liberty. To this noble cause he devoted up his labors and his talents. After having assisted materially in establishing liberty in America, he sought to effect a revolution in England. He found the whole power of the Church and Clergy arrayed against liberty. He saw that what gave the clergy their influence over the people was the belief of the people in the authority of the Bible. To remove this obstacle to human progress out of the way, he struck at what he believed to be the root of this tree of evil. His celebrated work, "The Age of Reason," was a perfect bomb-shell in the camp of the Clergy; it gave them serious alarm, they have never forgiven him; from that day till now, he has been one of the best abused men that ever appeared in the world. The strong common sense and keen wit of Paine, and the caustic, biting sarcasm and irony of Voltaire was seriously annoying to the defenders of the faith; and as they could not spike their guns, they sought to destroy their influence by ruining their reputation. But what had the character of these men to do with the truth or falsity of their opinions? Even bad men may tell the truth, and the best of men are liable to be mistaken.

16. "The remarkable conversion of Paul cannot be accounted for only on the supposition that the supernaturalism of the Bible is true." Paul was a Jew. He was thoroughly educated in the faith of Judaism. He belonged to the strictest of the Jewish sects, and was a strong believer in the marvelous and supernatural. He possessed an ardent, excitable temperament, and was a Jewish zealot. He was violently opposed to the new Christian sect, and went forth armed with authority from the ecclesiastical power in Jerusalem to hunt the Christians to prison and to death. On becoming better acquainted with them, he found they were peaceable, quiet, well disposed and harmless. He began to relent; all the conscientiousness and kindness of his noble nature was roused into action. He began to have serious doubts in regard to the propriety of the course he was pursuing, and as is often the case with men when under the influence of powerful excitement, they run to an extreme in one direction, when the rebound comes, they go to an extreme the other way; so Paul, from being a mad zealot of Judaism, became an enthusiastic Christian. He first endeavored the Christians, then pitied them, and then embraced their cause. On his way to Damascus, some natural phenomenon occurred—probably a flash of lightning and clap of thunder, which struck him to the ground, gave him a shock, and threw him into a trance. In this condition he had a vision, but his vision was made up of such material as dreams are made of. He thought he saw Christ, and heard him speak to him, just as we see our friends and converse with them in our dreams. Paul interpreted the phenomenon subjectively, and in accordance with his preconceived opinions in regard to supernaturalism. He believed it was a special interposition of Providence—a very innocent mistake, and one that has been made by thousands of men. The conversion of Paul, then, is no more remarkable than those which are occurring every day, of Catholics to Protestantism, and vice versa, and of men from one sect to another.

17. "The great cloud of living witnesses by whose testimony the Bible is sustained, is proof of its claims." Who are those witnesses, and what are they? "The sixty thousand clergymen of this country, and the hundreds of thousands in all parts of the civilized world, together with the multitude of laymen belonging to the numerous Christian sects," you may say. But the clergy, are they competent witnesses? Are they disinterested? Have they no interest at stake, no sectarian, no personal, selfish ends to serve? Every one of them is pledged by solemn covenant to maintain the validity of the Bible, and on doing so, his living depends. Not to do so, is to incur the penalty of ecclesiastical and social ostracism, and the censure and condemnation of the entire Christian world. Would we believe witnesses in a court of justice, who had such interests as these staked on the issue of the trial? And the laymen, what do they know about the origin and history of the Bible, and the validity of its claims? Not one in fifty can give an intelligible account of what he believes or why he believes it. Are the results of calm inquiry, of deliberate investigation, of disinterested criticism to be set aside on such testimony as this? I leave you to answer.

18. "The remarkable preservation of the Bible, especially of the Old Testament, through all the vicissitudes of the history of the Jewish people, proves that a special providential care was exercised over it, and this implies the divine authorship of it." The Jewish Scriptures could be read only by a very few of the common people. They were in the hands of the priests, to whom the care of them was committed. On them they relied for their authority as priests of the Jewish religion. What more natural then that they should preserve them with the utmost care, and transmit them to their successors? But notwithstanding all that has been claimed in regard to the scrupulousness of the Jews in preserving their sacred books, and in preventing any corruption of them, it is a fact well known to all Biblical students, that some of their books were lost, and that the inviolability of the text of those now in existence, has not been preserved. The manuscripts now remaining do not agree, they contain additions, omissions, alterations and mistakes.

19. "The fact that there is so much in the Bible that corresponds with the religious experience of all religious persons, is proof of its divine origin." Human nature is the same in all men in all ages and countries. The religious experience of all men who are intensely religious, is essentially the same. It is no marvel, then, that there should be found in the religious books of the Jews expressions of feelings, sentiments and ideas corresponding to those which are experienced and expressed at the present day. It is just what we would naturally expect, and if it were not so, it would indeed be a wonder.

20. "The believer in the Bible has the 'witness of the Spirit,' a special revelation from God, assuring him that the Bible is infallible in its teachings." Allowing this to be so, such proof can be evidence only to those who have it, and involves the absurdity of supposing that a revelation from God is not sufficient without another revelation to confirm it. To the unbeliever such an assertion is proof only of delusion or deception on the part of him who makes it. It is much easier to believe that he is deluded or means to deceive, than it is to believe that God has sanctioned a book as infallible which he knows, by incontrovertible proof, to contain mistakes, errors and untruths. Besides, some of the adherents of all the different Bibles and creeds under heaven claim to have the same evidence in favor of their respective books and creeds. Can it be believed that God reveals to the Mahomedan that the Koran is infallible, to the Hindoo that the Veda is so, to the Parsee that the Shaster is, and to the Christian that the Bible is so too? Is it reasonable to believe that God makes a special revelation to the Calvinist to convince him that Calvinism is true, to the Arminian to convict him of the truth of Arminianism, and the Universalist to persuade him of the truth of Universalism? Is it not possible that the strong conviction of the believers in the Bible in the truth of religion is mistaken by them for a strong conviction of the infallibility of the book in which the principles of religion are taught? But religion is taught in many books, but this does not prove them to be divine books in the sense that the Bible is supposed to be a divine book.

21. "The divine authority and infallibility of the Bible is attested by miracles." But how are we to know that the alleged miracles were wrought? "Because the Bible says so," we are told. Here is an attempt to prove the Bible true by miracles, and the miracles by the Bible. If a man were to assert that he had wrought a miracle, and when asked for the proof, should say it was true because he said it, would we accept that as proof? If not, then why should we do it in the other case? Is not this argument just as good for the Catholic as it is for the Protestant? The Catholic attempts to prove the infallibility of the Church by miracles and the miracles by the Church. Such reasoning is futile and childish, such as full-grown men ought to be ashamed of, and yet many theologians employ it seemingly without ever seeing its utter futility and inconclusiveness. The ancient miracles could not be a witness for the Old Testament, for, before the canon of that book was settled, miracles had ceased in the Jewish Church. The Christian miracles could not attest the New Testament, for, long before the canon of that book was settled, miracles had ceased in the Christian Church.

PART III.

Statement of the Arguments against Supernatural Religion.

Let us now look at the arguments on the negative side of this question. But first we will state our position, showing what it is not, and also what it is.

Our position is not, that the Bible is a tissue of falsehoods, and, therefore, ought to be suppressed. It is not that it does not contain much valuable instruction. We regard it as we regard all other natural gifts of God, as useful, if properly used, as destructive if misused. There is no gift of God that is not liable to be perverted and abused. Even the religious faculties of man may be misdirected and perverted, as they often are. Our position is not against the Bible, as a book, but against the belief in it as an authoritative book, by which our religious opinions are to be tested and tried.

The believers in the divine origin of the Bible assert that it is a special revelation from God, the design of which is to impart to mankind a knowledge of true religion, and also of God's plan and method of saving men from sin, and securing their happiness in a future state of being. From all this we dissent.

1. Our first argument on the negative is, that the idea of such a revelation is contrary to all analogy. On all other subjects pertaining to the interest and happiness of man, God has left them to the guidance and direction of their natural powers. He has given us no revelation to teach us the arts or the truths of science. No revelations on the subject of agriculture, medicine, diet, laws of life and health, anatomy, physiology, astronomy, etc. Why then should it be supposed necessary on the subject of religion?

2. Such a revelation is not desirable, because it would not be beneficial. The mind, like the body, requires exercise. On it both depend for health, activity and strength. If God had provided a great store-house of food and clothing all ready for our use whenever our wants required, and we had nothing to do but to go to the fountain and get our supplies, the effect would be to completely demoralize the human race. We should soon become lazy, idle and indolent. No improvement or progress would be made. In like manner, if God had provided a book, containing all the religious and moral truth necessary for us to know, and we had only to go there and find it, the same disastrous effects would be produced on the minds of men. All inquiry and investigation would be useless, we should sink into apathy, inactivity and ultimate imbecility.

3. The Bible has not accomplished what its believers suppose it was designed to effect. It does not impart to the minds of those who accept it, uniform information. Instead of uniting men in opinion, it has driven them farther apart. Instead of lessening the number of conflicting opinions, it has increased them. It has increased rather than diminished the number of warring sects. It has not made men more tolerant toward each other, but more intolerant; no more charitable, but less so. It has not diminished wars in the earth, but very greatly added to the number. It has not made men less cruel, but more savage, sanguinary and inhuman.

4. The effect that the belief in the authority of the Bible has, on those who believe it, shows that it is erroneous. Many of them suppose that, as the Bible is a finality, God's last word to man, no more truth is needed, no further progress is to be made, no further discoveries are desirable. Hence they sink down into utter inactivity and stupidity of mind. This belief, too, engenders a spirit the very opposite of that of religion. It makes men bigoted, uncharitable, conceited, dogmatic, dictatorial and tyrannical. They assume that they are certainly right, and that all who do not agree with them are as certainly in the wrong. They cannot be mistaken, for, do they not believe just what God has spoken, and is not what he has spoken true? They seem to imbibe a spirit of enmity against all who do not agree with them in opinion. Nothing offends them so much as to have the correctness of their opinions questioned; and whoever does so, they are ready to pronounce an unregenerate sinner, a hater of God and religion. We do not say that it has this effect upon all; we cheerfully admit that even many are too good by nature, to be materially injured by it. But we do say that this has been, and is its general tendency in the world. And this fact we urge as an evidence that the belief is wrong.

5. The fact that the Bible is very obscure in its teachings, is an evidence against it. We know that it is often claimed that it is perfectly clear and plain in its inculcations, so much so as that "even a fool need not err therein." Every man thoroughly acquainted with it, knows better. Even the book itself admits that there are some things in it "hard to understand." Bishop Watson, when asked what the doctrines of Christianity were, replied, "it is much easier to tell where they are, than what they are." This was a candid confession, remarkable as coming from a defender of the faith. If we ask the believers in the Bible, what is Christianity, we shall get a thousand different answers, and each one who answers will confidently appeal to the Bible to prove that he is right. These conflicting opinions, too, are held by men of equal learning, talents and piety. How obscure must be the teachings of a book from which such conflicting systems of theology can be deduced, as Calvinism, Arminianism and Universalism? The Bible has been invoked to prove an astonishing variety and number of opposite opinions, such as no other book has since the world began. Among them are the following: That God is a being of love, and that he is a God of vengeance; that man is by nature totally depraved, and that his nature is divine; that there is a personal Devil, and that there is not; that Christ was God, and that he was no more than man; that he was a super-angelic being, and was not; that he existed before his appearance on earth, and that he did not; that Christ died to appease God's wrath toward his creatures, and that he died to commend his love to them; that Christ made an atonement for the sins of men, and that no sin can go unpunished; that only a few of mankind will be saved, and that all will be. These, to be sure, are mainly doctrinal points, but even on the subject of practical morality and religion, the believers in the Bible are no better agreed than other men. They appeal to the book to prove that slavery is right, and that it is wrong; that to use intoxicating drinks is right, and that to do so is a crime; that polygamy and concubinage are no sins, and that they are exceedingly sinful; that it is the duty of Christians to observe one day in seven as peculiarly sacred, and that it is not; that all Christians ought to be baptized, and that none should be; that a part of religion consists in the observance of forms, ceremonies and ordinances, and that it is perfectly form-free, and enjoins the observance of no set forms whatever. Now to say that such a book constitutes an infallible guide for the children of men, is as preposterous as to assert that the sun shines at midnight.

Clerical Supervision.

The young Rev. Mr. Ayers of New Brunswick, dictates to the people of Rocky Hill what papers they should not read.

It is a good divine that follows his own teachings. Ayers reads THE TRUTH SEEKER and warns his hearers not to read it. Glendenning practices seduction and preaches against it. Beecher is charged with adultery and preaches against it; and we could go on and name many more of the Rev. gentlemen of the same stripe that practice one thing and preach another. Yet these are the very men that denounce the Freethinkers and THE TRUTH SEEKER, and cry "wolves in sheep's clothing," and brand with infamy every one that dare think for himself.

Why is it these Rev. gentlemen are so afraid of error when truth is free to combat it? Well, I think I can give you a little light on this subject. They are afraid we shall penetrate the veil of holy deception, that they have thrown over the masses, and that we shall discover the fact that their dogmas and creeds had their origin in Indian mythology, and Heathen fables, and that their pious frauds will be exposed. They are like the man that was arraigned before the court for some misdemeanor; he appeared to be in great distress and made a great ado. The Judge told him he must not give himself any uneasiness, for he should have justice done him. He said, in reply to the Judge, that that was just what he was afraid of; and that is just their case.

I have lived over a half a century, and I speak from experience; I joined the church when I was fourteen years old, which was very natural under the circumstances. My father and mother were members of the Methodist church; my grandfather was a Methodist preacher, and it was at a time when my mother was sick, nigh unto death, and there was a revival meeting going on in the neighborhood. It was a time when my sympathies were at high tide; and that is the secret of their success in making converts; they work upon the passions and sympathies by constantly parading before the mind the miraculous and marvelous joys of Heaven and the miseries of hell, and when firmly secured in the church to be fed upon the delicious food of faith and hope. But that kind of food did not possess a sufficient quantity of nourishment for me—it was too milk and watery, and more water than milk—so you see I got starved out in the course of ten years. I stuck to them just as long as I could in conscience; I was not built right, neither was I constituted to feed on that kind of food; it was necessary that I should have something more permanent; I discovered that this world, instead of being governed by supernatural Providence, powers, and agencies, was governed by fixed principles or laws in Nature, that are self-existent, immutable and eternal.

It was at that time that I exchanged the Supernatural and Providential for the Natural and Substantial, and ever since that time death has had no terror, as far as the future is concerned, for I discovered that it is just as natural for people to die as it is to be born, and whatever is composed is subject to the laws of decomposition; also, that if I violate Nature's laws, her penalties follow close upon the heel of transgression, and that repentance will not shield us from one single iota of the penalty, for

"Eternal justice poises every deed
In joy or sorrow, as we sow the seed."

I thoroughly investigated the doctrine of repentance and made up my mind that it was a glorious institution for pious villains, for all they have to do is to get down upon one knee, and repent; and it don't make any difference how gross the crime, murder and treason not excepted. The priests place the murderer upon the stool of repentance, after he has been convicted of murder and sentenced to be hanged, and bring him forth to the gallows a saint, and send him directly to Heaven to sing redeeming grace and dying love, and bask in the sunshine of eternal blessedness and glory while eternal ages shall roll. Notwithstanding, according to their doctrine, this very man sent a soul unconverted into eternity, and directly to hell, there to suffer endless torments. That is the consistency or inconsistency of the doctrine of repentance.

Now I would not recommend my friend, Ayers, to practice all that some of the clergy practice, but I would advise him to return from his journeyings, in his gilded chariot of Faith, in the beautiful land of imagination, Indian mythology, Heathen fables, and superstition, and study THE TRUTH SEEKER for the express purpose of finding the truth.

My friend, your fancy flies too far,
The "world of man" lies round our feet;
Here its unceasing conflicts are,
And here its varied forces meet.
Pray, curb the thoughts that vaguely rise Above life's real and stubborn facts,
Give o'er wild flights to distant skies,
And do some good to human acts.

The Rev. Mr. Ayers brought some half dozen men with him from New Brunswick, to help him carry on a revival meeting in Rocky Hill, and I do not wonder that the people felt imposed upon, and did not take any more interest in the meetings. I will guarantee, so far as natural and acquired abilities, and general appearance are concerned, that you may go out into our streets, and take the first six men you meet, regardless of nationality, and you will find them more than their equal. It was quite amusing as well as disgusting to see and hear them. Mr. Ayers tells us that hell is paved with excusers and unbelievers. Now will the gentleman inform us how he knows that fact? has he been there? has he seen any one that has been there? Well, I suppose he can give as good an answer to that question as he did to the man that asked him to describe the devil that is said to be going round like a roaring lion seeking whom he may devour; he said he told the man that he stood close by him, as much as to say the man was the devil himself; and he said the man had no more to say.

This little incident he related in his sermon in the morning, on Sunday. It was interesting to see those self-satisfied airs that he put on, when he related this story. I have no doubt that he thought he had put to rest eternally, all question and criticism, so far as the devil and devilism are concerned. Thank fortune, instead of a Spanish inquisition, we have truth seekers, free thinkers, free speech, free criticism, and a free press, and we are bound to have a country free from priestcraft and superstition. W.

At Sixty.

This world's a cheat!
Could I but meet one honest man,
In whom his words and deeds were uniform,
I then could hope this wearied waste of life
Was not that dreary waste at last
Which demonstration goes to show.
But when I turn me from the man,
And lo behold, the woman sear,
'Tis there I find a kindlier heart
In truth and hope.
To make this wearied waste of world,
A gift of pleasure yet untold.

After Death—What?

A contributor to a late number of THE TRUTH SEEKER considers at some length, and with no little gravity, the much mooted question, "After Death—What?" without, however, arriving at any satisfactory conclusion, and it may, perhaps, be well to call the attention of your many readers to the fact that this great conundrum, which so long has puzzled the savants of the religious and scientific world, has, at last, been solved—a painter of considerable eminence in this city having unconsciously but truthfully answered it a few days ago.

The artist referred to was unfortunate enough to be prostrated not long since by illness, and it was thought advisable to remove him to a private hospital, in order to ensure him the best of medical treatment. A number of those well-interested and unselfish individuals, who ever seem to be more concerned about the spiritual condition and future salvation of their neighbors than about their own, hearing of his severe indisposition, thought it their Christian duty to endeavor to awaken within the breast of the suffering sinner a proper realization of the brevity and uncertainty of human life, and remind him that it was highly probable he was tottering on the brink of eternity. Unable, however, to gain personal admission to his room, they showered upon the unhappy man a multitude of the most soul-harrowing tracts, as though, instead of being one of the most generous and humane of men, he was one of the vilest of the vile.

One afternoon a friend called on him and found him in a terrible condition. There was cold sweat on his forehead, agony in his eyes, and indignation in his voice.

"What have I done?" said he, "that I should be thus persecuted? Look there! why, they are trying to swamp me with these infernal tracts! I am paralyzed from my hips down, and these people want to paralyze my brain with their drivel! Here's a new one, 'After Death—What?' How do I know? Do they expect I can answer their conundrums? Nonsense! rubbish! after death—what? B-r-r-at!"

JOSEPH BRASS, JR.

THE custom of eating fish on Fridays and in Lent is derived from the old Pagan notion that fish were sacred to Aphrodite, the foam-born goddess, and to the Roman Venus. Hence the custom grew of eating fish on Friday, the day of Friga, and in Spring, the season of the goddess of love.

THE Providence Press says it never heard in funeral oration or sermon, and seldom in private conversation the opinion expressed that a man with $10,000 income had gone to hell.

Honest Questions and Honest Answers.

The following interrogatories were sent us by a friend in quest of truth and they are entitled to our respectful consideration. We claim to know no more of "the unknowable" than common mortals, but we will cheerfully answer these questions according to the best light we have.

MR. EDITOR:—Having read a few articles in your paper with regard to the conflict between Orthodox Christianity and Naturalism, I would like to ask a few questions suggested thereby.

1. Do you not think that a universal disbelief in the Bible and its sacred teachings, will eventually lead to the universal demoralization of the human race?
2. Do you believe in a great first cause, the author of nature and yet its superior, whose character and attributes are infinite and eternal?
3. If there is no God but nature, in what part of material creation shall we look for intelligence?
4. Do you not think it more reasonable and truthful to suppose that the inferior races of men are evidence of the result of degeneracy, rather than of natural development from a still inferior race?
5. How can an inferior animal produce its superior on strictly natural principles?
6. If the laws of nature are fixed, who can turn them aside?
7. If plants grew into animals, and animals into human beings, in the long ago, why is it not so now?
8. Do you believe in the infinite progression and development of good and evil?
9. Will the present ungodly state of society eventually result in the reformation and happiness of the human race, independent of divine agency?
10. Does it not require more faith to be a sceptic than to be a Christian?
11. Is it easier to believe in nature than in God?
12. Do you know everything that you believe?
13. Please give us the name and articles of your faith, and oblige

REPLY.—We confess to a partiality for the pseudonym our correspondent uses; and, without stopping to enquire whether his interrogatories might not be better stated, we proceed to reply to his questions:

ABOUT THE BIBLE.

1. This we must answer in the negative. We do not think a general disbelief in the inspired character of the Bible will lead to universal demoralization of the human race. We believe the Bible to be a human production, in every sense of the word, the same as every other book that has been written or printed, including the ancient Puranas and Vedas of India, the Shaster of Persia, the Pyramider of Egypt, the Koran of Arabia, and the book of Mormon of our own country. If this is true, we think not the slightest injury will result from its being universally accepted. Truth will not produce demoralization, locally nor generally.

In point of language, correct composition, fine sentiment, beautiful imagery, or pure morality we fail to see that the Bible is at all superior to very many other books which men have written, while we find much in it that is crude, coarse, indecent, absurd, extravagant, improbable and impossible. In short, we cannot find a passage in the whole book that a man of fair intelligence could not easily write, and that has not been equaled many times and very often surpassed.

It seems to be a compilation of writings, differing widely in character, by different persons, written in very different eras, and with different objects and motives. It may have been well designed for the wants of mankind in the ages in which it was written, but it appears very imperfectly fitted to our times and the present intellectual condition of the world.

There is very little authority for asserting it to be the "word of God." Very few of the writers of the book claimed they wrote at the command of God, or that they even were inspired. And the parts of the Bible which are more especially pronounced inspired, among which may be named the prophecies and the Book of Revelations are more unmeaning, more incoherent, more unreliable and more like the ravings of a lunatic than the other parts. No one can reasonably claim it is necessary for a person to be inspired to write a historical account of the generations of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, or the incidents, adventures, successions of kings, wars, battles and reprisals of the Jews, any more than of the Persians, the Greeks, the Romans, the Britons or the roving, barbarous hordes of the north of Europe, called "Goths and Vandals." If it is not necessary for a historian of the Gauls or the Russians to be inspired, why any more a historian of the Jews?

It also would appear no more necessary for a biographer of Jesus to be inspired in relating the incidents of his life and the events connected with it, than of Mahomet, Alexander, George Fox or Joseph Smith. Why is it any more probable that Matthew and Luke were inspired to write the life of Jesus than Strauss, Renan, Scott, Beardsley, Henry Ward Beecher and scores of others who have essayed to write his life, and all upon very insufficient data?

When a man has written a book or a pamphlet, and says at the beginning or end that God inspired him to write it, we have the perfect liberty to believe him or disbelieve him according to the evidence presented to our minds; but when books are presented to us whose authors' names even, are unknown to us, are not given in the books, whom nobody has any means of knowing, and which make no claim to being inspired by the Creator of the worlds, we cannot understand how any man, or any number of men, priests or laymen have the authority to declare to us we must believe it is absolutely the word of God, or be damned forever. Until we meet a person who has better facilities for knowing the origin of the books of the Bible than ourselves, and has superior authority to enforce his opinions upon our minds, we shall continue to exercise our own best judgment upon this, the same as all other subjects.

We are aware many people believe the Bible has wielded a moral influence in the world vastly superior to that of any other book. We are compelled to dissent from this view. We find not in the book any better or purer morals than are found in other books, nor do we discover that the nations and peoples who have accepted it as the word of God, have lived more morally or peacefully than those who did not so accept it. The reverse is the truth. In the first place, the greater portion of the morals of the Bible are of a very questionable character. It treats largely of carnage, bloodshed, unjust wars and oppressions which the God of the Jews and the Christians often incited, and in which he fondly participated; and aside from the foul books which the police authorities of our country, under the class obscene literature, prevent from being circulated or sold, there is no book to-day in the English language which contains so much that is indecent and unfit for the rising generation to read, or which is so much an apology and authority for incest, bigamy, polygamy and excessive sexual intercourse as the Holy Bible. In these regards the Puranas, the Vedas, the Bhagavad-Gita, the Shaster, the Koran, the Talmud and thousands of other books are superior to it.

As an illustration of the immoral character of the Bible, we have only to state the case of George Francis Train, who was imprisoned six months in a damp, gloomy, noisome prison in this city, called the Tombs, for no other offense than publishing a few quotations, without a word of comment, from that book. What other book is there in existence, which is recognized by decent people, for quoting which a man in this nineteenth century would be confined six months in a foul, unhealthy prison, to the great injury to health, comfort and business?

Were a book to-day, introduced to the people of this country, containing all the indecencies, all the extravagance, all the contradictions and all the imperfections of the Bible, and no claim were set up that it was inspired or God-given, it would not be tolerated among decent people, and would be unceremoniously tabooed from all cultured society.

It is a well-known truth that the nations who have accepted the Bible as the word of God, have been vastly more murderous, bloodthirsty, warlike, oppressive, unjust and otherwise immoral than many other nations who were not governed by it at all, and that there are many nations now in existence who know nothing of the Bible, who, in point of morality, sobriety and honesty are far ahead of nations who acknowledge it as their guide. Volumes of proof can be given to sustain these propositions.

The Bible is, by its adorers, converted into an idol. They fall down before it, look up to it, worship it and revere it for imaginary excellences it does not possess, as is nearly always the case in idol-worship. It is also used as an engine by priests to elevate themselves into power, and is by them wielded like a sceptre over the heads of the people in the way to perpetuate their own authority and to cause the people to be subservient to them. Everything they demand or command is with a "thus saith the Lord."

We do not say there is no good in the Bible, that it contains no beautiful language, no elevated sentiments; on the contrary, we cheerfully admit it does, but we do assert it contains nothing truer, nothing better, nothing more beautiful than is found in other books which lay no claim to having God as author. The Bible having been written by persons who knew little or nothing of the truths and discoveries of modern science, philosophy and art, it almost necessarily teaches much that is untrue, much that is worthless, and much that is pernicious.

The claim so persistently urged by Bible-idolators, that the sacred book of the Jewish nation has been the grand cause of the civilization of modern times, is absurd and unjust. Theological ideas doubtless have had much to do in moulding the character of civilization, but to it only rightfully belongs, a fractional part. Natural and physical causes have much to do in determining the civilization of any portion of the earth's surface. The soil has very much to do with civilization. When this is rich and encourages agriculture, civilization advances rapidly, bringing in wealth, literature and refinement. In sterile or barren countries, where the inhabitants are compelled to pursue a wandering, nomadic life, and cities are very sparse, barbarism long holds sway and civilization advances slowly. The civilization of mountainous regions differs from that of level countries, and the inhabitants show marked differences in habits and characteristics. Climate has also much to do with civilization. The temperate zones are far more favorable for advanced civilization and an enlightened intellect than the torrid or the frigid zones. Every belt of the earth's surface exerts a varied influence in the process of mental advancement.

Prof. Draper, in his incomparable work, "The History of the Intellectual Development of Europe," gives us much light upon this subject. In speaking of the basic causes of civilization, he says, it "depends upon climate and agriculture," and teaches that the meteorological condition of different countries has much to do with intellectual advancement. Very rainy countries are unfavorable to the most rapid mental progress, and he argues that the rainless condition of Egypt had greatly to do in the early civilization of that country. He shows that the gulf stream had much to do in determining the civilization of Europe. Buckle, in his "History of Civilization in England," corroborates much that Draper teaches and accords to literature and knowledge prominent places in the causes of civilization. The purer the literature of a country, and the more unmingled it is with myths, superstition, legends, fallacies and absurdities, the more rapid is the advance in civilization. These are the characteristics in the Bible which have retarded civilization and for centuries kept a mistaken theology in the front, when, of course, a rational mentality was forced into the back-ground. It is doubtless true, the Bible has retarded civilization on the earth, and had it had no existence, mankind to-day would be farther progressed in intelligence, happiness, civilization and truth than they now are.

Believing all this to be indisputable, we have no apprehensions of any bad effects that will arise from the Bible being substituted in the world by rational truth, knowledge, science, benevolence, morality and purity vastly superior to that which it contains.

GOD AND THE UNIVERSE.

2. We have also to answer this interrogatory in the negative. The subject is beyond the reach of man's vision, and probably we will never fully know the character of the moving, controlling forces of the Universe. We can only come to such conclusions as our best reason points out. We believe strongly in the Universe, in its infinity, its immensity and its eternity; but we do not believe it had an inventor, author or creator. It contains and comprises all the material, all the forces and powers that exist, and outside of it there is nothing. It is itself the cause of all results and all existences. As we find it is utterly impossible to create one atom of matter from nothing, or to reduce one atom to a state of non-existence, we can have a fair idea of the eternity of the entire Universe, and the absurdity of the supposition that it was a few thousand years ago, by a power outside of itself made from nothing.

The earth—the solar system—the entire Universe may once have been in a nebular state—a gaseous condition—so rare and attenuated that our atmosphere may be regarded as solid compared with it; so rare indeed that several cubic miles would hardly contain a single grain of solid matter. We say, the Universe may have evolved from this condition by gradual condensations and aggregations into systems and suns and worlds, and thus have existed myriads of ages to again resolve into a nebular condition. The Universe, we assert, may have repeated this process millions of times, but it never had a beginning; it never was made. There never was a time when it did not exist, nor will there ever be a time when it will cease to exist. It has no supporter and needs none. It is permeated by all the forces that have an existence, and these are a part of it. The Universe is composed of matter and all the powers that pertain to it. Tyndall had this fact in view when he said, he “found in matter all the forms and potency of life;” and a more rational observation was never made.

The idea of the infinity and eternity of the Universe is hard for some minds to comprehend. They think anything so vast and boundless as the Universe must necessarily have required a creator. But ask them whence came this creator, which must needs be superior to the Universe created, and they will answer you at once, “oh, he always was, he never was made.” They seem not to realize the logical conclusion, that if the Universe, being so extensive, required a creator, that this superior creator himself still more required a creator. In this way we may go on imagining creators of creators until bewildered and lost.

It is easy for a common capacity to understand that space or expanse is necessarily infinite, eternal, limitless, without beginning or end. No one will argue for a moment, that a given amount of space was ever made, or that there was ever a time when it was not. It requires then but another step to realize that it is the same with all space and with all the matter contained in it, and that it is necessarily infinite and eternal.

We assume not to say what God is, or whether there is a God; but of this we feel fully assured, that he is totally unlike the being theology has pictured to us. The Deity that is, is in the Universe and part of it. He exists just as much in the most distant sun the mind can imagine in the farthest remove of space, whose light travelling at a velocity of 200,000 miles a second requires trillions of ages to reach our globe—as in this solar system, as on this globe or in this special portion of it. Hence he cannot be a person, he cannot be a being, he cannot be an individual, he cannot be a local intelligence, he can hardly be a general intelligence. It is possible for no man to say just what he is. But the fable that he once made man from clay; woman from a rib bone; that an apple cursed the whole world and peoples hell for millions of years; that God was born of a young girl; that his creatures put him to death to appease his own anger, or to satisfy his own sense of justice; that he has his eye constantly upon the 150,000,000,000 of individuals that exist on this globe; that he has the hairs of their heads all numbered as well as the quintillions of beings who preceded them, and that this is the Deity who reigns in, rules and controls countless millions of other worlds, is an idea too preposterous to claim the credence of a sensible person for a moment.

It is vastly easier, it strikes us, to conceive of the eternality of a self-existent Universe filling the great limitless expanse which ever was and ever will be, than to believe in a local, personal God in the form of a man, with his passions and foibles, whom no one has ever seen or known; who less than six thousand years ago, made from nothing all that exists; who found it necessary to employ a few score of ignorant, unreliable persons, living at different times and in different localities to write a book for him, giving an account of himself and declaring his will to his creatures, and which book has required a few scores of other persons to translate, hundreds of thousands of ignorant priests to interpret, explain and expound to the more ignorant multitudes, but in explaining which they have never agreed, some asserting with immense authority “the meaning is this way,” and others with equal positiveness declaring it is “that way,” but each affirming that unless we take their particular version and acknowledge them as the mouth-pieces and agents of God we are doomed to endless torture.

We are conscious that the Universe exists: we can see it, feel it and know it. We are in it, and are parts of it; we can understand it is eternal and indestructible. We can comprehend that all parts of it are equally divine; but of a creator of this Universe we know nothing, except what priests and Bible writers tell us, and they know not a particle more about it all than we do.

We acknowledge with profound reverence the great source of life, motion, intelligence and individual existences. These arise from light, heat, magnetism, attraction, chemical affinity and cognate forces yet imperfectly understood, but which are inherent in the Universe and cannot be separated from it.

WHERE SHALL WE LOOK FOR INTELLIGENCE?

3. Our friend's third question is, “If there is no God but Nature, in what part of the material creation shall we look for intelligence?” We answer, in any part where we can find organizations and conditions that produce intelligence. We know of no intelligence that is not the result of organization any more than we know of sight without the optic nerves and organs of vision, or of hearing without the tympanum and organs of the ear, or of muscular strength without the muscles and connecting apparatus to produce it. Intellect, thought, or mind, is not a promiscuous substance floating through space; it is not a primitive element, a separate entity, independent of the forces and materials of the Universe, but is, as we said, the result of organization—an outgrowth of matter—a motion, so to speak, of an organ and its connected nervous system.

We find intellect existing in all grades and degrees, from the lowest to the highest form, and in all varieties as regards quality and quantity, but nowhere without a suitable organization to give it existence. In the vegetable kingdom we perceive the lowest indications of intellect, though that there is not a measure of it in simple substances when brought into contact, as in the cases of acids and alkalies, metals and oxygen, hydrogen and oxygen, and an infinite number of similar chemical combinations, we will not pretend to say. That there is intelligence in the vegetable kingdom cannot be doubted. It is indicated in the general reaching towards light, as with the potato sprout in a dark cellar in the spring of the year. If a little sunlight steal through a hole or crevice how the delicate shoot reaches towards it! How constantly many flowers keep their faces towards the sun. Who has not witnessed the tendrils of a vine reaching for a limb or cord, or something to cling to and support the growing plant? If there is a support within reach it will find it. This appears to be a low order of intelligence, but commensurate with the conditions calling it forth.

In the animal kingdom we find varying degrees of intelligence, but always in keeping with organs and conditions. An oyster has some intelligence, a fly more, an ant more, a honey-bee more, a hog still more, a dog still more, a horse still more, an elephant more still, and man more than all. He is truly said to be an epitome of all animal existences below him, and the highest expression of divinity in the Universe. In these and numerous other gradations of intellect, or mind, the difference arises from the varied organizations, from the quantity and quality of brain and the character of the nervous system, a part of the connecting apparatus for producing and conveying thought and sensation.

In man great diversity of intellect exists. If each individuality is a spark from the great central intellect it would hardly be so; but when we realize the interminable differences in organizations, conditions, quality and quantity of brain, together with the ever-varying character of nervous systems, the reason for the great variety of intellects can be partially understood.

The production of intellect depends on several conditions. In the first place a healthy body is most essential. A good brain, a good nervous system, a good stomach, a good digestive apparatus, circulation of good blood are all indispensable in the production of mind. Proper food, pure air and pure water are of the highest importance in this intricate process, and without them mind cannot exist. As the fuel and water are to the engine; as hay and oats are to the muscular strength of the horse, so is meat, bread and potatoes to the intellect of man. The combustion of the fuel converts the water into steam, whose confined force acting upon the piston causes the engine to move rapidly, and convey with it hundreds of tons in weight. The digestion of the hay and oats imparts to the horse muscular strength sufficient to move bodies ten times his own weight and what also of intellect he possesses. So the meat, bread and potatoes which man eats and assimilates imparts to him the powers and forces he possesses, including the intellect or mind. Deprive the engine of fuel, and it must stop; deny the horse his hay and oats and he cannot haul heavy loads, he must stop; deprive man of his necessary food and he soon becomes exhausted. Starve him and he has no muscular strength and equally no mind; before the spark of life flickers out his mind is gone, he is an idiot or a maniac; he has no intellect. It is well known the labors of the mind are as exhaustive as physical labor, and equally necessitate material food and repose.

Thus we see food produces mind in the same way it produces muscular strength, and that one is the product of matter and organization as really as the other, and that we must look for the best intellect where we find the best organizations and the best conditions.

As we seem rather prolix in our replies, we will have to defer a further consideration of these interrogatories until our next.

MOURNFUL.—With much regret we announce to our readers that our friends, Mr. and Mrs. G. L. Henderson have been so unfortunate as to lose their youngest child, their “little pet,” their lively, interesting and sweet COSETTE, a beautiful little girl, between five and six years of age, who died on the 5th inst., of diphtheria, after a brief sickness of a few days. It is indeed hard for parents to part with affectionate, intelligent, darling children—buds of promise, and blossoms of hope and usefulness, but it is the order of Nature, and we have to submit. Many die young while a few only live to be old. How to increase the span of life, how to prevent and remove the causes of death, how to augment the happiness and usefulness of sojourners in time, is the work of the coming generations of men and women.

On the 6th the funeral was held at the residence of Mr. Henderson, friends of the family gathering in. A beautiful funeral service was read by Brother H. B. Brown, prepared by him for such occasions, and which, in due time, with other forms, will be published for the use of others. A few friends present made remarks suited to the occasion. It was distinctively an “Infidel funeral,” and to our mind seemed as appropriate as any we ever attended.

It is about time Liberals and unbelievers of this country should be able to manage the events of birth, marriage, sickness and death without the assistance of the white cravated gentlemen, who are so fond of proffering their paid services on such occasions. When our time comes to take the quiet sleep of death, we want no reverend gentleman, no professional priest to pray or talk over us. We find ourselves able to live without their services, and we trust we will be able to die without them.

THE Universalists of Troy are building a fine church. A passing traveler inquired recently of a hod-carrier what kind of building it was. The man didn't answer. “Is it a church or a hall, or what?” “Faith I think it's a church.” What kind of a church? “Can't tell the name sir, but it's for them folks as is trying to knock the bottom out of hell.”

Darwinism.

What it is and the Proofs in Favor of it.

SYNOPSIS OF A LECTURE AT CITY HALL, OSKALOOSA, IOWA, SUNDAY, APRIL 18TH, 1875,

BY B. F. UNDERWOOD.

I am glad to see a much larger audience assembled here than could have been expected under the circumstances. So I can say I am happily disappointed.

The subject, "Darwinism," is one in which the crowd is interested, and yet the crowd does not know what "Darwinism" is. When they hear the name they associate it with absurd notions. They have no distinct conception of anything that has been written by Darwin concerning it. I like occasionally to take up a theme like this, that is so significant and remarkable for the cultivated and thinking mind.

Darwin has written a number of voluminous works. He has given us a large number of facts, but he has presented them in a manner that is not methodical, and as a writer he cannot lay claim to anything like a complete system for the presentation of his subject: but he has given us the facts, and we have the right to use these, and present them in a systematic manner. Therefore, I am to correct some mistaken conceptions and give an outline of the subject, so that any person who is disposed to think, shall see at once what Darwinism is.

It is especially in the common mind that this notion prevails, that man came from the tadpole, or some other low creature which crawls or walks upon the earth; and he contrasts man with those low forms of life, and regards Darwinism as a foolish theory. Darwinism and Evolution are sometimes confounded. Evolution is not implied by Darwinism, nor is Darwinism a necessary part of evolution; or rather, Darwinism may be untrue in its distinct principles, yet Evolution is true. The theory that man has been differentiated in the world would be true, though Darwinism was to be disproven.

While in St. Louis a gentleman came up to me and said: "I have been through all that" referring to Darwinism. I told him I was glad to hear that, as I found few that knew anything about it. He said:

"I have known all about it for the last twenty-five years."

Do you mean to say you understood Darwinism twenty-five years ago?—I began to have some doubts of his understanding it even then. Do you mean to tell me that you understood the theory of Natural Selection twenty-five years ago?

"What do you mean by Selection?"

This was sufficient evidence that he knew nothing about it. Perhaps he had some idea of Evolution. I remember when I was a boy I heard of this theory of development, though I never had an idea of it. I had an indistinct idea of the different species coming up one from another, but everything implied in Darwinism was absent from my mind. When a person says he understood Darwinism twenty-five years ago, it is plain that he does not understand it.

It is my aim this afternoon to offer the present fundamental principles of Darwinism. Some men's particular objection to Darwinism is this. That Darwin holds that the species are all mixed up, that there is no regularity about it. For instance, you may expect at any time for one species to be derived from another. This is not true. We do not see for instance, an ox come from a horse, or any one species to be derived directly from another. Therefore it has no foundation in fact. This shows how much ignorance there is concerning it now.

The law of heredity, the first principle of Darwinism, is, that like produces like. Not only in regard to species; but in all its peculiarities and idiosyncrasies. Not only that the horse will come from the horse, but that all its peculiarities will be transmitted to its offspring. Mr. Darwin maintains that every species is derived from a like species. You do not expect the robin to come from the sparrow, or that a pig will come from a sheep. No one acquainted with the facts will expect this. According to the first principles of Darwinism, everything pertaining to the structure of the man will be transmitted to the child. If in marriage the father be very tall, the child will be tall also; if the father be very short, the child will correspond to him; if the mother be small and delicate, the child will be a medium between them. There are exceptions to this. For instance, an individual may resemble another of three or four generations back. Not only are the physical peculiarities transmitted, but also a tendency to live long or to longevity; or, perhaps, if the father is not long-lived, the child will inherit a tendency to die while young. No man can live to the age of one hundred whose ancestors never reached the age of sixty. I can tell within respectable limits the age a man will attain when I have known the age of his ancestors. There is nothing wonderful about it. It is not a matter of health. Healthy people often die young, while sickly people often live to old age. Many people are strong and healthy while young, and we predict a long life; when they get to be twenty-five years old, we begin to see signs of decay, a lack of physical power and when they are fifty years old they are ready for the grave. Other persons, sick from infancy do not appear as though they would live to be thirty, but in many cases they live to be ninety or a hundred years of age. In the one case, we have long lived stock, and in the other, we have short lived stock.

Suppose we take two beans, one the common bunch-bean, and the other, the pole-bean, and drop them in the ground together, the common bean will grow about one foot high, while the pole-bean will clamber up as high as twenty feet. In this case the one is no more healthy than the other. It is the same way with people. One comes from healthy stock, thus having the capacity to be long-lived. Another one may have no more capacity to live long than a dog has, while an elephant or an eagle will attain to five times that longevity.

I will refer you to Switzerland, where people living in different cantons, having nothing to do with the health have very different degrees of longevity.

It often occurs that a smart, intellectual man has a child that is almost idiotic. Well we have to make some allowance for the interlacing influence. It is not uncommon for a great man to marry a stupid woman, or for a smart woman to marry a weak, and stupid man. Now if we expect the transmission of these qualities of mind, when there is so much to pull it down, we are going contrary to the first principles of heredity. There is also another consideration. Most great men have given a greater share of their time to the cultivation of their minds, thereby greatly weakening the physical system. By confinement and mental exertion, their brains absorb their vitality, and they become physically debilitated. It is a fact, that among the great men of all times, there has generally been a lack of offspring. The reason is obvious. We consider that a weakly parent has not the capacity to transmit health to the offspring. But notwithstanding we find that mental strength is transmissible. When we see intelligent parents, we most generally find intelligent offspring. Sometimes, however, there is an exception.

This is according to the law of heredity, or the first principle of Darwinism. There is a certain family known in New-England, of which it is said that the boys, almost from early infancy will catch chickens, disjoint their bones, and re-set them. They are called bone-setters. If in a family the same trade is followed for several generations, there is a strong tendency in the succeeding generations to take it up and follow it. And they will be more skillful, and will show more readiness than they would if their fathers had not been brought up to it.

Why is the Indian boy so much more skillful than the Caucasian, in the use of the bow? No person who has been out on the plains, but has seen Indian boys almost as soon as they were able to walk, that could shoot with a bow. Indian boys as a general thing, can shoot better than the Caucasian could if he should practice a life time. This is another proof of the law of heredity, or the first principle of Darwinism. The second principle of Darwinism is called the law of variation.

The question may be asked, What is meant by variation? I see before me many faces, all having the same general outline, but there is so much dissimilarity that I can distinguish them. If mankind started from Adam and Eve, who lived about six thousand years ago, it seems to me there must have been a wonderful change taken place in the features of individuals, to give such a variety as we see on earth to-day.

Suppose we place here upon the stage, a representation of each of the distinct races of mankind; here would be the Caucasian, the Mongolian, the Malay, the African, and the Indian, all of whose features present a striking difference. For instance, contrast the Negro with the Caucasian, and see what a marked difference of appearance. This is an illustration of what we mean by variation. But I ask: What has produced this wonderful difference in the human features? Such a difference of features as we see in the low brute-like Negro and the highly developed Caucasian, such as a Longfellow or a Webster, could never have taken place in the course of six thousand years. This great difference is something that men do not realize unless we present the extreme. But some change must have been in operation for a long time to have produced such a wonderful difference.

Well, the Christian will say: This resulted from God having cursed Cain, or perhaps he will adduce some other trivial reason for it. That the human race has undergone various changes by the influence of different climates, and that its present state has been brought about in six thousand years, is about the way he reasons. On the contrary it has taken many thousands of years to bring about such a wonderful change in the human race and produce the results which we now look upon.

Sometimes we say we do not see any change going on, we may look all our lives, and we do not see that there has been any change whatever. So also we may look at the dial of a clock, and the hands do not appear to move at all, but if we should leave the clock and not return until an hour had elapsed, we will find that the minute hand had made a whole revolution. The perpetual change that mankind is undergoing cannot be noticed in the lifetime of any one man. But if we could look at it after a period of a thousand years, we could distinctly see its results. This is what Darwin calls variation. We see a great number of faces, but no two exactly alike. The child is sometimes like the father, and sometimes resembles the mother; but never is the precise image of either, always having some features or characteristics that are not found in either of his parents. Do not be impressed that there is anything wonderful connected with this.

There is what is called "spontaneous variation." If we say "spontaneous" generation we can understand it. But in reality there is no such thing as "spontaneity in nature." When I was in Washington, I met a man whose son had six fingers on each hand, and six toes on each foot. I was not aware that such a peculiarity had ever appeared before in the family.

We call this spontaneous, because it is something we do not understand. But every individual that lives has some little variation that never appeared before in the family. It is this that distinguishes every one from some other one of the family. Detectives make use of this in finding criminals. A description of the criminal is sent around to the detectives all over the country. This comes under the law of variation, or the second principle of Darwinism. If one of these variations had been shown in the family in some preceding generation, it would not come under the law of variation, but under the first principle of Darwinism. It often happens that a peculiarity can be seen in the child which has not been shown in the family for two or three generations. I found by making inquiry concerning the boy who had six fingers and toes, that the same peculiarity had been shown by one of his forefathers, two or three generations back. When one of these little peculiarities makes its appearance for the first time it comes under the law of variation.

On the island of Malta there lived a man who had a son by the name of Graceo. This boy had six fingers and six toes. He grew up to manhood, and married such a girl as he could find—he could not find one like himself in that respect. Here we see nature determined to perpetuate this peculiarity. And it made its appearance, but not until generations had passed.

Mr. Huxley says: Suppose all his children and all his children's children had shown the same peculiarity, we would now have on earth a race of men and women having six fingers and toes. Here we see an example of variation which comes under the law of heredity. Nature was so determined to perpetuate that peculiarity, that it appeared in the fifth generation. This shows that the variation comes under the law of heredity, the same as any other peculiarity of body or mind. From this we see that if any peculiarity is inherited it comes under the law of heredity, but if the peculiarity has never before been manifested in the family—for every one has some peculiarity original with himself—it comes under the law of variation. There are two kinds of domestic pigeons, the pouter, and the fantail. The first has the form suggested by the name which has been given to it. So, also you may know the fantail by its name. There is more difference between these two kinds of pigeons than there is between many different species.

We will examine the third principle of Darwinism, the law of selection: This is the greatest principle of Darwinism. There is also what is called selection of the sexes, this we will not touch upon. What is meant by selection is nothing more than discrimination. For example, suppose there were a great variety of plants and flowers exposed to the cold. A person, though he may understand the nature of the different kinds of flowers and plants, in attempting to discriminate between the tender and hardy ones will make many mistakes, but the frost will always destroy the tenderest first. The frost will discriminate between the tender and hardy plants with far more discrimination than any human being: but how is he enabled to do this? It has no knowledge of the various degrees of tenderness in the different plants by which it would be enabled to select and destroy the tender ones. As another example, suppose there were a great number of sheep in a place where the weather was very cold, those who had the thickest wool would live while the others would perish. The cold would exercise more discrimination in this case than any man could. This is an illustration of what is called unconscious selection. There is also what is called conscious selection. For example, suppose we should have all the fine men and women unite in marriage, in order to have a race of beings more beautiful than any other, this is called conscious selection. In a certain place in Prussia are living a large number of tall people. They are all tall, with scarcely an exception. This is an example of conscious selection, which can be seen everywhere. Some of you may have heard how the Saxons used to do in order to produce the particular kind of sheep desired. They marked out the kind of sheep they wanted, and then would bring it into existence. They have even brought into existence, sheep of the exact size and shape as best suited their fancy. They would mark out a model and then make a sheep to correspond with it. The Merino sheep, one of the finest kind of sheep known, were started in a similar way. At one time there appeared in the flock of a man, by the name of Wright a sheep with long body and short legs. This man had good commonsense. He wanted to produce a race of sheep like that one—they would be profitable to him. Now he had to build a tall stone wall to enclose the others, which was a great deal of trouble. So he determined to bring into existence a race of sheep like the one described. He let this sheep run with the flock, and by keeping all the others that were just like it, in twenty-five years he had a race of sheep having long bodies and short legs. It is this same principle our farmers make use of in improving their stock. This notion of getting fast trotters is comparatively late. The fastest racer can be traced back only about one hundred years, and now we have very fast horses. The best horses are taken, and by pairing them, always having in view the quality of speed, they have at last brought about the results we see to-day. Some have tried to prove by a mathematical calculation that it is impossible for a horse to trot any faster than he trots to-day. I believe the time is coming when a horse will trot twice as fast as he does to-day. These things are brought about under the law of conscious selection. Such a thing is not known among the lower grades of animals. There is, however, what is called "The struggle for life." This is the last principle of Darwinism.

Mr. Darwin found that there was a principle behind these others, which accounts for all these wonderful changes. This is called the "Struggle for life." Many suppose that nature is a great economist, that nothing is lost. But the reverse is true. Nature is a great prodigal. Demonstrations of this can be seen every day. A codfish will lay at least five millions of eggs in one year. If all these eggs produce fish, in a few years the ocean would be crowded with them. But what would become of all these fish, if that excellent idea of nature's economy were carried out? I think that the result would be, that we would have a good many more fish than we would care about eating. Suppose we drop a seed in the ground, it comes up and produces fifty more, and these fifty seed fall into the ground, and the next year each would produce fifty more just like it. If it should continue in this course for a short time this particular kind of plant would cover the whole earth. There are but few of these seeds that can ever amount to anything.

There must be a struggle for life among these seed; and those that are perfect will live, while the others will perish. Out of fifty, there are but very few that ever amount to anything, and those are the best of all. Those that are adapted to the soil and climate are the ones that will survive. In the next generation there must be a struggle for life in the same manner. And as before, the plants that are best adapted to the soil and climate will live while the others will die. In this case we see the plants struggling for life, and in so doing they adapt themselves to their conditions. Here we see adaptation, not economy. It is something that results from the necessity of the case. Now I can illustrate this by referring to the sheep again. In cold climates the sheep which have thick wool are the ones that live while the others perish. Suppose there should be a cold spell every year, the sheep having the thickest wool will survive, while the others having nothing to protect them will perish.

Then the theologian will say: "See how wise God is in clothing the sheep with the thick wool that they may not perish with cold." They will then go to the warm countries and say, see how God has arranged everything so that it may be most comfortable. In the cold countries he has given the sheep thick wool; in the warm countries he has given them wool. Everything is so fortunately arranged. Nothing came by chance. God made everything to suit its condition. If you take the sheep having thin wool to a cold climate they will perish with the cold. If the sheep having thick wool be taken to a warm climate they will perish with the heat.

But I say to you if you take a sheep with thick clothing to a warm climate their wool will diminish every generation in weight and quantity. And it will grow light in quality. Perhaps you have seen the Mexican dogs, which have no hair on their backs. If you should take some of these to a cold climate, in a generation there would be considerable of hair seen on their backs. If you should let them stay there a thousand years they would have as much hair on their backs as the Newfoundland dog has to-day. But carry a newfoundland dog to a warm climate, and in the same time it will become destitute of hair. Now what is true of the covering is true of everything else. Suppose you should place a large number of rabbits here in a grove, some dark colored, and some white. Then suppose you should come back in about twenty-five years from now, which kind do you suppose would be found in the greatest abundance, the dark colored or the white ones? Why, I can tell at once. Those rabbits which are white, being exposed to their enemies, would be very scarce; while the dark colored rabbits, which cannot be seen so easily, would be in abundance. If we go into cold regions among the icebergs and snowbanks we will find the animals have a color much like the snow and ice. According to Darwinism, there existed in those regions in times past, animals of a great variety of colors. But those which were adapted to their condition survived, while the others were destroyed. The animals whose color rendered them easy to be seen were the first to be killed. It is for the same reason that we have mice of an uncommonly dark color. But why dark instead of white? If they were of a light color they could be seen more easily by their enemies, and therefore would be destroyed. The dark colored mice are the ones that survive. All species are concerned in the struggle for life, or adaptation. What is true of color is necessarily true of the other qualities. Those animals which have an acute sense of hearing, those which have the best sight, and most supple limbs are the ones who survive the longest.

There is another principle called Correlation. If there is a change in any particular, by this principle, other changes are necessitated.

The giraffe is supposed to have come from the deer. Mr. Darwin supposes that there were deer in a country where there was a drouth, and the animals that had the longest necks would live by getting leaves from the trees. In this way, part would live, while the rest would perish. Now suppose that the drouth had been repeated. Mr. Darwin supposes that in a few hundred or a thousand years, there would be produced a race of animals having long necks. Now if the neck underwent such a change, the body necessarily must have undergone considerable change. Also there must have been a general change in the formation of the animal. There are many changes that can be accounted for in no other way. All changes that do not come under the law of selection, must necessarily come under the principle of correlation. Some may say does this prove that the species have been changed? I say, no. Then I ask could the race have undergone such a change as we see to-day in six thousand years? I ask could such a variety of appearances as we see in the several races to-day have been brought about in six thousand years? I say it would have taken nearer six millions of years to have accomplished such a change as this. Again I ask what is meant by "species?" Animals having a common species, or the same species are not recognized. The word species does not imply that some certain class of animals, in its chief characteristics is distinct from any other. Many animals of the same species are more different in their chief characteristics than others of different species. The greyhound and the Newfoundland dog are more unlike in their anatomical structure than many species that can be named. It is not denied that both kinds came from the same pair. There is no limit that can be given to the dissimilarity that can be brought about under the principles of heredity, variation, selection, the struggle for life, and correlation.

If a person would understand these principles he must study them. Let him study the facts of embryology. Let him study the animals that are in the fossil state. Then let him study the animals that are in the living state. Let him go through all these departments of the theory, and it seems to me he must be driven to the conclusion that Darwinism is true. There are some objections offered. Most of these arise from a superficial acquaintance with the subject.

Mr. Darwin has himself presented the only objections that are worthy of notice, and he has examined these and answered them like a philosopher. Most of these objections are of the most frivolous kind, and are only calculated to influence popular ignorance.

Letters to a Preacher.

NO. VIII.

"I wish to say a word more about Pagan virtue. Plutarch, Seneca, and Epicurus commended a great many moral maxims as highly as we do; but alas! they lacked the motive to overcome the flesh and deny themselves what seemed to them present good. John Stuart Mill says, 'The whole Pagan world were liars!'" [C. B.]

And do Christians of the Nineteenth Century always have a motive strong enough to overcome the flesh and deny themselves so that they are able to live fully in accordance with the "moral maxims they advocate?" I am really afraid some of them live in glass houses and ought not to risk throwing "rocks" at those old philosophers. And if any of those said Pagans succeeded in lying more persistently and successfully than the first Christians did they must have been almost equal to the father of all liars—if such a personage could exist. A noted apostolic father said, "lying was the easily-besetting sin of a Christian." You who are Reverends must know that the Bible is full of forgeries committed during the early days of Christendom, and that "for a good end they made no scruple to forge whole books." Mosheim says, that "in the fourth century it was an almost universally adopted maxim, that it was an act of virtue to lie, when by such means the interest of the Church might be promoted." And judging from appearances, there are some Christians even at this day who hold to the same belief thinking that the "end justifies the means."

You say to me "you will admit with the same brain and the same motive we have acted differently at different times and have condemned ourselves for improper actions." This disproves your position that innocence is virtue. Neither an infant nor a lamb is virtuous." Now I admit no such thing, for we never have the same brain at different times. The brain grows and changes in quality with each new impression that is made upon it, and we never can act from the "same motive at different times," for all motives are modified by other motives, and the same set of motives can never occur in the same order twice!

One motive never causes any single action, nor can one cause produce an effect; but a certain combination of motives produce each action, as a certain train of causes produce certain consequent effects, all of which causes and effects are inseparably linked together, extending back throughout all time. As to innocence and virtue, all words are arbitrary. When a man is not guilty, we call him innocent. Those who do no wrong we call virtuous, so in a certain sense the words are synonymous. If an infant is innocent because it cannot commit sin, at what age is it liable to have outgrown innocence? A young girl who has been carefully trained all her life in perfect purity and goodness would be so shocked at the base idea of stealing, robbery or murder, and cursing, swearing or using foul language, that it would be an impossibility for her to commit these acts, and at no age would she be apt to do so. This being impossible is she innocent or virtuous? And one trained at St. Giles would do all of these without compunction. Are the girls to blame for this difference? Or is the society at large responsible, or is any one at all responsible?

We are not free agents in this respect if we are in any at all. What we are and shall become, depends so much upon circumstances over which we have no control, that it is a difficult matter to judge of innocence or virtue, because these depend so much upon pre-existing causes and the natural bias of the organization. What is evident to us all, is the fact that we shall be able to increase in goodness and innocence only by perpetually striving after the highest and best.

A New Dictionary.

In this fast age words are produced by spontaneous combustion, or spontaneous something—words lying around loose in all directions. How are we to know their import without a dictionary?

A boy, walking the street in apparent agony, being asked, what was the matter? replied, "I suspect I have a touch of true inwardness."

Now how, in the name of goodness, are we to know what kind of disease this true inwardness is? Whether it be contagious, or if vaccination be a preventative?

I've searched "Webster's Unabridged," and nary an inwardness do I find. A new Dictionary is one of the necessities of the age.

Inwardness! Is it a new disease? or an old one by a new name?

Seventy years ago this blessed Summer, I had the whooping-cough, and what the old people called the belly-ache. Some inwardness there, you bet.

If the inwardness we hear tell of in the newspapers be like whooping-cough or belly ache, I'll say of inwardness, as the Dutch dominie said of 'te plaky parcel of lawyers, 'turnies ant pompalifs, who rop te people ant keep tare estates ant money all temselves, ant pry into efry nook ant poke for afry trop of cood trunk. Cot confout tem all, ant from tem Libranus Tomine—tat is to say, Lort, teliver us."

If, by true inwardness, we are to understand self-respect, respect for the true dignity of manhood and womanhood, as the likeness of God—inwardness, enabling us to be, not only in act, but in feeling and in thought, what we wish our associates—our most adored—to take us to be, if this be true inwardness—let us have true inwardness, for behold the day cometh—has come—wherein the covering is removed. To the discerning, whose perceptions are quickened, re-vitalized, spiritualized, souls in the body, men and women—gentleman and ladies, if you please—appear without as they are within. To character-readers, they exhale their social status. If ladies and gentlemen would smell sweet, they will please have the politeness to keep their dear selves all clean and nice, never harbor a thought that is naughty, never a thought they don't want read.

An Inquiry.

Prince Talleyrand, in his famous letters to Pius VII, purports to give an account of Jesus. I summarize it thus. He claims that the Roman Senate caused an investigation to be instituted concerning the career of this man-god in the province where all the transactions are said to have taken place. From interviews with Joseph and Mary and from affidavits procured from witnesses, it was found Jesus was the son of a Roman soldier named Panthen who belonged to the fourteenth legion; that the carpenter Joseph upon espousing his mother Mary adopted him, after the Roman custom; that he was called Anenius; and after working awhile with this Joseph at his trade, he left him; joined with vagabond companions, and wandered about the country, leading a vagrant life; became the leader of a band of robbers, and was finally apprehended and crucified, the Roman mode of death for capital crimes. This is given in a public document, in the face of all Europe by prince Talleyrand, one of the first men of the age, not only in the cabinets of kings, but in the Republic of Letters. I have never seen any comment upon this version of the story. My inquiry is, what is the opinion of the learned world to-day respecting it? Merely a question relating more to the statement of Talleyrand, than to the obscure biography of the Galilean; since whoever was his father, it is certain that no ghost, whether holy or unholy, could have been.

Editors' Notes.

THE PHILOMATEAN.—We have received numbers one and two of a sprightly little weekly magazine of twelve pages by this title, devoted to Free Thought, Spiritualism and the Science of Life. Edited and published by Prof. W. H. Chaney and Mrs. Louie M. Kerns. As a pithy, outspoken periodical, we welcome it to the field where the struggle for existence takes place, and where the "survival of the fittest" is the governing principle. Price 5 cents each, or $2 per year.

The Hand of Welcome.

We joyfully extend the right hand of fellowship to Brother S. P. Putnam, who has recently taken a step forward in the path of progress. He has for some time been officiating as clergyman of the Unitarian denomination, and has, for two years or more, been located at Omaha, Neb. It will be seen by his letter of withdrawal, which we here lay before our readers, that with the brighter light he has received, he cannot longer consistently act with any portion of the Christian sects, and herewith and forever declares his independence of creeds and dogmas. As a moral, upright, cultured, genial, Freethinker, he stands in the front rank. It does us good to take such men by the hand and give them the hearty greeting of welcome. Here is his letter of withdrawal:

BOSTON, June 4th, 1875.

To S. W. FOX, Asst. Sec. A. U. A.,

DEAR SIR:—I find that my intellectual convictions are of such a nature that I cannot work freely or to advantage with the Unitarian body; and that Christianity, as almost universally understood, is something which I not only do not accept, but believe injurious to the best interests of man; I therefore wish to have my name removed from the year-book of the Unitarian Association, and to be no longer called a Unitarian or Christian minister,

Very truly yours,

S. P. PUTNAM.

Brother Putnam proposes to enter the Liberal lecture field, and we bespeak for him a cordial reception on the part of our friends wherever he may visit. He is able, earnest, and fully devoted to the cause of human progress. He makes no compromise with the effete systems of former ages, and accepts to the fullest extent the unmistakable teachings of science, reason and truth. Give him a hearing, good friends, whenever he visits you.

We know of others occupying a similar position to Bro. Putnam, who are about ready to throw away the empty and objectionable prefix of Reverend, and to step boldly forward and embrace the positive truths of nature and reason, and fearlessly to proclaim them through the land. To all such, in the cordiality of sympathy and fraternity, we say, Come on, Brethren, stand not upon the order of your coming, but come at once. Your untrammelled efforts are needed in the field of free thought and free discussion. Gross darkness covers the land. The people of the earth are groaning and groping in the mists and fogs which have long overshadowed them. Many are searching for the truth and the right, and need the guiding hand to point out the way. "The harvest truly is great and the laborers are few."

The Liberal element is still unpopular; we are yet comparatively few in numbers. The churches are populous, rich, and powerful, and their members still affect to turn up their noses and contemptuously scorn those who dare think for themselves. It costs something yet to be an Infidel. If an individual has the temerity to avow himself an unbeliever in the Pagan dogmas of the Church, he is still frowned upon, discountenanced and shunned. It will not always be so. The lovers of mental liberty are becoming too numerous. The sun of science and truth is rising in the Eastern horizon. The long night of mental darkness and gloom is well nigh spent and the bright morning of hope and promise is already here.

So it has ever been in all reforms and all innovations; at first tabooed, then listened to, then embraced. We well remember when but few opponents of slavery could be found. Ninety-nine persons in a hundred were ready to defend the constitutional and moral rights of human bondage. Those who espoused the cause of the oppressed were despised and scorned. But even this passed away. The vile institution was doomed. Inexorable fate placed its hands upon it; it was forced to go down, and went with a crash. Now an advocate for human slavery can hardly be found—none so low as to do it reverence.

So it will be with the mental slavery which has so long cursed the earth. Its days are numbered. The grand edifice which has been reared by its devotees already begins to lean; soon it will totter, and ere long, like bodily slavery it will also go down with a crash. When free thought becomes popular and is respectable, thousands who are now timid, and vacillating will no longer be moral cowards, but will openly avow their honest convictions. We hopefully bide our time.

Truth Seeker Tracts.

We call the attention of our readers to our advertisement on the last page, of TRUTH SEEKER TRACTS, the first instalment of which we now have ready for friends and opponents. We propose publishing two series—one, Truth Seeker Tracts, proper, treating upon theological subjects, errors and superstitions, to act as "Eye-openers" and truth dispensers. The other a Scientific Series, embracing all scientific subjects, and giving in a cheap condensed form the best scientific information to be had. The idea of scientific tracts is somewhat new, and we trust will be appreciated.

These tracts contain from four to seventy-five pages, and sell from one ct. to ten cts. each, with a heavy discount when purchased in quantities. From one to one hundred of any kind may be ordered, as desired. The purpose is not so much to make money upon these tracts as to afford a cheap, effective means of presenting to enquiring minds the truths of Nature and Reason. Many persons will read a tract if handed them, who would not undertake a regular volume; a little seed sown in this way will often lead to excellent results.

Our opponents have found tracts very effective in spreading error and superstition, and we see not why we should not make them equally useful in dispelling falsehood and increasing light.

The prices of these tracts are made so low, when purchased in quantities, that liberal-minded individuals, associations, societies and leagues can well afford to buy them for gratuitous distribution, and in no way probably can a few dollars be so effectively used in stimulating free thought, free enquiry and a taste for truth.

We offer our friends, now, some thirty of these tracts, but we propose, if due encouragement is extended, to add from time to time to both series until they reach hundreds.

It is time the Liberal element of America should become more active and positive; that it be aggressive in fact, and feel willing to do something to effectively dispel mental darkness and diffuse the light of reason, science and truth. Let us not settle down in a lifeless, indolent satisfaction because we have ourselves escaped from the tyranny of priestcraft, mental bondage and the fear of hell, but let us be willing to do something to help our fellow-beings, still in bonds, into light and freedom. Let us vigorously storm the strongholds and castles of error, superstition and lies, and continue the conflict until these are dispelled from our fair land, and the reign of true knowledge, reason and science is fully inaugurated.

Send for some TRUTH SEEKER TRACTS; read them and pass them around. Let us sow the good seed of knowledge, happiness and truth, and we will surely reap a satisfactory harvest.

A Welcome Letter.

DUNLEITH, May 20th, 1875.

DEAR FRIEND:—Enclosed I send you the subscription for the second volume of your paper for two of our citizens, Mr. Rice and Mr. Clark. I also take the liberty of enclosing twenty-five dollars as a free gift offering upon the altar of Truth and the Seeker thereof, to aid in carrying that gem to a priest ridden and suffering world. I am highly pleased to be able to congratulate you upon the success of your paper and its growing patronage. To encourage you and to lighten the many burdens and difficulties necessarily encountered in such an enterprise—substituting truth for error—I freely make you this contribution, your mission is a noble one, and if the lovers of truth will stand up nobly and help you maintain it, I am confident your efforts will be crowned with satisfactory results. I am respectfully and fraternally your Friend and Brother.

D. R. BURT.

REMARKS.—With sincere gratitude we warmly thank our much esteemed friend and brother for his generosity—and take this occasion to assure him that every dime of the amount shall be used in the diffusion of truth and not a cent for our personal comforts. We have not received such remembrancers in such numbers nor with such frequency as to make them tiresome or monotonous. We have even sometimes feared our friends did not realize the sacrifices we are making and the efforts we are using to keep this sheet alive and blooming.

It is indeed comforting to know that there is once in a while a generous soul who thinks we may possibly feel the prevailing hard times and that we in this expensive city find some need for money in causing the TRUTH SEEKER to put in its regular appearance. It is likely when everybody is afflicted with hard times that we also find it out, and if a considerable number of our patrons holds back and comes not forward with their renewals it brings the pinch directly upon us. Economy, of course, is a good thing to study, but we object to its being brought to bear entirely upon the TRUTH SEEKER. If too many withhold their support, it may seem all right to them, but it is death to us. We have many bills to meet and when there is no funds to pay them, our trouble knows no bounds.

We are sorry to say there are a large number still on our list who have not renewed for the volume which is now five sixths completed. If they would come to our aid it would afford us very essential help. We are loth to believe that they think we ought to furnish the paper for nothing and pay the postage besides. Will they not now promptly remit us the small sum of $1.75 and thus lessen our anxieties? This is probably one of the hardest years for the publication of young papers that has ever been known, and it is only with the material aid of friends and patrons that they can survive. We hope the Liberals of America feel interest enough in THE TRUTH SEEKER to make a slight effort to sustain it.

Some of our Patrons write us their papers do extensive neighborhood duty and are read by numerous persons. This is right, to a certain extent. It is well that the papers are widely read, but we wish to say in the carefullest manner, if those who borrow to read, would open their hearts and send us $1.75 and have a paper of their own, it would be better for them and decidedly better for us.

In this connection we wish also to return our thanks to Brother Abram Bronson, formerly of Hiko, Nevada, who recently sent us a five dollar gold piece, as a present, from San Francisco. Such notices enlarge our estimate of human nature.

REMOVAL.—Our liberal friends and co-workers, G. L. Henderson and Company have removed from our office 335 Broadway, where they were but temporarily located, to No. 18 Clinton Place, this city, which they design to make a centre for radical thought, and a Home for Liberals who may visit the city; and where also in addition to their regular Real Estate and Western Loan Business, they will continue their Purchasing agency which was temporarily interrupted by the severe illness of G. L. Henderson, from which he has, we are happy to say, entirely recovered.

We take pleasure in calling the attention of our readers to their advertisement on another page.

We take this occasion to say that our friend G. L. H. while active in the pursuit of business is not wholly absorbed by it. His principal reason for removing from the West to this city, was not so much to establish a business as to develop and set in motion certain designs for the organization and utilization of the growing elements of free thought, of which our readers have had some intimations from his late series of articles in the TRUTH SEEKER, and which will be more fully elaborated in these columns and elsewhere.

THE Rev. T. M. Dawson emphatically denies the charges of lack of moral rectitude and monetary mismanagement brought against him in certain California papers and republished here. They are not very apt to "own up." The rule is to deny every charge made. There are only two or three cases on record where accused clergymen have acknowledged the fault with which they were charged.

The Cairo-Canton Letter.

MR. EDITOR:—For some months Prof. O. A. Burgess has sought to make the public believe that after the Cairo debate a prominent Freethinker of that city wrote to another at Canton, O., discouraging a debate between Burgess and myself at the latter place, for the reason that Burgess was my superior in ability and scholarship. He has been writing communications for the Christian Standard, and other papers, for months, alluding to that "Cairo-Canton letter" in a manner calculated to conceal the facts, deceive the public as to the contents of the letter, and produce a false impression. I have asked him to publish the letter, or to give me the name of the writer, or that of the person who received it. No information have I been able to get from him in regard to it; but he has continued his allusions to it in private letters and public communications.

This week I received the letter, and send you herewith a copy for publication. Burgess and his friends will see that, although he has not dared to publish it, I do so cheerfully.

But first let me state how Burgess obtained the letter. Rev. Mr. Ingram, of Canton, O., wrote a note, couched in language calculated to convey the impression that the writer was an Infidel, then had it copied, signed by one Frank Taft, and sent to Dr. Brigham of Cairo. This was done probably by the advice of Burgess, from whom it is likely Dr. Brigham's name was obtained. Dr. Brigham is a Spiritualist (but none the less a radical Infidel), and as Burgess, during the Cairo debate, lauded Spiritualism, or at least spoke favorably of it, and fiercely denounced Materialism, he hoped, no doubt, to get a letter favorable to himself, and denunciatory of me. But the letter that he received was not what he desired, and so he has kept it from the public; and, thinking I would never see it, has made most unfair and unscrupulous use of it, in violation of all the rules of honorable controversy.

The "Cairo-Canton letter" has been sent me, with permission to publish, by Mr. Taft, of whom I knew nothing, but who, probably from a sense of honor, is unwilling any longer to be a party to the Indian warfare which, for months, has been waged against me by O. A. Burgess, in the Standard and other papers.

In addition to this letter, I give another from Dr. Brigham, written several weeks ago, and one from Mrs. Jacob Martin, one of the most talented ladies in Southern Illinois, a Spiritualist, and Secretary of the Cairo Liberal Religion Association. Although private letters, I have permission to publish them.

I will add that the Liberal Religion Association, a few weeks after the Cairo debate, challenged Burgess to meet me again in that city, and asked that the debate be reported and published. Up to this date Burgess has not accepted the challenge. Not only at Cairo, but at several other places in the United States and Canada, Freethinkers are ready to do their part toward arranging for a debate between Burgess and myself, but he declines to meet me at any of these places, unless I agree that "no reporters shall be present" to report the speeches. And yet this Christian gentleman, and President of a Christian College, is mean and shameless enough, not only to declare I was defeated in the Cairo debate, and to appeal in proof to the "Cairo-Canton letter," but to say in the Christian Standard, and to write in private letters, that I am afraid to meet him again in debate.

Respectfully,

B. F. UNDERWOOD.

CAIRO, ILL., Jan. 21, 1875.

F. C. TAFT, Canton, O. Dear Sir: Your favor of the 14th inst. came to hand to-day, and as you request an immediate reply I will answer this evening. Mr. Underwood is a most courteous gentleman, and a very logical speaker, but not so well calculated to impress a popular audience; while Burgess is a very unscrupulous, spread-eagle style of an orator, and while he does not meet the incisive logic of Underwood, he has a way with him that is so pretehtious and pompous that, for the time being, he leaves an impression with the unthinking, common orthodox, that he has knocked the spots all off from his opponent. Burgess debates in the same spirit that a tricky lawyer pleads a case, therefore be very particular as to statement of your questions, and if you conclude to get Underwood consult him in the statement: "Resolved, that the Bible is of human origin," or something of that kind. Underwood would be very safe for you, yet Denton, Prof. Wm. Denton, of Wellesley, Mass., would be the best man, as he is a very impressive speaker, and very ready off-hand debater, and can use sarcasm as well as Burgess. You can rest your cause safely in Denton's hands, either for a present or future triumph. Our leading orthodox clergyman here admitted that Underwood's logic was avoided by Burgess, and yet Burgess most impressed the rabble. But Denton or Robert G. Ingersoll would make Burgess think himself small potatoes. Burgess is a good stumper for the uneducated, poor logicians.

I am yours for the triumph of Freethought, (Signed) R. S. BRIGHAM.

Dr. Brigham, in a letter dated Mar. 1, 1875, writes: "It is the united opinion of the Liberals of Cairo and vicinity that a verbatim report of the debate would have been very advantageous to our cause, and would aid the spread of Liberal thought. Many of the most cultivated Christians have admitted the same. Rev. Thayer of the Presbyterian church said to me that Underwood was far superior to Burgess in logic, and that his (Underwood's) speeches would read far more advantageously for his side than Burgess' would for his. Among the cultivated here Burgess was regarded as a sort of stump orator, who plead his case like a conscienceless lawyer. His style was impressive with the rabble, while in point of argument his speeches failed to meet the issue of the case. I think it would be greatly to your advantage to have your speeches reported verbatim, because your style is calm and dignified, and not calculated to impress the rabble, while Burgess is a regular ranter of the 'Jesus and him crucified' style."

Mrs. Martin writes, in Mar. 1875. "So far as I can hear from Liberals, they are strong in the belief that you fully sustained your propositions. It is the opinion of Liberals here that if the debate were reported it would be an advantage to Freethought, inasmuch as your honest reasoning, sound logic, and close discussion of the questions at issue, would be instructive and useful in published form, while Prof. Burgess' arguments, shorn of the flourish and pomposity that heralded his very ordinary reasoning, would, of itself, be ruinous to the questions he advocates. It is the opinion of Liberals here that in the eloquence of gesture, in the noise and sound of language, in untimely personalities, Prof. Burgess is eminently your superior, and that his part of the discussion was largely composed of these accomplishments. I am sure I represent a large element here in giving expression to these sentiments."

God in a Nutshell.

BY S. H. PRESTON.

1. Something (substance) must have always been, or anything could not now be.

2. Then this something was eternal, and hence self-existent.

3. Since self-existent and eternal, it must have been infinite, and hence was everything existing everywhere.

4. Therefore all that is, has always been; that is, everything has eternally existed everywhere.

There, reader, these four simple propositions send your God higher than Beecher's "Life of Christ." They knock down all the gods of the theologians as fast as they can be set up. Read them again, carefully study each one, close one eye and think hard. Each is so simply self-evident as to admit of no cavil; the four logically demonstrate to every thinking mind the non-existence of God. But will you say that this something, this self-existent, eternal everything, is God? Very well. Then nothing but God could be. Then he must be the all of everything existing everywhere. Then where is your Universe? You see you cannot have a Universe if you have a God. We have the Universe, hence you cannot have a God.

"But he created the Universe," you say. Very well; from what did he create it? Nothing? Bear in mind your God must be everything, necessarily existing everywhere. You see there was no unoccupied premises upon which the nothing might have been found lying around loose. Omnipresent God alone extending on, and on, and forever on through all the everywhere, cramming all the immensities full of his essential self. He could not have created the Universe beyond himself, since there was no beyond. There could have been no place in which to put it outside of himself when created, since there was no Outside. If created, it must have been from his own essence, and then it would not have been a creation of anything, but a changing of himself into something different; and that was not possible, since he was self-existent, and must necessarily exist the same forever; since he was eternal, and must exist unchangeable. So the Universe could not have been made from nothing, since all the spaces everywhere were crammed completely full of everything, and hence there were no vacant places where the raw material could have been stored away. It could not have been created from God-substance, since that already was; it could not have been formed from God's pre-existing self, since that would have been to change the eternally unchangeable into something else—to annihilate himself as God by working himself over into the Universe. There is no escape for you. You see that there can be but one Eternal All. You cannot have both—a God and the Universe. And since we have the Universe, that is, everything eternally existing everywhere, we need no God, there is no room for a God, and there has never been anything for a God to do. Therefore, there is no God.

This distinguished magnetic physician is treating the sick in various parts of the country by his magnetized powders with a success which is truly remarkable. P. Blair, Woodstock, Ill., writes: "After being bed-ridden, I am now up and around, and can sleep and eat better than I have for years. M. Heasley, Wheeling, W. Va., writes: "I can now hear the clock tick distinctly. After using the ear trumpet for three years." M. A. Charlton, Alleghany, Pa., writes: "My bronchitis and catarrh difficulty is perfectly relieved." The doctor is permanently located at his beautiful residence in Vineland, N. J., where the powders can be had at $1.00 per box.

Deacon Walker and the Indian.

Some thirty years ago there was a man by the name of Walker opened a store in a small settlement out West, they called him Deacon Walker because he either was, or pretended to be a very pious man, and true it is that he labored hard to introduce Christianity amongst a few scattered Indians that still lingered around the burying ground of their fathers. Amongst these was a petty chief that answered to the name of Foxey, and said Foxey was one of Deacon Walker's most promising pupils. He soon learned the principles of Christianity, or at least to the Deacon's satisfaction, and Walker was in the habit of quoting Foxey's piety and devotion to the new settlers with some degree of pride. He said that he, by the grace of God had been instrumental in bringing this wild child of the forest to the knowledge of truth and righteousness. Now the Summer was fast waning and the trees of the forest were clad in beautiful colors, and the hunting season had commenced, and Deacon Walker requested Foxey to bring him two or three good fat deer and proposed to give him one dollar and a half each. In a few days Foxey brought one buck and left it at the Deacon's residence. Mrs. Walker told him to go down to the store and the Deacon would pay him. So the Deacon asked Foxey how many he had brought, he said "three." The Deacon accordingly paid him four dollars and a half out of the store in ammunition, whiskey and a few trinkets. But judge of Walker's surprise when he went home and found but one buck instead of three. He thought there must be some mistake. In a few days he saw Foxey and charged him with the fraud and lies, but Foxey said "all right; deer, the Father deer, the Son, deer the Holy Ghost, three in one and one in three." The Deacon said there was no Holy Ghost about a deer; but Foxey told him there was, "but that he got out at the bullet hole, he could not catch him spirit." The Deacon gave a groan at human depravity, but his troubles were not yet ended, for he had trusted another of his converts ten dollars worth of outfits, and was to have his pay in furs on the Indian's return, but the poor Deacon was again deceived; for the Indian sold the furs to another trader, and when the Deacon charged him with the debt and fraud the poor Indian said, "me Christian, me been baptized, me love Jesus, Jesus pay debt for me, me great sinner, Jesus love me, he pay my debt." After that the Deacon was very shy of teaching religion to the Indians, seeming to think it rather dangerous.

COMMODORE COBB.

Orthodoxy Triumphant, Liberalism Vanquished.

A scandal case has just occurred in the Groton Union school, where they have a Bible-reading chapel exercise every morning—a model institution controlled by a board of education, elected avowedly in the interest of orthodoxy. The young man in the case declared in a recent revival meeting that he "believed in the power of God," &c., and has been the subject of special public prayer during said revival, thus affording an illustration of the prayer test theory. The lady in the case was at the time a teacher in the school and a member of the Church where she continued her devotions and discharged her duties as member of the Sunday school, after having furnished lodging and entertainment to the young man aforesaid. Thus the Bible and efficacy of prayer, and influence of Christian teaching are vindicated, for really, the clergy who are so keen-scented that they trace out with microscopic vision, any, and all good, however remote, to have been derived wholly from the Bible; hence I observe, that celebrated as they are for cheek and misrepresentation, they can hardly have the hardihood to deny the blossoms on their own vines, or the ripe fruit in their own vineyards, especially when the act referred to, bears so close a resemblance to the example of famous Bible worthies; but seriously we do not think any sane person would hold orthodoxy responsible for the scandal in question, yet one might do so with ten times the reason and logic that ministers use in sustaining their absurd doctrines.

[TWO HUNDRED AND NINETY-FOURTH MEETING.]

An able and exhaustive paper was read by MR. RICHARD L. DUGDALE, on

"The Preventable Causes of Pauperism."

He dealt largely in statistics bearing upon intemperance, crime, idleness, ignorance, etc. He assigned what he believed to be the most prolific causes of Pauperism, among which were over-population of our cities, insufficient employment, intemperance, etc. Among the remedies proposed were remunerative labor, abolition of almshouses and the better education of children.

The subject was ably discussed by MESSRS. WILCOX, NASH, DR. HALLOCK, DAWSON, ORMSBY, HENDERSON and the lecturer of the evening.

MAY 28th, 1875.

TWO HUNDRED AND NINETY-FIFTH MEETING.

MR. CHARLES SOTHERAN, co-Editor of "The American Biblioplist," author of an essay on "American Genealogy," "Genealogical Memoranda," &c, read a lengthy paper on Alessandro di Cagliostro,

Impostor or Martyr?

[For want of room, we are compelled to greatly abbreviate Mr. Sotheran's lecture, and give merely the leading incidents in the life of Cagliostro, thus depriving our readers of very many of his grand passages and interesting recitals.—ED. T. S.]

"To doubt and to be astonished is to recognize our ignorance. Hence it is that the lover of wisdom is in a certain sort a lover of mythi; for the subject of mythi is the astonishing and marvellous."—Sir Wm. Hamilton.

MR. CHAIRMAN, LADIES AND GENTLEMEN:—The pages of history when perused by the light of searching and impartial investigation very frequently narrate an entirely different account to that popularly taught. Take for example the History of England, until late years Richard the Third was accredited in addition to the crime of murder with having been a man of most repulsive aspect—in body crook-backed, palsied, of horrid visage—a satyr. Queen Mary the First has been likewise, until recently, considered the worst and most bloodthirsty monarch who ever sat on the English throne; while her half sister, Queen Elizabeth, the most exemplary, and during whose reign no blood was spilt on behalf of religion. What are the facts? "Crook-backed Richard" was no hunchback, but as Walpole in his "Historic Doubts," and Jesse in his "Life of Richard the Third," both quoting the old Countess of Desmond, and other authorities show was really a man of fair, stately and gentle presence, and very far from the monster painted by the glowing pen of Shakespeare, who, in acting the courtier for dynastic reasons, knowingly altered the circumstances that the enemy of the grandfather of his royal mistress, should be described in the most hideous terms to assist in excusing Henry Tudor in his usurpation, as if mere personal appearance must of necessity indicate crime. Similar reasons can be found for giving the title of "bloody" to Queen Mary, a woman of naturally kind and gentle character, who personally was not responsible for the persecutions of Protestants during her reign, and many of which, so styled, were founded on the political treason of the victims; but it is far different with Elizabeth, "Good Queen Bess," during whose tenure of the throne more persons were tortured, disembowelled and executed for the sake of religion than in any other reign. Those who doubt these statements should carefully study the works of Froude, Strickland, Lingard, Cobbett and other later historians, when they will readily comprehend the bloody legacy left to the British nation and continued by her successors, until the "black laws" were repealed in the reign of George the Fourth, while all the time Protestant parsons and historians have been zealously lying and concealing the truth in the interests of theology, and howling down their fellow-Christians, the Catholics. As in England, so in Europe, so the world over. No wonder, therefore, that in disgust, the late Charles Kingsley threw up his University Professorship of history and gave as his reason that "history was seven-eighths falsehood, with a residuum of garbled truth."

As with many other historical characters, so with the subject of this evening's lecture. Cagliostro the philanthropist, the republican, the man of science, the philosopher and whose misunderstood career was sealed with martyrdom by the thrice accursed Inquisition of Rome. To future generations when the Vatican archives are opened to public scrutiny, must the entire clearing of his character be left, and then, perhaps, gibes and lies started by false priests, zealous physicians and revengeful aristocrats will be heard no more re-echoed by ignorant rabble and lazy compilers taking their material second-hand without going to the foundation for information.

I speak thus confidently, having made the life of this man a study for some time back. During a residence in Paris where the most eventful portions of Cagliostro's life occurred, through the friendship of an auditor of State to the late Emperor Napoleon, a son of Senator Amedee Thierry and nephew of Augustin Thierry, the historian of the Norman conquest, I had access to many manuscripts and historical documents not hitherto made public. I have also through my connection with various European secret societies of which Cagliostro was a member obtained other information.

One of the greatest difficulties to the biography of Count Alessandro di Cagliostro are the absurd and differing statements on the score of his birth. By a French Royalist newspaper, the Courier de l'Europe it was asserted he was the son of a coachman at Naples named Cicho, in the employ of Signor Christupli, and that before commencing his career he was successively hair-dresser, valet-de-chambre and mountebank. Another report states, his father was one Balsamo, a man of humble position, a resident of Palermo in Sicily, where his son Joseph, the soi-disant Cagliostro was born in 1743, that he was educated in a monastery till his fifteenth year when he became a chevalier d'industrie; that after having several times been imprisoned at his stated place of nativity, his villainies culminated in the robbery under the most ridiculous circumstances of one Marano, a silver-smith, on account of which he was obliged to leave Palermo forever. This rignarole proceeded from the familiars of the Inquisition, and was only too greedily taken hold of by the before-named paper, which, after an attempt at blackmail, had previously set agog the former story, and in almost the same breath had given him credit for being a Sicilian and Neapolitan, as I have shown and elsewhere a Calabrian. A different account makes him out the heir of a former monarch of Trebizond, who was dethroned and massacred by his subjects. In consequence of these untruthful statements, the birth and birth-place of Cagliostro have been shrouded in great obscurity. Of one thing, there can be little doubt; he was brought up in Asia, and there is every reason, from established facts, to believe he was born in 1748, and was the offspring of Emanuel de Rohan, Sixty-eighth Grand Master of Malta, by a lady of Turkish extraction, who was captured by a Maltese galley.

The early years of the count were passed under the name of Acharat, at the historical city of Medina in Arabia, and were spent in the palace of the Mufti Salahayn, chief of the Mahometans, under the care of his tutor, and second father, Althotas, an erudite Greek, learned in Oriental lore and science, but especially in the hidden Eastern mysteries of Theurgic Magic (magnetism and clairvoyance,) Medicine and Chemistry (alchemy), who poured into the attentive ear of his willing pupil his store of learning and knowledge of the Asiatic tongues. The semi-parental care of the tutor did not stop there; he was anxious to have his pupil well versed in metaphysics, and imparted to him the doctrines of the Eastern Illuminati and other philosophical fraternities, spread all over Oriental countries.

While a resident of Medina, he attended the esoteric services of the Mahometan faith, it being the aim of his instructor to instil into his mind the respect due to the form of worship and laws of every country in which he might happen to be resident; "and yet," says Cagliostro, in the Memorials of his life, published in 1786, "the true religion was imprinted on our heart," a religion before whose shrines the Hindoo, Parsee, Jew, Trinitarian or Unitarian, Christian, Mahometan or the member of any faith might worship without prejudice to their separate beliefs, and which inculcated the immortality of the soul and endless happiness of the good brother.

Upon the completion of his studies, and feeling desirous of seeing various parts of the world, he set out, accompanied by his tutor, to visit the opulent cities of which he had read. At Mecca he remained three years, where he became acquainted with the Scheriff or Sovereign, and between them a close friendship was perfected.

Up to the year 1766, Cagliostro visited all that remained of the principal ancient cities of Asia and Africa, Palmyra the melancholy and memorable, Thebes, now Luxor, with its hundred palaces, the ruins of Babylon, Nineveh—where Layard has since summoned her kings and people, after 3,000 years to give their testimony; Baalbec and her temples; Persepolis the magnificent; Tyre and Sidon, famed for their fabrics; Memphis, where the white-robed priests taught a faith not yet extinct, and those other ruins where the philosopher can contemplate on the mutability and decay of tyrannies, religious and political, till the mind, bursting its tension, can rove fancy free amid the treasures of the past.

In Egypt he was permitted entrance to temples and palaces into which ordinary travelers had not been allowed, and here he was initiated into that mysterious rite of which he afterwards was one of the principal disseminators in Europe. It may, perhaps, be well to state that the religion and mysteries of the ancient Egyptians have been greatly misinterpreted, owing to early Christian falsehoods and the pretended excesses of those Greek followers who introduced the worship of Isis into Rome, and where the secret and philosophical teachings, like those of Ceres, Mithras and Eleusis were but known to the few; their esoteric faith handed down to these times, like most of the early Monotheistic religions revel in lofty aspirations and their sacred writings, equally with the Vedas, Zendavesta, Talmud and other books breathe a spirit of the purest aspiration to the Preserver of all, whether worshiped as Osiris, the Egyptian Savior, Creator or male generative Phallic principle, and elsewhere as the Sun or Baal, Ceres, Adonai, etc. To this glorious Being, figuratively clothed in human shape, when life was over they departed on that mysterious voyage, "to that bourne from whence no traveler returns," and in him they hoped for final justification; to attain to a sufficient knowledge of him was the ultimate end of all their mysteries, and a nearly abject purification, if anything can be abject performed in reference to the Most High, was obligated upon all seekers of the one great God, Kneph, Intelligence or efficient cause of the Universe. It is not to be wondered at, then, that with every Egyptian, even the most miserable, was buried a fragment of the Book of the dead, or holy writings which were composed during the earliest ages of Egyptian history 20,000 years ago. Those whose means allowed it, had it sculptured on their Sarcophagi before their departure, as it was termed, "into Amenti."

Upon the termination of his Asiatic and African travels, Cagliostro and his tutor, in 1766, repaired to the Isle of Malta, where the Knights of Malta then held supreme sway, until their dispersion with their sixty-ninth Grand Master, Ferdinand de Hompesch who handed his rights over to the Emperor Paul of Russia in 1798. The Templars, Knights of St John and other military and Gnostic fraternities had like the ancient religious associations and later fraternities of Illuminati the same peculiar system of ethics known but to duly sworn brethren. The first named, the Knights Templar, through their Grand Master Jacques de Molay, having refused, certain concessions desired by the infamous Pope Clement the Fifth, who aided by Philip of France suborned witnesses, brought forward the most unfounded and damnable accusations respecting the Templar mysteries, whereupon the Pope dissolved the Order and burnt their venerable Grand Master at the stake. The property of the Order in France being confiscated by the king—notwithstanding, the members scattered, uniting with the masonic and Rosicrucian brotherhoods with which legitimate branches of the Knights of Malta, Rhodes, and St. John of Jerusalem also amalgamated and have continued in unison till the present time, their ritual being incorporated in the higher degrees of Free Masonry, and thus perpetuated a direct succession with the ancient mysteries. I have thus gone out of my way to describe this, as much of the mystery of Cagliostro's life would otherwise be enveloped in obscurity.

Immediately on reaching Malta via Rhodes, Cagliostro and his tutor were hospitably furnished with rooms in the palace of Pinto da Fonesca the then Grand Master and a famous Illuminati, and who treated Cagliostro with the greatest distinction and after a further acquaintance ennobled him with the title of Count, on receiving which, he assumed as usual in those cases the territorial affix "Di Cagliostro" in similar way that plain Monsieur Arouet became M. Arouet de Voltaire on taking possession of his paternal estate of Voltaire, by which name he was afterwards only known.

Da Fonesca being aware of the extraction of the Count always treated him with the greatest friendliness and together they essayed in the laboratory some of those astonishing alchemic experiments which were afterwards magnified to an incredible extent by the ignorant who are ever ready to affirm a supernatural origin to what passes their vulgar comprehension. Here Cagliostro had the misfortune to lose his tutor and early friend. They had been so long and so warmly associated together that the loss was most keenly felt by our hero. Together they had prosecuted their studies and together brought out valuable discoveries in chemistry, one of which was an ingredient for improving the manufacture of flax, imparting to goods of that material a gloss and softness almost equal to silk, and by which they netted considerable profit in Alexandria and other towns they visited. It was the venerable Althotas whose character is portrayed in such glowing colors by the late head of the Rosicrucian Order in England, Lord Lytton in that remarkable mystical work, Zanoni, under which pseudonym Cagliostro will be readily recognized; but it is not on fiction, but facts, that history must be written, and although Bulwer Lytton's "Zanoni," Schiller's "Gersesker," Goethe's "Gross Kophta," and some of Dumas' novels have presented the almost kaleidoscopic acts and history of Cagliostro with remarkable force, one must throw them aside as worthless, notwithstanding their extraordinary conceptions.

After the death of Althotas, the Count felt dispirited, and soon left Malta, and with a companion visited the islands of the Archipelago, and then crossing the Mediterranean to Naples, when he alone proceeded to the city of Rome. His letters from Fonesca brought him into immediate acquaintance with leading citizens and dignitaries of the Church, among whom were several cardinals, one or two of which afterwards became popes. The great cures of diseases he performed here gave him also a wide fame.

It was at Rome in 1770, in the twenty-second year of his age, he became acquainted with the lovely Seraphina Feliciano, daughter of one of the first Italian families, and one of the most beautiful and brilliant maidens of Rome, and who became his wife. Through changing fortunes, in evil and in good report she remained a true and faithful wife. His confidence in her was unbounded, and he shared with her his secrets in Alchemy and other scientific departments, and he had her initiated into the rites of adopted Masonry, of which order he was a conspicuous and enthusiastic member.

In company with the Countess, the Count visited St. Germain, a warm friend of Louis XV., and who was a member of the same secret order he belonged to, and by whom he was initiated into the European branch of the Illuminati at a secret temple near Frankfurt on the Main. He was there also introduced to Swedenborg, the Swedish philosopher and the representative of that nation.

He there also met Lord Fairfax of America, Lavater of France and other distinguished personages. He was instructed by these assembled delegates to operate against the oppressive political tyrannies of the times, and funds for the prosecution of the work, (of which the order had large sums) were placed in his hands or deposited in banks at Amsterdam, Rotterdam, Basle, Lyons, London, Venice, Philadelphia, &c. It was agreed by the secret leaders that the first blows should be struck in America, where the way had been prepared by the suicidal folly of George the Third, and in France where the mass of the people were in a state of semi-serfdom, ground down under a fearful tyranny. To Washington and Franklin, well-known brothers in Masonry was the secret task of organization confided by their friend Fairfax and to Cagliostro were the destinies of France confided. How well Washington and Franklin succeeded need not be mentioned, and the history of France shows how Cagliostro's task was performed. If France was deluged with an ocean of blood, what else could have been expected? It was the reaction—the lion turning on its betrayer and from which the French rescued from fourteen centuries of feudalism and religious despotism arose baptized, aye, St. Bartholomew like, in human blood, a nobler and free people.

What happened in France in the Eighteenth century has occurred again to-day; the Carbonari or Illuminati fiat went forth and the petty Italian tyrannies are destroyed. Italy is free, Rome is liberated, and the renegade Pio Nono the perjured Masonic brother in answer to his futile excommunications, has his compliments returned with an expulsion from his Lodge and the Masonic body signed by Victor Emmanuel, Grand Master of the Orient in Italy, and counter-signed by Giuseppe Garibaldi, ex-Grand Master of the same.

The Count and Countess traveled through Germany with much pomp, and were cordially received by Frederick the Great, mason and philosopher. Many lodges of Egyptian masonry were established. They afterwards visited Spain and Portugal. In 1776 he visited England, taking with him much wealth in plate, jewels and specie. In London he applied himself ardently to his favorite study of chemistry and in acquiring a knowledge of the English language. He had trouble in London with a soi-disant Lord Scot, Vitellini and his accomplices who became incensed because he would not reveal to them the art of foretelling the drawing of lucky numbers and how to transmute base metals into gold. They forced an entrance into his apartments and stole his private manuscripts and considerable wealth. They were brought before a justice, but by perjury escaped. In revenge they brought false charges against Cagliostro and subjected him to heavy expense. About the same time a leading French paper, because they could not succeed in obtaining money by blackmail from the Count, put in circulation base calumnies concerning him, many of which, however, were proved to be untrue.

After leaving England he traveled on the continent, stopping for some time at Conland where he made warm acquaintances, delivered lectures and established lodges of masonry. He afterwards visited St. Petersburg and had interviews with the celebrated Empress Catherine. Having a difficulty with her Scotch physician who was jealous of him and who took occasion to poison the mind of the Empress against the Count, he did not remain long in St. Petersburg, and via Warsaw returned to France where he attended an important meeting of the French Illuminati. Among those in attendance were the Duc d'Orleans, Grand Master of Masons in France, Mirabeau, Lafayette, Prince Talleyrand and others. Measures were agreed upon that he should for a season make Strasburg his residence, at which place he took a magnificent hotel, to which he invited to an open table many residents of the city. Here the Count and Countess occupied their time in works of benevolence and labors of generosity, curing the sick and administering to the necessities of the indigent without price. His reputation here became very wide, and people of the highest distinction became his warmest friends. His extensive knowledge of alchemy, his intimacy with the principles of Mesmer, then becoming gradually known in Europe and which had been practised in the East for centuries; his familiarity with natural magic, magnetism and Spiritualism, brought many to visit and consult him. His munificence was extraordinary; he never made any charges for his cures or other services, and he lavished money freely in every direction. Many believed him to be a divine personage and looked upon him with the greatest veneration. The King of France and his Government wrote about this period to the officials at Strasburg ordering every attention should be paid him.

Among his distinguished acquaintances at this period was Cardinal Louis Rene Edouard de Rohan, a prominent dignitary of the Catholic Church, Prince of Hildersheim, and Landgrave of Alsace, and Grand Almoner of France, etc. This dignitary transmitted the remarkable testimony to writing, that he saw the Count manufacture gold and diamonds in his crucible in very considerable quantities.

He was called to attend a friend lying very sick at Naples, whither he hastened, but where he arrived only in time to receive the last farewell of his expiring breath. He next repaired to Bordeaux, France, in November, 1783, where he caused as great a sensation as in Strasburg by the extraordinary services he performed. The sick were amazed at his charity and benevolence, and the poor and suffering made happy by the wonderful cures he performed. The salons of his wife were crowded with the wealthy to whom she gave most magnificent parties. The eleven months spent here, however, served to arouse the animosity of his enemies, who put in circulation many calumnies concerning him. The magistrates of Bordeaux had placed day and night before his house a military guard to do him honor.

He found both in Strasburg and Bordeaux that the regular practitioners of those places, jealous of his great popularity and the favor accorded him by the Cardinal Prince of Strasburg, had spread among the superstitious populace many absurd libels. One was that he was "antichrist," another "the Wandering Jew," and others equally false, and which in their internal stupidity destroyed themselves. To an audience like this before me I am not going to argue for or against these terrible imputations, thinking it would be futile to demolish an antichrist for the satisfaction of a body of thinkers not recognizing the theory of the divinity of Jesus Christ; also that of the Wandering Jew, who has of late been relegated to the domain of Fiction, where I trust another gentleman who does not trouble us with his presence in these days will also be consigned ere long by believers; I mean his Satanic Majesty, who, if he exist, seems only in these parts apparently to have his good friends and admirers, the "ministers of the gospel," under his especial charge, for I need not remind you that both in Brooklyn and New Jersey they have "the Devil to pay." Those amiable animals, roaring and wandering lions, we ordinarily confine in Central Parks, with their friends the serpents, who now-a-days have most curiously lost the power of speech.

Upon leaving Bordeaux, he spent a month at Lyons then he repaired at once to the French Capital. Here, through the kindness of his friend, Cardinal de Rohan, he was at once introduced into the most distinguished society, even holding frequent interviews with the King and Queen. On a certain occasion, when in the presence of many prominent characters, among whom were Richelieu, the King of Sweden, Count de Launay, the Countess Dubarry, Marquis de Condorcet, M. de La Perouse the navigator, Marquis de Favras and others, he is said to have foretold the destiny of all present, and gave a clear account of the taking of the Bastille and the execution of Louis XVI. Not stopping to say how he was able to do this, I will only affirm this was written before the events occurred, and in this respect unlike some of the Bible prophecies which were not written until after the events transpired. Prince Talleyrand was in the habit of narrating very extraordinary incidents which he knew in connection with Cagliostro's wonderful performances.

In this, the hey-day of Cagliostro's glory and fame, a most unfortunate event occurred, which was the abstraction of a diamond necklace valued at $400,000. Connected with the necklace was the Queen Maria Antoinette and her particular friend, the Countess Valois de la Motte, a lineal descendant of Henry II of France. The latter was also a confidante of Cardinal de Rohan, with whom Cagliostro had visited the Countess. It is known Countess Valois de la Motte was the party who purloined the necklace, and that her husband decamped with it to England. Cardinal de Rohan, Count and Countess Cagliostro, Countess de la Motte and others were arrested for the theft and consigned to the Bastille. The residence of Cagliostro was pillaged by the police, and among the articles taken from his possessions were 100,000 francs, a pocket-book containing forty-seven bank notes, of 1,000 francs each, much gold and silver in Louisdors, Spanish coin, besides plate, jewels, diamonds, etc.

After six months imprisonment, the trial came off, when Cagliostro and the Cardinal eloquently defended themselves. The result of the trial was that Madame de la Motte, the descendant of the Capets and the worthy bosom friend of the Queen of France, was found guilty and sentenced to have her head shaved, to be publicly whipped, branded between the shoulders with a hot iron and imprisoned for life. The Cardinal de Rohan and the Count and Countess Cag-liostro were declared innocent and honorably discharged; not the slightest proof of any guilt upon their part was adduced. The verdict was received by the people of Paris with loud acclamations of joy. The Count, together with the Cardinal, clothed in the royal purple, were taken in triumph through the streets in returning to the Bastille, at least ten thousand being in attendance, manifesting their pleasure and frequently rushing forward to kiss the hands and touch the garments of those they loved. The crowds that gathered contained men of letters, financiers, abbés, avocats, police agents, soldiers and others.

The Count having made charges of robbery against the agents of the Governor of the Bastille, was detained some time longer. At the end of nine months from his arrest he received his final discharge. His joy was great upon obtaining his liberty. The confinement in the Bastille had been exceedingly unpleasant to him. His own words were these: "Were I left to choose between an ignominious death and six months in the Bastille, I would, without hesitation, say, lead me to the scaffold."

The ovation attending his discharge was participated in by thousands, and his return to his home was more like the triumphant march of a Roman Emperor than the release of one charged with crime. In describing the event, he says: "My doors were forced open—the yard, the staircase, apartments—every place was full, and I was carried into the very arms of my wife."

Notwithstanding the false charges brought against Cagliostro had been utterly broken down, and public manifestations had been extended to him, yet the agents of the police, fearing for good order in Paris, and perhaps alarmed at the charges made against some of their own body, did not relish his presence in the city. At all events, within twelve hours from the time of his release from the Bastille, an official appeared before him, and in the name of the King, ordered him to leave Paris within twenty-four hours and the kingdom within three weeks, and forbidding his return. On the 3d of June he left Paris. Crowds of his friends met him on the road, and expressed their great grief at his departure, unmistakably indicating that they regarded the Count's private misfortunes to be really a public calamity.

He took up a temporary residence in the Parisian suburb Passy, and on the 16th of the month he embarked at Bologne for England amid the blessings, the regrets, and "farewells" of a large crowd of citizens, who lined the shores of France at the time of his departure. He repaired at once to London, and speedily gathered around him numerous influential friends. His acquirements as a physician, and his general benevolence were again soon made manifest.

While in London he published a letter reflecting on the state of French law, the French Ministers of State, and the Queen of France, to whom he attributed many of the sufferings he had undergone. On the 20th of August, 1786, an attempt was made by the Secretary of the French Embassy in London to entrap him back to France. He was informed that the Ambassador had received instructions to acquaint the Count he might return to France at pleasure, and desired him to call at the Embassy. It appears that at this interview his personal friend, the Count de Frouville, and Lord George Gordon happened to be present on a visit, and, as treachery was feared, insisted upon accompanying him the next day to the Embassy, which they did to the great astonishment of M. de Bartholomew, who had charge of French interests in Great Britain. The Ambassador blankly refused to discuss matters in the presence of strangers, and as Lord George Gordon was extremely insulted by this conduct to a man of his rank, he published in The Gazette a very powerfully worded letter, in which he stigmatized Marie Antoinette with complicity in the theft of the Diamond necklace and also with improper criminality with the Cardinal de Rohan. For this warm espousal of the Count's cause, Lord Gordon was prosecuted by desire of the French Government, was found guilty of libel, and suffered a heavy fine and long imprisonment in Newgate. During the remainder of Cagliostro's stay in London, nothing further of special importance occurred. He continued his systematized benevolent efforts in dispensing gratuitously his medical services and other charities by which he earned the gratitude of large numbers of British people, as testified in the great popularity of the Bartolozzi Portrait.

We have now traced the life of Cagliostro to 1787. His public career of usefulness was rapidly drawing to a close. His hatred of religious and political tyranny had made him a marked character; the meshes of the secret societies were gradually ravelling; Europe from end to end was convulsed in throes of impending internal agony; and in France the days of monarchy were almost closing, for the down trodden and starving people had lifted up its head and asserted its rights; the conflict between royalty and the sovereign people had begun. The harvest was ripe and the sickle ready for the work. Despotism became alarmed at even shadows, Cagliostro flying, petrel like where the storm of revolution was about to break appeared an object of terror to European governments. He visits Roveredo, and the Kaiser Joseph banishes him Austria. He journeys to Turin and the king of Sardinia is afraid of his presence. He passes through Germany, Switzerland and Savoy with like results—all fear him. In May 1789, boldly planting himself in the very patrimony of St. Peter he defies the papal chair and the very hierarchy of religious and political despotism, as did in later days the intrepid Mazzini. His martyrdom, his crucifixion was about to commence. With the certainty of death before his eyes, not fearing, but looking Mors Pallida straight in the face, he has the temerity to hold masonic meetings. The infallible "representative of omnipotence," poor good old man is sadly frightened. The revolutionary party in France are using its claws. Omniscience has been caught napping, and Cagliostro denounced as chief of the society of Illuminati. On the 29th of December the Papal government discover him founding a lodge of Egyptian Freemasonry; he is arrested and thrown by the holy Inquisition into the castle of St. Angelo. For eighteen long weary months he and his beautiful wife are incarcerated there. The Inquisition clamors Ad Leones! and his Infallible Holiness, the Ambassador of the Prince of Peace, who sent not peace but a sword, the successor of Alexander Borgia and Pope Joan, in his justice, in his mercy, in his charity, condemns an innocent man to death! For what? For the crime of being, sad to say, a sorcerer, worse—a heretic, and wickedness of all—a Freemason. Yes, the apostle of freemasonry is condemned to die, and his wife, for the crime of being a wife, to a life of religious seclusion in the convent of St. Apolline, where ere long she is hounded to death by the pious paterers of Ave Marias and Pater Nosters. But theology has forgotten her prayers, "Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us." It is wrong to take life—"Thou shalt do no murder," so terrible irony, Cagliostro's sentence is commuted to imprisonment for life. The torture, the rack, are brought into requisition, for has not the criminal appealed to the French Constituent Assembly? but all in vain? Starvation and manacling must be called into play; and one eventful morning in 1795 his murderers find in a dark and loathsome cell in his Holiness' castle of St. Leon, in the Duchy of Urbino the stiff and stark body of Alessandro di Cagliostro—another martyr to Christianity.

I have endeavored in this humble essay to narrate the principal facts in the life of Cagliostro; my task has not been done as I altogether would wish, for if I had used all the materials I have at my command, I could easily fill a large volume. Having taken a different view from the ordinarily accepted biographies I expect and court a considerable share of criticism, but whatever may be urged to the contrary, I trust it will not be founded on the works of second-hand compilers. As to the various contemporary biographies, even Thomas Carlyle who wrote a rather hostile one over thirty years ago for Fraser's Magazine, after throwing aside as worthless the five or six at his disposal, in regard to the one which he accepts as most reliable, that officially published by the Inquisition to do penance for practicing "killing, no murder," he observes: "It is on this Vie de Joseph Balsamo connu sous le nom de comte Cagliostro that our main dependence must be placed. Of which work, meanwhile, whether it is wholly or half genuine the reader may judge by one fact, that it comes to us through the medium of the Roman Inquisition, and the proofs to substantiate it (?) lie in the holy office there. Alas, this reporting familiar of the Inquisition was probably something of a liar."

I should remark that the Balsamo theory on which much of the opposition is based, is in my view untenable. It had its rise in the mendacity of a Jesuitical writer whose aim was to extenuate the Church. In the name of goodness if Cagliostro had been guilty of the various crimes and not least the robbery imputed to him at Palermo, why was he not handed over to the Sicilian civil authorities who would probably have meted out a just reward on proof of his rascality? It is an utterly unreliable theory, and simply on a par with the other impostures of Christianity. To aid the theory of the Divinity of Jesus Christ a forged passage is interpolated into the writings of Josephus. To prove a supposed early belief in certain untenable doctrines "the infallibility of the Pontiff," the "immaculate conception," and I could go on ad infinitum decretals, catacomb inscriptions and the like are manufactured.

Cagliostro is charged with Charlatanism, quackery, imposture and the use of jargon. Are these charges proven? What was alchemy? The mother of chemistry, or the chemical science of medieval and later ages? Nobody can dispute that if it had not been for their scientific, or if you will, the alchemical studies, that searching for the "philosophers' stone," Roger Bacon discovered gun powder, and Van Helmont the properties of gas. Nor is this all we owe, alchemy conserved for the scientists of to-day all the bases of knowledge possessed for the pursuit of further discoveries and inventions. Alchemy still exists in the East, and when frequently brought in contact with modern science the exponents of the latter are powerless to explain, results easily practicable to oriental chemists.

How are you certain that the "transmutation of metals" and the Rosicrucian search for the Elixir Vitæ are myths? But a few days ago I read that a European chemist had discovered the secret of the manufacture of diamonds, yet this appears by witnesses as I have shown to have been known to Cagliostro. Science to-day is only in her swaddling clothes—it is true a rather big baby, and who can tell that she will alter her front on main principles as Lyell and Murchison had to do that of geology? The jargon of the Rosicrucians and alchemists is perfectly explicable to their disciples of to-day. I have no doubt that if you were to bring together a modern Greek and an Irishman from the wilds of Connemara, both would fancy the other was talking jargon, and yet Celtic and Greek we know are nothing of the kind. Is not the astronomy of to-day based on the astrology of the past? Is astrology too, all untrue? It would seem not; for last year in the action brought by Lieut. Morrison, R. N. "Zadkiel," against Admiral Sir Edward Belcher, I find that numbers of English noblemen, scientists and men of letters came forward, and in the broad daylight of the Nineteenth Century swore in open court to an unswerving belief in the astrology of the past.

Are the Spiritualists, Magnetists and Mesmerists too, all charlatans, impostors and quacks? If I had the temerity to make such a statement in this Club, you would, I doubt not, hear men of science throwing back the assertion in my teeth with as great fervency as Cagliostro himself would have done. How is it your Dialectical societies and Colonel Olcotts are confounded and obliged to confess an utter incapacity to solve the problems by aid of the knowledge they have of the wondrous ramifications of nature and science?

Next Wednesday we shall have a phalanx of some 20,000 citizens all actuated with the divine instincts of brotherly love, relief and truth, marching in solemn procession through the streets of this city, avowedly to open a structure for their use, but actually to testify their conviction in the rights and equality of man, the immortality of the soul and a belief in the Deity. Clad in Mephistophelian livery, blood red, so emblematic of his faith, I doubt not a certain high personage gazing perchance from a lofty eminence and actuated with Torquemada sentiment would joyfully sacrifice each of those masonic brothers as his predecessors did Cagliostro. Aye, and if he did not fear reprisals perhaps give the order to his Irish myrmidons to re-enact a second St. Bartholomew in the streets and avenues of New York city. The tiger's claws are clipped now, as Pernambuco testifies, and so masonic imposters, pah! are only excommunicated and treated to curses which come duly home like chickens to roost.

The philanthropy of Cagliostro should entitle him to a pedestal beside John Howard or Wilberforce; this man whose benevolence filled hospitals of his own creation, where his great medical knowledge was given without stint to those who needed it, and who, when cured, were sent away not empty handed. His acquaintance with geology and the learned and abstruse sciences should place him in the ranks of the Eighteenth Century pioneers of Nineteenth Century discoveries, notwithstanding the fact that his disciples in their unhesitating reverence, yet ignorance attributed miraculous cures and effects, to-day quite explicable, but then exaggerated to lengths as absurd as the miracles we read of in Buddhist and Christian hagiologies. The assistance he gave to free-thought and his aid towards political regeneration, his hatred of the two co-eval evil principles, kingcraft and priestcraft, testified in the dissemination of the principles of "Liberte Egalite Fraternite," should receive our gratitude equally with those other patriots to whom the people of America and Europe owe the blessings enjoyed to-day.

If we have as his inventive calumniators a blackmailing editor and a Jesuit biographer, have we not on his record with others in his favor the names of Lavater, Cardinal de Rohan, Mirabeau, Lord George Gordon, Talleyrand, Lord Lytton, Swedenborg, Lafayette, the jurats of Bordeaux, the masonic brotherhood, and last but not least, Louis XVI, the government of France and the Parliament of Paris?

The life and death of Cagliostro is but another example of the long continued fight—a fight almost as old as the hills—the battle of the Church contra free-thought—theology versus science. It was the spirit of sacerdotalism which forced Socrates to take the fatal hemlock and which offered him up as a victim for endeavoring to teach a purer and nobler morality than evolved by Greek priests. It was that spirit which actuated the Jewish Priests to crucify Jesus Christ, I refer to the Christ of history, the disciple of Philo, the Essenes and Platonists, not the Christ of theology. Was it not this spirit which made Shelley cry out in his agony, and, be it said, to his regret in after years?

"There is no God!
Nature confirms the faith his death groan sealed,
Let heaven and earth, let man's revolving race,
His ceaseless generations tell their tale;
Let every part depending on the chain
That links it to the whole, point to the hand
That grasps its term! Let every seed that falls
In silent eloquence unfold its store
Of arguments. Infinity within,
Infinity without, belie creation;
The exterminable spirit it contains Is nature's only God; but human pride
Is skilful to invent most serious names
To hide its ignorance.

The name of God
Has fenced about all crime with holiness;

Himself the creature of his worshippers;
Whose names and attributes and passions change—
Seeva, Buddha, Foh, Jehovah, God or Lord."

And is it not this spirit which unable either to crush or answer Paine, Voltaire, Rousseau and the encyclopaedists make the priests of Christianity, Sunday after Sunday with closed platform attack with scurrilous abuse the dead lions and charge their antagonists with leading immoral lives, having fearful deaths, and, forsooth, with Atheism the very authors in whose writings are to be found the most beautiful and admirable arguments in favor of the existence of God which the brain of genius ever conceived.

For ourselves, this spirit would, had it the power, close our Science Congresses and our Liberal Clubs; force on bended knees our geologists, chemists and scientists, as the theologians did of old Galileo; burn or murder our Huxleys, Tyndalls, and Darwins, as they did Giordano Bruno—

"The dark-robed priests were met around the pile;
The multitude was gazing silently;
And, as the culprit passed with dauntless mien,
Tempered disdain in his unaltering eye.
Mixed with a quiet smile, shone calmly forth:
The thirsty fire crept round his manly limbs;
His resolute eyes were scorched to blindness soon;
His death prayer rent my heart! The insensate mob Uttered a cry of triumph, and I wept."

But the avengers are nigh, Strauss and Colenso, Renan and Seeley, "Iconoclast" Bradlaugh the republican and his Grace of Somerset the aristocrat, and from repeated blows Christianity, staggering and reeling like a drunken man is about "going"—"going to go,"—and shortly—"gone" to find a place only in the mythological dictionaries of the future.

In conclusion, can I not analogise the eloquent remarks of the patriot Mazzini on Rousseau and Byron to Cagliostro—"Such is the life of Genius. Envy and persecution but on one side of the tomb, it matters little which, assured triumph. You may burn the works of Rousseau in the public market place, the Spirit of Rousseau will survive; it will appear to you years afterward in the French Constitution. You may misinterpret the spirit, and blacken at your leisure the memory of Byron—you may exile his statue from Westminster Abbey, but the people who recognize in him the victim of one epoch and the prophet of another, will read and adopt him as their own in spite of you, and posterity will end by placing his prescribed statue above the tomb where will lie forever interred the principle of aristocracy."

To your acumen and to your spirit of "fair play," members of the Liberal Club do I look for a verdict? Am I mistaken in confidently believing that in your inmost heart of hearts, you respond "Cagliostro was a martyr and no impostor."

"Finis Coronat Opus."

The paper, which took nearly two hours in reading, was one of the most learned and eloquent the members of the club have ever had the pleasure of listening to. The lecturer was warmly applauded during its progress, and at the conclusion he received long and continued applause.

A discussion took place. After thanking Mr. SOTHERAN for his remarkable lecture, the chairman, Mr. ORMSBY, said that there was one thing he was still in doubt of, and that was the reason of the extraordinary wealth of Cagliostro.

MR. EVANS followed with a remark of a similar nature, and that he doubted Cagliostro's hatred of aristocracy, for he appeared to have as his friends only noblemen and the like. The same speaker greatly ridiculed many of the practices of Masonry, although very eulogistic of the theory; he also complimented MR. SOTHERAN very highly on his paper.

A Christian gentleman then took the platform. He objected to the lecturer's assertion about Biblical prophecies; he discoursed freely of Daniel, who, he said, saw in one of his dreams a beast cut up in four quarters, all of which marched about after separation, and he also stated the book of Daniel was translated into Greek, and was well known, previous to the fulfilment of this prophecy.

MR. STEPHEN PEARL ANDREWS followed with one of his usual eloquent addresses. After congratulating the Club on hearing so remarkable a lecture, and complimenting MR. SOTHERAN on its delivery, he said that he thanked the lecturer for his charity, his very broad charity, especially in the matter of Spiritualism. If five years ago, in that club, he had dared to make some of the statements the lecturer had, he would have been hissed down. He was sorry, however, that the lecturer was so antagonistic to Christianity, and said that credit should be given to that religion for the good it had done.

DR. ATKINSON avowed himself a Mason, and defended Masonry from the attack of MR. EVANS in a forcible speech. He spoke very strongly against the Pope, who, he said, having broken his obligation to the Masonic craft, deserved all the punishment he had stated on his oath he was merited to receive in the event of breaking the same.

In closing the discussion, the lecturer, MR. SOTHERAN, expressed the gratitude he felt for the warm encomiums passed upon his efforts by the various speakers, and observed that if there was one thing more than another he admired in the Liberal Club, it was their open platform, so unlike the pulpits of the various denominations, and which gave an opportunity for the ventilation of antagonistic opinions; one great excellence in connection with this was, that no false statement could be made, or inferred, and pass unheeded. He stated that he did not come forward as the apologist of Cagliostro; it had been his wish simply to narrate facts, and their unavoidable conclusions. Touching the question of the wealth of Cagliostro, he had distinctly stated that the great secret of his incomprehensible expenditure was, that the funds of the secret societies were placed at his disposal. It should also not be forgotten that he was a member, on his father's side, of one of the wealthiest houses in Europe. As to his friendship with the nobility being incompatible with his republicanism, he would remark that the great Revolutionary characters, Mirabeau, Talleyrand, Lafayette, D'Orleans, and, in this century, Shelley, Byron, Lord John Russell, Swinburne, and many of the other leading reformers, were men of aristocratic birth.

MR. SOTHERAN coincided with DR. ATKINSON in the matter of Masonry, and acknowledged himself to be a high grade member of the Brotherhood. As to Spiritualism, he considered that if the recent developments narrated by Col. Olcott and Prof. Crookes could be substantiated, it would be one of the greatest blessings to the human race, would effectually rid us of Atheism and its attendant gloominess, and would satisfactorily dispose of Materialistic objections to the immortality of the soul. On the topic of prophecy the lecturer recommended his Christian friend to apply to a fellow-believer in the Old Testament—some pious Rabbi, who would, doubtless, be able to explain the Jewish prophecies to his comprehension: as to this wonderful beast, he thought that if such a miraculous animal could be obtained by his friend it would be a great attraction at Barnum's hippodrome, and might be put beside the lion's den. The gentleman's assertion about the four quarters of the beast smacked somewhat of butchery, and his idea seemed to be to show there was something bestial about Christianity. MR. SOTHERAN said he had never heard of the Daniel manuscript referred to: it was probably burnt in the Library of Alexandria, which that pious adulterer and murderer, the Emperor Theodosius, in his Christian fanaticism, ordered to be destroyed. Here affirmed his statement that the pretended Biblical prophecies in many instances were probably written after the occurrences took place. He said, further, that some had reference to persons then living, and quoted Isaiah and Jeremiah to show that the context of many passages supposed to refer to Christ proved they did nothing of the kind, and also that many of these prophecies never were realized, in support of which he quoted Christ's statement that he would come to judge the world in the time of those he was speaking to, and which, as it had never taken place in their generations, probably never would.

In answer to MR. ANDREWS' criticism the lecturer stated that his belief, so far as Christ was concerned, was, if anything, Unitarian; as to the good Christianity had done, he could not but acknowledge that even to-day Christianity was an accessory to civilization. For instance: take a Central African village in its primitive state, with its fetish worship, its debasing and disgusting ceremonies, its bloodshed and barbarism, with its inhabitants nearer the ape rather than the Caucasian—take that village, say, one hundred years after the Christian or Mohammedan missionary had been there, on the gold coast on the west or the Zanzibar coast on the east, and we find all this fearful debasement has disappeared and civilization in its place. It is thus these theologies do good, not through their religious teachings at all, but through the civilization possessed by the superior Europeans or Asiatics, and which in its primary developments and progress was, if anything, antagonistic to those beliefs. But if we acknowledge the good, what of the evil? The early persecution of the Heathen, the Arian bloodshed, the sanguinary Crusades, the massacres of Huguenots, Waldenses and Albigenses, the Protestant persecution of Catholics, and the religious wars—all evolved out of Christianity, which, after all, is but a resuscitation of the old faiths, of the Socratic and Egyptian doctrine of the immortality of the soul, the Confucian, "Do unto others as you would be done by," etc. Christ himself, that man of blameless and spotless life, has been misrepresented by men calling themselves his priests, distorted for their pecuniary gain into a god, instead of being placed, as he merited, into a position with Confucius, Buddha, Zoroaster, Socrates, Plato, Mahomet, and the other religious reformers.

Man oft lives too long, and finds it to his cost.
In a few short years what friends has Beecher lost.
That mighty cable, late a Christian's pledge,
Now lies coiled up, and shows its "ragged edge."
Its every strand bespeaks the fearful strain,
With every fibre parting in the grain;
Tho' bright his monument on history's page,
The pile looks gloomy as it gathers age;
But how 'twill end, let's ever hope the best,
Nor tread too heavy on a man distress'd;
But here's a motto that should teach each heart:
"Man's but mortal, let not friendship part."

JOHN DIDIER, Basco, Ill., writes: THE TRUTH SEEKER is always a welcome visitor with us. I hope you are getting along prosperously.

JAMES MCDANIEL, Garrison, Iowa, writes: I think THE TRUTH SEEKER is the best paper I ever read; it is so outspoken and fearless. I would not do without it for twice its subscription price.

J. C. JOHNSON, Wine Hill, Ill., writes: THE TRUTH SEEKER is regularly received, and it seems to improve every number. I can no longer do without it, so I enclose the balance of my year's subscription.

JOHN SHAVER, Millard, Mo., writes: I like THE TRUTH SEEKER exceedingly. Enclosed find two dollars to pay for it. I am a poor man, but shall try and take it through life and as long as it continues its bold defense of truth, reason and natural sense.

S. G. GATES, East Wallingford, Vt., writes: I want to get a few copies of the Shelton discussion. I am highly pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER. You are of the right stamp—not afraid to tell the truth. Go ahead in your good work.

S. H. PRESTON, West Winfield, N. Y., writes: Let me assure you of a fact: I have the testimony of many who for years have been readers of leading Liberal prints, that they would not change THE TRUTH SEEKER for one of them. We wish it to be made a weekly as soon as practicable.

PROF. J. J. MORSE, lecturer, etc., from England, writing us from New Haven, Conn., says: I desire to express my pleasure with your brisk and lively paper, a few copies of which have recently fallen under my notice. I find the sentiments sound and first-class. Long may it live, and large may be its circulation.

J. A. RUTHERFORD, Honey Grove, Texas, writes: If you have any tracts for distribution, please send me some. "What thy hand findeth to do, do quickly." I think I soon shall lay off this mortality, and whether I shall take on immortality, I know not; but I hope I shall. I am not afraid to live forever. Goodness has been my God for many years, and I fear not to meet him.

JAMES R. VANN, Judsonia, Ark., writes: I had an opportunity of obtaining one of your papers, and am very much pleased with it. I read and re-read it until it was completely worn out. I do not think I now can do without it. Please send it to me for a year. I am proud to be considered an Infidel; one who is willing to discard old fables of the past in place of that which is true and reliable.

WM. HAYWARD, Silver Lake, Ind., writes: I am much pleased with your paper. Old theology, priestcraft and the hoary superstitions of the Christian Churches are doomed. The grand conflict is progressing. Glorious common sense and reason will yet triumph and humanity will be redeemed. May the great revolution ere long culminate, and may mental slavery follow in the wake of chattel slavery.

JAMES WARNER, East Fork, Ill., writes: I have been reading two or three numbers of your paper, and must say I like them very much. I find them very interesting, and wish you to send it to me for a year. I was once a member of the Church, but saw very little pleasure in it; my mind was full of fears and doubts. I have long since renounced it, and have adopted a more rational belief, and now am able to feel and live more like a man than before.

JOHN S. BOULTON, Jacksonville, N. J., writes: I am much pleased with your paper. I leave it round where my Christian friends can see it. I was brought up a Methodist, but I happened last Fall to get a copy of Thos. Paine's "Age of Reason," and, upon reading it, was surprised to find his views were so clear and far advanced, and that he so plainly showed the Bible to be spurious. It was the first book of the kind I had seen, and since then I have procured some of Prof. Denton's works, and I now am confirmed in the truth.

THOMAS H. DODGE, Oxford, Ohio, writes: Assuring us he has not forgotten us, he says:

Forget you? No, as soon the sun
Would cease its daily course to run,
Or fail to shed its glorious light,
And shroud us in eternal night;
As soon the moon would cease to soar—
Give back her light and shine no more;
Yes, just as soon the stars would all
In dead chaotic tumult fall.
Yes, all these things may chance be true:
But I can't cease to think of you;
I think of you when the moon is high,
When stars are twinkling in the sky,
Renew my thoughts ere morning dawns
To decorate the pleasant lawns;
I'll think of you who're dear to me,
When winter's frost has stripped the tree.
Yes, dearest B. I think of you,
When winter storms I've passed through,
When Spring returns and all is mirth,
And nature bursting into birth,
When Sol is spreading his bright hue,
Friend B. I then will think of you.
I'll not forget you, no, not I,
When midnight darkness veils the sky,
I'll not forget you night or day,
While life shall animate this clay,
Long as the tints of morn I hail,
My love for you shall never fail.
Now in return I ask of thee,
Do not forget, but think of me.

[We thank our kind friend for remembering us so fondly, and we assure him we have written his name with those whom we shall never forget.—Ed. T. S.]

J. M. COOK, Lake Village, N. H., writes: I send you one dollar to apply on THE TRUTH SEEKER for Mr. Tucker. He says it is the best, truest and most common sense paper he ever read. He is seventy-eight years old; a great reader and a first-class mechanic. I have to say of your paper, it is the plainest and truest Bible I have ever read, and I do hope thousands may be induced to peruse it, so that the Snodes and Sheltons and the cowards that threaten your life may learn to reason from a true standpoint. Right must come uppermost at last. The clergy and church people feel as though they are on their last pins.

CHAS. JONES, Fairbury, Ill., writes: I was a few days ago conversing with an aged friend, over seventy-five years of age, when the conversation turned upon the Deity. I asked his opinion of a Creator. He replied, answering, he would quote from Dershoven's address to the Deity:

O thou eternal one, whose presence bright,
All space doth occupy, all motion guide;
Unchanged through time's all devastating flight,
Thou only God, there is no God beside.
Being above all Beings, mighty One,
That none can comprehend, and none explore;
Thou fill'st existence with thyself alone,
Embracing all, supporting, ruling o'er,
Being we call God, and know no more.

He informed me he read the above over thirty years ago, and was so impressed with its sublimity that he had not since forgotten it. He is now nearly blind, and he comes over to my place to hear me read THE TRUTH SEEKER to him. He and I both wish you abundant success.

HORATIO GATES, Breakabeen, N. Y., writes: Our blatant, self-styled teachers of God are hard at work trying to dupe their followers and to remove the effects of your articles in THE TRUTH SEEKER upon the Flood by denying that there was more than 250 animals to go into the ark at the time of the flood. They say the rest are crosses from those. Please give, through your paper, the facts as to the number of species the doctrine could not reach.

REPLY.—We know not what authority those divines find in the Bible that new species and varieties of animals have been produced by crossing and hybridizing. They might as well embrace the Darwinian theory at once and throw the Bible aside entirely, as to go part way and try to claim the facts which science teaches, but which the Bible does not.

Were a flood covering the entire earth to occur now, and another Noah were to take the contract of getting into one tub of a boat all the animated life that would otherwise drown, he would have to collect together 267,000 species of mammals or animals that give suck. Reptiles, 657 species; the Feathered tribe, 8,000 species; Articulates, including all the bugs, beetles, flies, fleas, bees, wasps, moths, mosquitoes, butterflies, spiders, scorpions, grasshoppers, locusts, myrapods, worms and all creeping, crawling, wriggling and flying things, 750,000 species, thus making in all over a million species of animated life which this Noah would have to gather together. Of all of them, he must have two of each, and of many kinds seven of each, making the estimated number three million animals. How long would it require an old man and his three boys to gather them all together, take care of them, feed them and prevent their perishing? These numbers are taken from the best naturalists of the world; and we repeat, the divines of Scholastic County have no authority in the Bible for saying that God at the creation made but two hundred and fifty animals. The book teaches he made every thing that has life, and nowhere says that new species were evolved or Darwinized one from another. The Bible and Science does not work well together. We advise these divines, if they wish to avail themselves of the teachings of science, to discard the Bible entirely.

A. R. SWARTZCOPE, Bradley, Ill., writes: Please send me a few back numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER for distribution. Some of my neighbors who have seen my paper wish one to read: they like the paper from what they have seen of it because it goes for the theopoeitical preachers. It is thus step by step—idea by idea—the world advances and the eyes of the people become opened, and that too without much effort of their own. In viewing the effects of the transition of thought, I have often been reminded of the boy who on waking up one morning found a new pair of pants in place of the old ones: and for many a day his greatest wonder was how those new trousers got there, for he had never seen his mother making them, nor the girls weaving the cloth. So it is with our benighted orthodox friends. They are waking up to a sense of the fact that some of their old ideas are replaced by new ones, and their greatest wonder is, how they, in this enlightened age, in this boasted land of freedom, free speech and free press did once believe in these monstrously absurd notions—that they once supposed truth, justice and knowledge with lies, superstition and faith. The injunction "cast thy seed upon the waters" was never more miraculously fulfilled than now. The lives, the blood the hearts and souls that have been crushed in the body by that horrible despot Superstition that freethought, truth and knowledge may prevail, are now being reincarnated. If that theory is true the prevalence of Liberalism to-day is explained; but rather let us ascribe the effect to that cause which is rather the effect of being free from the hold of priestcraft or any other form of superstition.

Brothers Genung, Hindman and myself have turned preachers. We hold meetings on Sundays, in which we discourse on the Bible, read essays and selections from THE TRUTH SEEKER. Our Reverends "Uncle Bill" and "Uncle Cale" say their pieces on one Sunday, and we show the other side on the next. It works well, and in due time I expect there will be many souls saved and converted to reason and common sense. Would it not be well to commend such a course through THE TRUTH SEEKER to other localities? All hands together, and with a hearty "Heigh O" we can launch our Ship of Truth upon the sea of human mind where none dare molest her.

REMARKS.—The course our Brother has indicated is excellent, and one we would like to see put in practice in every town and hamlet in the country where half a dozen Liberal or progressive minds can be found. In the Liberal publications may be found ample material to read to small audiences and will answer nearly as well as a good lecture. It is very needful that the Liberal element of the country should be unified and organized that we may work effectively together. By meeting together once a week to read and discuss, is a great help in this direction. Friends, it costs mere nothing. Please put it in practice where ever a little band can be found willing to work together.—[Ed. T. S.]

THE CLOCK STRUCK ONE

AND

EMBELLISHED WITH A FINE STEEL PORTRAIT OF THE AUTHOR.

THE REV. SAMUEL WATSON,

Of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Being a synopsis of the investigations of spirit intercourse by an Episcopal Bishop, three ministers, five doctors and others at Memphis, Tenn., in 1855; also, the opinion of many eminent divines, living and dead, on the subject, and communications received from a number of persons recently.

"TRUTH IS MIGHTY AND WILL PREVAIL."

The "Clock Struck One" is an intensely interesting work in itself, and derives great additional interest from the high standing of its author in the Methodist Episcopal Church in which he has been a bright and shining light for a quarter of a century.
a man who is personally known to nearly all the clergy of the South and to a wide circle in the North and wherever known is held in the highest esteem. These circumstances cause the book to be eagerly sought for. This anxiety is heightened by the action of the Methodist Conference of which the author is a member in disciplining him for publishing the book, thus attracting the attention of thousands of all sects who are anxious to read and judge for themselves the "Clock Struck One."

JESUS OF NAZARETH,

OR A TRUE HISTORY OF THE MAN CALLED JESUS CHRIST

EMBRACING

His parentage, his youth, his original doctrines and works, his career as a public teacher and physician of the people. Also, the nature of the great conspiracy against him; with all the incidents of his tragical death, given on spiritual authority, from spirits who were contemporary mortals with Jesus while on the earth.

By PAUL and JUDAS, through ALEXANDER SMYTH, Medium, of Philadelphia, by the spirits taking possession of him about one hour in every twenty-four, usurping all his powers, giving a continued series of well connected scenes, presenting scenery, characters and personages, dialogues and actions in their regular order and succession, embracing all the most important personages and the incidents which occurred during the sojourn of Jesus upon earth. There was probably no book ever written in which such perfect life-pictures occur; every city and country village, every river, brook and mountain, and scenery in general, is so vividly portrayed that an actual journey through the country could hardly be more interesting. The characters in this unexampled drama are so faithfully portrayed that, as you are introduced to each in turn, you seem well acquainted and delighted with your company, and the many points of interest you are called to visit. The book is replete with interest from beginning to end and had already passed through several editions when the plates were entirely destroyed in the great fire, since then we have had a very great demand for the work from our subscribers and the trade. The edition about to be issued will be far superior in mechanical appearance to any of its predecessors, and we shall print a large edition to enable us to supply standing orders and all new demands. 12mo., 356 pages, cloth bound.

The Investigator is devoted to the Liberal cause in religion; or, in other words, to Universal Mental Liberty. Independent in all its discussions, discarding superstitious theories of what never can be known it devotes its columns to things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who have entered its unknown shores. Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interest of this world, it confines itself to things of this life entirely. It will soon commence its FORTY-FIFTH year and asks for support from those who are fond of sound reasoning, good reading, reliable news, anecdotes, science, art, and a useful Family Journal. Reader, please send your subscriptions for six months or one year; and if you are not satisfied with the way the Investigator is conducted, we won't ask you to continue with us any longer. MILTON was one day asked by a friend of female education, if he did not intend to instruct his daughter in the different languages. "One tongue is sufficient for a woman," replied he.

WHEN a youth of ten has utilized the old man's plug hat to tan rat-skins in it requires iron nerve on the part of the parent to stroke the ruined article gently with his sleeve and murmur pleasantly: "Boys will be boys."

ACCORDING TO CIRCUMSTANCES.—Sister: "What are you doing, Bill?" Bill: "Drawing Jack the Giantkiller." Sister: "Do you think that is a proper Sunday amusement?" Bill: "O, ver' well, then; it's David 'an' the Giantgoliah."

It certainly looks a little odd when a married couple are visiting a friend's house to see the wife accidentally lay her hand on the coal shovel, and the husband as if by instinct, dodge behind the nearest object that can afford him shelter.

A MISSOURI girl on her wedding day sold her Piano and bought a sewing machine and materials enough for a suit for her husband and herself, and at once set to work to make them up. Her husband blowed it. In two weeks her four sister were married.

A YOUNG man stepped up to a lovely young lady on the steps of a church, and, crooking his elbow, said: "May I have the indescribable pleasure of accompanying you to the paternal domicile?" "Spell domicile," said she. He gave it up, and she unhesitatingly gave him the mitten.

While on her way to a leap into the river, a Minneapolis girl met a sewing machine agent who sold her a machine and finally proposed and she turned back and was happy. Almost any day now one can count four or five Minneapolis girls wandering along the river banks.

A MORAL LESSON.—Mother:—"My dear do you know it is very wrong for you thus to take your sister's playthings without her consent? Does not your conscience tell you this is not right?"

Daughter:—"Well, mother, since you have spoken of it, I think I have not done just right. I should have asked my sister's consent; but then I am not as guilty as Beecher."

THE pig was thus written up by a Georgia boy: "The pig is about as big as a sheep, only a pig's wool isn't good for making stockings of. Why is a pig like a tree? Because he roots; that is a conundrum. A pig washes himself in the mud. A pig has four legs, one under each corner of his body. They pickle pig's feet, but not until after the pig is done using 'em. A pig squeals awful when it rains, also when you pull its tail. A pig has got a first-rate voice for squealing, and he grunts when he feels good. You can't make a whistle of a pig's tail, 'cos it is crooked. Why is a pig like Tommy Grant? 'Cos he's got his nose in everybody's business. This is another conundrum, which is all I know about the pig."

THE HACKMAN IN COURT.—"Your name is—is—what?" asked the Court.

"Davy, sir—George Davy."

"And you work at—what?"

"Drive hack."

"Ah—ha!" smiled his honor, acquiring sudden interest; "this is worth twenty dollars to me. You are one of those men who stand on the edge of the walk at the depots and shout 'Hax!' at the people."

"I have to get passengers sir."

"Don't sass me back Mr. Davy—I know all about you! Only the other day as I returned from a May-day party in the country there were one million five hundred and sixty-five thousand three hundred and ninety-two of you on the curbstone, and every one of you yelled 'Hax!' at me. One seized my satchel, another grabbed me by the coat, and another pulled me back by the coat-tails. I believe you are that man."

"Deed sir I haint."

"Well, it's barely possible that I am mistaken; but here's a charge that you were lying on the walk drunk."

"I wasn't sir; I was sitting up along-side a house."

"That's too fine a point to argue. Were you drunk?"

"Only sprung, sir; only a little sprung."

"That's just as bad in the sight of the law and I ought to fine you $700."

"Gracious! but I could never pay that!"

"No; My object would be to keep you in prison all your days."

"Oh let up on a fellow," pleaded the prisoner. "This is the first time, and it shall be the last. I've a large family, sir, and they need my wages to get their bread."

His Honor took a long time to think, and then replied;

"It's wrong to let you off. The citizens will condemn me, and the newspapers will blow at me but I believe I'll give you a show. Yow may go, but I shall keep watch of you. You must mend your ways right off. Instead of yelling 'Hax!' at a man, do you smile and softly whisper: 'Sir can I have the pleasure of conveying you to some designated point?' Promise me this."

The prisoner promised, and was allowed to disappear, limping sadly with a sore heel.—Detroit Free Press.

AN English savant estimates that the globe weighs 5,852,000,000,000,000 tons.

Boston has a tenement population of 55,000 persons, representing 13,000 families, crowded into 43,000 rooms in 2,630 houses.

THE Rev. J. G. White of Jacksonville, Ill., lectures against Romanism, and offers to bet a thousand dollars that his assertions cannot be disproved.

A LaCrosse church has two women to pass the contribution box, and it is a curious sight to see those women pass the boxes over their husbands' heads.

IN removing some bodies from the Bennington (Vt.) cemetery, the other day, that of Mrs. Bartlett, which had been buried some twelve years, was found to be petrified, weighing 500 pounds.

THE Rev. L. T. Hardy, a Baptist pastor in Shelby county, Kentucky, has had a terrible fall from decency, and has fled, with a brother of one of his female parishoners in hot pursuit.

WHEN the jury in the Beecher-Tilton trial retired from the trial room, as Foreman Carpenter passed out he was seen to nod and smile at Mr. Beecher, who nodded and smiled in return.—N. Y. Times.

THE Troy Times says one of the most learned jurists in this State, after thoroughly reviewing the Brooklyn scandal case, gives it as his opinion that the adultery Beecher committed is the only manly act he has performed in the whole business.

ONE of two things must be true; either Mr. Beecher is guilty or he is not. If he is guilty, he is a moral monster; if he is innocent he has acted the part of an idiot in such perfection that one almost wonders which is worse, the crime or the imbecility.—Golden Age.

A COLORED congregation in Dayton, Ohio, have decided to forgive their clergyman for betting on three-card monte and losing $90 of festival money. One of the deacons remarked: "We is all human, and the game is werry exciting."

A MINISTER, about to chastise a servant, was asked, "Mister, don't you preach that God ordains whatever comes to pass? Then how could I help doing what I did? The master replies: "It was also ordained that I should chastise you for it, and how can I help doing it."

A CHURCH QUARREL.—A lively contest recently prevailed at Newbridge, L. I., N. Y., between two Methodist clergymen, Rev. K. N. Wright and Rev. Mr. Kristeller. The first had preached a year at the place, and was opposed to leaving; the second was appointed by the Conference to succeed him. The first refused to vacate, hence the quarrel. The church divided as to the two claimants, some joining one, some the other. The quarrel waxed warm at times, and some of the saints shook their fists in a most ungodly manner. At latest advices the quarrel still raged.

FATHER MCGLENN is the pastor of a Roman Catholic church in Boston, of which John Fanning is a member. Recently Fanning was married to a Protestant girl by a Protestant clergyman, contrary to the teaching of his own denomination. Father McGlenn spoke of the occurrence in the pulpit, declaring that his offending parishioner was guilty of a crime in living with a girl who, in the view of the Church, was not his wife. Fanning sued the pastor for slander, and the case is now on trial

Four doctors tackled Johnny Smith,
They blistered and they bled him,
With squills and anti-bilious pills
And ipecac they fed him.
They stirred him up with calomel,
And tried to move his liver;
But all in vain—his little soul
Was wafted o'er the river.

IN speaking of Beecher, the Utica Observer remarks: "After he has passed away, when his personal magnetism is destroyed by death, when the record of his busy life is written up, all other facts will be overshadowed by the central fact that he was the luckless defendant in the scandal suit." To which the Sun adds: "But the great question of all will remain: Was he innocent, or was he guilty? If guilty both of adultery and perjury, he will be regarded as one of the greatest of criminals and the greatest of hypocrites; if innocent, he will be esteemed as a coward without a peer, and a fool whose folly was almost idiotic. The fact that he was defendant in this trial will have little importance compared with the answer to this great question."

No man can sell anything in Brooklyn now, if he doesn't say that Beecher is a slandered angel and Tilton a black-souled horse thief. The signs on Brooklyn places of business may be supposed to read something like this: "Metropolitan Paroxysmal Osculatory Carpet Store." "Song-in-the-Heart Bird-cage Works." "Ragged-Edge Laundry." "Anxiety Machine Shop and Plow Manufactory." "J. William Brown, Plastering Done with True Inwardness." "Moral Niagara Bath Rooms." "I-even-wish Snuff Factory." "Cave of Gloom Distillery." "Conspirator's Hotel." "Anti-Tiltonian Tripe for Sale Here." "Down & Out, Brass Works."—Courier-Journal.

WAITING FOR THE VERDICT.—Counselor Beach made his ten day's able, eloquent, argumentative speech. Judge Neilson followed with a brief, but very able and fair charge to the jury, when they retired to agree or to disagree. Two days have we been waiting for the verdict and none comes. From bits of paper picked up in the room occupied by the jury on which their names were written it is conjectured seven were for Beecher and five for Tilton. This disagreement will hardly be overcome. In view of the high standing of the defendant, and the natural prejudices of a Christian jury, the peculiar influences of Plymouth Church that have brought to bear, this disagreement is very expressive and tantamount to a conviction of the reverend defendant. It is conclusive, at all events, that a portion of the jury see positive proofs of Mr. Beecher's guilt. The verdict of the great jury of the country will doubtless be decisive. Mrs. Tilton's late conduct is very noticeable. After confessing her crime to her husband, both orally and in writing; after stating Mr. Beecher's guilt in a letter to Rev. Mr. Storrs; after confessing the adultery to her mother and daughter, to her brother and sister-in-law, to Mrs. Bradshaw and Miss Susan B. Anthony, she has now seen fit, in her great anxiety to serve her pastor, to make an affidavit that Mr. Beecher never was guilty of the slightest impropriety with her. The unfortunate woman by her own conduct has placed herself entirely without the pale of public credence. Any statement of the matter she is able to make cannot be relied upon.

SUPPOSE that some time ago, when Henry C. Bowen was a widower, he became engaged to a young lady remarkable for beauty, talents, and accomplishments, and being engaged, expected to marry her. Suppose, however, that before the day set for the marriage, she confessed to him that she had been seduced by the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher. Suppose that Bowen went to Beecher with this revelation; and suppose that then Beecher confessed his crime likewise, went down upon his knees before Bowen, and deploring his sin, declared that he had earnestly and truly repented thereof, and adjured the injured man, for the sake of the woman he had loved, not to expose either the licentious, adulterous pastor, or his beguiled and unfortunate paramour.

Suppose, then, partly because he confided in the genuineness of Beecher's repentance, and partly because his business interests were favored by seeming to believe in Beecher's innocence, Bowen continued to uphold Beecher as the pastor of Plymouth Church, and that this went on for years with varying circumstances, but with silence on Bowen's part as to the purport of Beecher's confession, until another man accuses Beecher of seducing his wife, and the scandal of that accusation becomes loud in the land, and at last it is brought before a court of justice to be investigated and ended.

Under such circumstances would it not be safe for Beecher to defy Bowen, and for his counsel to cover Bowen all over with denunciation and with shame? Could Bowen reply by telling the truth of the acknowledgment of guilt by Beecher, and by dragging out facts which honor requires him to conceal? Can he testify and cover with infamy a woman to whom he had been engaged, and whose fatal secret had been confided to him in such a manner? Must he not maintain silence at the cost of his own reputation and at the sacrifice of every impulse of retaliation and even of justice?

Suppose all this to be true, is not the situation of Bowen really one of the most tragical and pitiable in all the complications of this unprecedented drama?—N. Y. Sun.

THE PRESS AND MR. BEECHER.—Before the decks are cleared for the newspaper verdict in the great scandal, let us dismiss once and for all the absurd assertion that the press, as a rule, is malicious in its treatment of Henry Ward Beecher, and that it desires to keep up this profitless discussion in order to create a demand for the papers.

No man fared better at the hands of journalists for twenty-five years than Mr. Beecher. His agreeable oddities were paraded in print; his bright sayings were reported and repeated; his good qualities were magnified and his popularity enhanced by the gratuitous advertisements which he got from the public journals.

His fame at best was always ephemeral. Nobody remembers anything that he said five, or three, or two years ago. He has commanded the largest hearing imaginable, but he has left no enduring monument to his reputation in the form of religious researches or literary effort. If the newspapers had not assisted in bolstering him up, his fame ere this would naturally have begun to decline.

We know of no journal in all the land that took any pleasure in laying before its readers the charges against Beecher. Fully a year before the publication of the Woodhull scandal, the Observer, and presumably the New York Sun and Times, the Springfield Republican, and the Chicago Tribune were in possession of statements involving Beecher's moral character. Nor were these statements mere idle rumors. They emanated from responsible parties—and from persons, too, who stand forth to-day as Beecher's ablest apologists and champions.

But by common consent the rumors were suppressed; and by common consent also no heed was paid to the Woodhull woman's recital. It was not until Theodore Tilton had made his sworn statement, and Beecher had called his Investigating Committee that the "newspaper trial" began.

When the scandal was once launched on the sea of discussion it became the duty of every decent and respectable journal to weigh the evidence, to dismiss all feeling of prejudice and passion and to judge fairly between the two sides. If nine-tenths of the public prints have reached a decision adverse to Mr. Beecher, it is not because they entertained any love for Tilton or any dislike for the Plymouth pastor, but because the preacher's own explanation of his acts and utterances is unsatisfactory.—Utica Observer.

The Pro and Con of Supernatural Religion; or,

An Answer to the Question: Have We a Supernaturally Revealed, Infinitely Inspired and Miraculously Attested Religion in the World?

BY E. E. GUILD.

6. "The Bible may be appealed to, and often is, to sanction the worst of vices and enormities. Hatred of enemies; did not David boast that he hated his enemies with 'perfect hatred'? Did he not denounce upon them the most grievous curses? Does not God hate those who hate him, and can it be wrong to imitate his example? Plurality of wives; was not polygamy tolerated among the Jews? Keeping of mistresses; did not holy men of old have their concubines? Retaliation and revenge; does not God avenge himself on his enemies? and was not the Levitical law founded on the principle of rendering evil for evil? Slavery; was it not sanctioned by Moses? Slaughtering of prisoners taken in war, and even of women and children; did not God command his people to do it, and did not the holy prophet Samuel, set an example of this kind, by hewing Agag in pieces 'before the Lord'? Cheating; did not Jacob's father-in-law cheat him, and did not Jacob pay him off in his own coin? Lying; did not God command it on a certain day? Deception; was not Samuel directed by the Lord to practice it? Treachery; did not Rahab pretend to afford protection to a man who was fleeing from his enemies, and then betray and rob him of his life? and is she not commended for her faith? Was not Jacob treacherous to his own brother, in taking advantage of his necessities, and robbing him of his birthright? and also to his own father, in procuring from him the blessing which he designed for Esau? Intolerance; does not the Bible everywhere demand belief of men as the first and indispensable requisite, apparently, without regard to proofs and evidences? and did not Paul pronounce curses on all who did not believe his Gospel? Persecution; were not the Jews commanded to destroy all the inhabitants of Canaan who would not adopt their religion?

It may be said that most of these practices are condemned in the New Testament. So they are, but the New Testament is a part of the Bible, and the fact named only shows the conflicting nature of the teachings of that book. Many of the men who practiced the vices above named, are even in the New Testament, held up to view as exceptionally pious, holy and worthy men; how can it be expected that believers in the divine authority of the Bible can escape the contagion of their example?

7. "If it was necessary for God to make a revelation to his creatures in book form, it is but reasonable to believe that he would protect it in such a manner as that his design in giving it could not be defeated. But such is not the case with the Bible." A book containing a revelation, and designed to be transmitted to future generations throughout all time, should be accompanied with external and internal evidences so overwhelming as to command the assent of every one that examined its claims. If it was in manuscript writings, and required to be copied frequently; if it was written in one language, and translated into a number of others, the same being who communicated it at first, should superintend the copying and translation of it in such a way as to prevent all mistakes. We should know who the original writers were, when it was written, and in what place. We ought to know when it was translated, and by whom. In fine, we ought to have a well-authenticated account of its origin and history. The Bible lacks every one of these essential requisites. The history of no book in the world is involved in more obscurity than that. Except the writings of Paul, we do not know when the books of the Bible were written, the particular place where, the time when, nor the persons by whom. But there are some things we do know about it, and what we do know is very much against it as a revelation.

The Old Testament is a collection of books which the Jews during some periods of their history deemed sacred; at other times they did not so regard them. The New Testament is a collection of books which were written some time during the first and second centuries of the Christian era. They were selected from a great number of similar books in about the third century. Before their collection and after, they, and many others beside, were accepted as inspired. The Old and New Testaments were written in languages which have ceased to be spoken. The books of the Bible existed for many years in manuscripts only, and have been frequently copied. Our English translation was made, not from the original manuscripts, but from copies of them, not one of which, of the Old Testament, was older than the ninth century of the Christian era, and not one of the New older than the sixth. The different copies of these manuscripts vary considerably from each other. There has been various translations of the Bible into the English language, no two of which are exactly alike. Dr. Bellamy made a translation, which made some important passages say exactly the reverse of what they are made to say in the common English version.

It is universally admitted by the learned that the copyists did make mistakes in the copying, that the translators did make mistakes in translating, and many of them admit that the collectors of the books made mistakes in selecting. It is also admitted that the copies from which our Bible was translated contained passages which were not in the original text. Our version, then, contains interpolations, mistranslations and supplied words. The division of it into chapters and verses, the supplied words, the heading in the upper margin of the pages, and over the chapters, the copying, the collecting and translation, is all the work of fallible men, for whom no divine guidance is claimed. Is this the care God exercises over his revelation? If he thinks no more of it than this, why should we concern ourselves about it?

The belief in the Bible as a revelation, is calculated to perpetuate some of the most degrading superstitions. Most of its believers understand it to teach the existence of a Devil, with his millions of kindred and subordinate evil spirits, disputing with the Almighty the throne of the Universe, and exerting a malign influence over the hearts and minds of men. The tendency of this belief is to induce men to keep a sharp lookout for this imaginary fiend, to the entire neglect of the real Devil that every man carries about with him in his heart. The Bible, too, is understood to sanction the belief in necromancy, fortune-telling, witchcraft, sorcery, magic, special providences, and that diseases both of mind and body are produced by evil spirits. What wonder is it, then, that so many are led astray by the lying wonders of Matthias, and Joe Smiths, of the present day? What hope can there be for the improvement of men who believe that the affairs of this life, the events which take place in the world, and the phenomena of nature, are all the results of a special providence, without regard to order or the natural sequence of cause and effect? Certainly none; for, according to this view there can be no such thing as science in any department of nature; in other words, the fact that a phenomena occurred to-day, is no proof that it ever occurred before, or ever will again. Hence, those who hold this view are full of the belief in the marvelous; are continually talking about special providences either in their favor, or against them; are constantly dodging some miraculous thunderbolt from heaven, or anticipating some supernatural interposition in their behalf. It is not a real world in which they live, but one wholly ideal and imaginary. Solid truth, the facts of science, a knowledge of nature and her laws, has for them no interest, and possesses for them no charms. Until this spell on the minds of otherwise intelligent men is broken, how can they be emancipated from the bonds of superstition?

9. This belief in the authority of the Bible blinds and bewilders the minds of men. The Bible contains a record of prodigies the most astounding; of marvels the most wonderful, of miracles the most marvelous, and statements the most incredible. Hence, it conflicts with common sense, shocks our credulity, and does violence to our reason. The man who believes it is put in a mental condition to believe almost anything. All power to distinguish between things reasonable and unreasonable, credible and incredible, is overcome. He believes, not on evidence, but on authority alone; he does not dictate his own belief, but has it dictated to him. Like the young of birds, he opens his mouth and swallows whatever is given him without reference to its quality. They are in the situation of the clergyman, who, in defending the Bible, said, "the Bible says that a whale swallowed Jonah, and I believe it, and if it said that Jonah swallowed the whale I would believe that." Now, truth is the natural food of the mind, as bread is of the body; and truth must be as wisely adapted to the powers and faculties of the mind, as food is to the taste, and digestive powers of the body. Food that is distasteful and indigestible, is unwholesome, so that the mental and moral diet, that violates our reason, shocks our moral sense, and wounds the best affections of our nature, must be spurious. There are thousands of good men and women who profess to believe in things which they admit look to them unreasonable, and shocking to their feelings; but, nevertheless, they feel obligated to believe as they do, on the sole authority of the Bible. Such persons are the miserable victims of a mental and moral tyranny that demands the best efforts of the best men to overthrow.

10. "The great argument usually employed to make converts to the belief in the Bible, not only betrays a want of confidence in it, on the part of those who use it, but it constitutes a ground of objection to it." The principal argument usually relied on to propagate this belief in the world is that which is by far the most successful, and leaves us with but one alternative. It is this, "Believe, or be damned." Thousands of persons who are as ignorant of the history and origin of the Bible as the veriest heathen on earth, will go into the pulpit and proclaim to their hearers doctrines the most shocking to reason and common sense, and when asked for the evidence of their truth, will tell us that "God is the authority for their truth." When asked how we are to know that, the answer will be, "they are taught in the Bible—which is God's word—and we must accept them or be damned." Could arrogance and presumption go farther than this? Here it is assumed not only that the Bible is an infallible book, but that they correctly understand a book which thousands have attempted to explain, no two of whom ever agreed in its interpretation. Is this the way to treat rational beings? Can such persons know anything about the science of mind? Have they the least conception of the necessary connection between evidence and belief? Do they not proceed on the supposition that rational belief can be induced by bribes and threats? Or if they are not ignorant of the fact that a sufficient amount of evidence will irresistibly produce conviction on the mind, and that to undertake to gain the assent of men to the truth of any doctrine by bribes and threats, is only to try to make them hypocrites, and mental and moral cowards and slaves; then, we ask, are they not the greatest mountebanks that ever "played fantastic tricks before high heaven," and do they not insult the understanding of man? Do the teachers of scientific truth first give their lesson, and then offer rewards to those who believe their inculcations, and threaten punishment to those who do not? Are they alarmed when the truthfulness of their teachings is questioned, and do they threaten with the judgments of God and the wrath of heaven all who doubt or disbelieve them? If not, why is it any more necessary to do so to enforce religious truth than any other kind of truth? If teachers in any other department of knowledge were to proceed in this way, they would very soon be destitute of pupils, and it is certainly a marvel how intelligent men can put themselves under the teaching of men who are constantly insulting them. If such teachers do not know any better, they are entitled to our pity; if they do know better, they are more entitled to our pity still, but the course they pursue is deserving only of the scorn and contempt of mankind. Persons who are conscious they have truth to offer, and believe they can present an abundance of evidence to sustain it, will not fool away their time by resorting to arts and tricks, nor promises, nor threats in order to commend it to their hearers. The fact, then, that religious teachers do resort to these means is proof that they have not entire confidence in the truth of their doctrines, and that having no hope of producing conviction on the minds of men by evidence, they rely on appeals to their superstitious fears. The fact, too, that there is such alarm in their ranks whenever the bulwark behind which they have entrenched themselves is assailed, is proof that they doubt the impregnability of their position. The man who is afraid of Truth, or fears that she cannot take care of herself, or that it is not for the interest of the people to know the whole truth, is a traitor to God, to truth, and to man.

As to the religious and moral truths taught in the New Testament, such as the existence of God, his fatherhood, the brotherhood of the race, the immortality of man and the golden rule, they need no confirmation from miracles, from books nor from men. They are their own authority and their own proof. They have the "witness of the spirit," and "the spirit is given to every man to profit with all." All forms of religion contain the elements of one universal religion. The dogma it is that has set man at war with man. More religion and less dogma the great want of humanity.

Reader, both sides are before you, judge ye what is right.

To the God in Constitutionists.

FRIENDS: Your defect is, you do not go far enough. There is no logic in your timid, half-way demand. Take the whole step and logical Christian men must go with you. Let me explain. As we live under laws borrowed from the heathen Romans and Greeks no wonder we are so degenerate. I propose that while we are about it we adopt the laws of God. We can find them in the Pentateuch. There we may find laws for national government fresh from Jehovah himself—the genuine, unadulterated article. Is it right for a Christian nation to live under heathen laws, or even human laws, when we may have laws direct from God? Therefore when we put God in the Constitution, let us put his laws in our statute book.

A SCHOOL teacher in Mississippi uses his facility in short-hand to make a verbatim report of a negro clergyman's prayer, and he sends it to the Educational Monthly as follows: "O Lord God of dis Universe, wilt dou look down in de omnipresence of dy eye upon these dy collard children bowed upon the knuckle-bone dis night. Take a solemn peep upon us and let a heap o' light in. Dou knowest what dese dy poor darkies need. On every side dou knowst, O Lord, is de evidence of de dislocation and destruction of the human family. Dere be fighting among one another and natural disease. But we die to live again either as saints or evil spirits. Dere be discussions on doctrines, election, beforeordination, perfection, and sich like, confuse de intellects of both black men and white. But, good Lord, dou knowest dat dese are vain allusions, splittin' and dividin' dy creatures into sexes without mercy. Whoever will, can go to glory. Many dere will be with slick countenances, white collars and fine clothes, who will find de gates shut against them, while de blind old woman, hobbling on crutches, she go straight in. Amen."

The Freethinker to his Father.

[The following lines were written by a young man, to his father who was very ill and supposed to be on his death bed:]

Oh dear father! fear not
The dread moment at hand,
Thou shalt take up thy lot
In a far distant land.

Oh fear not the spoiler's
Cold silencing spell;
Unto those he is dreadful,
Who still fear a Hell.

For the true son of nature
In looking abroad,
Sees no dark coming torments,
No fierce, frowning God.

Father, fear not to sleep
In the bosom of earth,
For she's paid thee thy meed
Since the hour of thy birth.

So that now when she calls thee
To yield up thy clay,
Oh, do not ask ever
One moment's delay.

Yes, 'tis true that we love thee,
And sadly shall weep,
And bewail thy departure
When thou'st fallen asleep.

But, Oh father remember
That in thy past years,
Life has held some bright moments
To match with its tears.

Then remember thy children
Shall gather to thee
When their life-work is ended,
And they are set free.

No, 'tis not long to wait,
'Til we all shall come home,
E'er to dwell in that state,
Where no sorrow may come.

Do not go like the slave
Who is scourged to his cell,
For thou'st wrought thy life's labor
Ever faithful and well.

Oh, then, father regret not Thy number of days;
For a short life well lived
Is a full hymn of praise.

Widows can't look with joy
On thy cold, ashen face,
Nor can orphans cast curses
On thy last resting-place.

Aye, thy couch shall be gorgeous
With diamonds and gold,
And around thy pale relies
Soft curtains shall fold.

For is not earth's fair bosom
Fit pillow for kings?
And is her cradle-song
Not the whistle of time's wings?

And do not the bright stars
That look down from the sky,
Lightly trip in the dance
To the grand lullaby?

Yea, the forests of India,
And Golconda's mines,
And the bright spars of Iceland,
Arabia's vines,

E'en the mosses of Greenland,
The flowers of Rome
Are all but the trimmings
Of thy narrow home.

Oh, then, cast off all fear,
For our Father divine
Has a far nobler sphere
For his human-kind.

Yes, there must be a land
Where the flowers never fade
And where pain is unknown,
And Death can't invade.

When in that land remember
That thou leavest here
A sad, small group of mourners,
Who hold thy name dear.

And will thou not watch o'er us
In dim coming years,
And still whisper soft comfort
When we stand in tears?

By Liverpool papers it appears that the visit of the Holy Ghost to that city, in the persons of Moody and Sankey, cost the city $45,000. The same delectable pair cost the city of London not less than $75,000. It costs money to save souls.

"Is there a God?"

The following is a portion of an address delivered before the "Peoria Free Thought Association," on March 7th, 1875, upon this question.

Priests, preachers, presses, legislators and courts, have from all time exerted their influence and power toward the proving and protecting of a God. Property valued at upwards of three hundred and fifty millions of dollars is exempted from taxation in the United States, simply because it is dedicated to a God. Thousands of divines wearing gorgeous apparel and impressive looks of sanctity, are paid enormous salaries for proving the existence of a God and peddling salvation, in the face of the fact that salvation is free. From all time the sword and the gibbet, and fagot and stake, have been used to convince unbelievers of the existence of a God. The belief in the existence of a God has always been regarded as of infinite importance to man; so much so, that those who believe in the existence of a God—or rather three or four Gods—can always find a host of friends who are willing to solemnly asseverate that they are exemplary Christians—all sufficient evidence of integrity—while the Atheists forfeit the good will of society, to say nothing about being denied the privilege of testifying in courts, and being characterized as "heretics," and "Infidels." When we consider the mighty influence popular opinion has over the minds of men; when we consider that the persuasive eloquence of the sword and gibbet, and fagot and stake have been used to convince mankind of the existence of a God, should the fact that Deism is almost universal excite our wonder, even if it has no foundation in fact? Deists tell us that the fact that Deism is almost universal is evidence of its truth; for, say they, "what everybody says must be true." If this argument is good, and will apply to the past as well as to the present, it would prove the earth perfectly flat and motionless for thousands of years, and that it did not begin to move until the people began to believe, or in other words, did not commence to revolve till its revolutions became popular. As then for thousands of years the belief in a falsehood was universal (i. e., that the earth was flat), and the truth was universally disbelieved (i. e., that the earth was of a globular form), we conclude that universal belief proves nothing. In other words, that belief cannot change a fact.

Deists tell us that even barbarians believe in the existence of a God, and this fact, say they, proves that man has innate ideas of a Deity. True, the barbarians, almost without an exception, believe in the existence of a God, and they are more zealous in serving him than are the believers among the civilized. While the barbarian will make any sacrifice for his God, even to taking the life of his dearest child, our civilized Deists do not believe in serving him under difficulties; would not attend church if they would have to soil their boots in going there—more especially if the cushions had been fortuitously removed from the pews, or if the organ was out of whack, and satan's six who furnish the "chin music" had sore throats, and the preacher was somewhat indisposed. We see, then, that the higher we rise in the intellectual scale, the weaker becomes the belief in the existence of a God, and that upon the topmost round of the intellectual ladder we will find Voltaires, Paines, Jeffersons, Franklins and Ingersolls—doubtless if not disbelievers. If, then, the fact that barbarians universally believe in a God proves anything, it proves that the belief in the existence of a God is the outgrowth of ignorance.

As to innate ideas, I deny that such ideas can exist. An idea cannot enter the brain except through the media of the five senses, sight, scent, touch, taste or hearing, and if those senses and the brain are perfect, the surroundings will implant ideas in the brain with almost every throb of the pulse. Those ideas are un-governable, and a sense of weakness and dependence on the part of barbarians superinduced in their minds the idea of a superior power; and that superior power, without inquiring what it was, they worshiped as a God. If in man there are innate ideas of a God, and those ideas are given him of a God, certainly, those ideas would be perfect and uniform, and one nation would not have innate ideas of a semi-God, and another nation innate ideas of a snake God, &c. Preferring sense, now, to absurdity, we say that barbarians, like ourselves, are creatures of education, association and habit, and that the genial sunshine and the angry storm taught them of the pleasure and displeasure of a God. Deists tell us that the creation proves the existence of a God. "All things, say they, that exist must have been created, and as nothing can create itself, there must be a creator." Here is a desk, the desk could not create itself, consequently it has a creator, and that creator is man. Then here is man, man could not create himself; consequently he must have a creator, and that creator is God. Well then, here is a God, and as nothing can create itself, he must have a creator, and that creator another creator, and so on, ad infinitum. Of necessity, then, we must stop somewhere. We see that something must be co-eternal, and therefore needs no creator, and then the question reduces itself to this: Is that something matter, or is it an omnipotent, omniscient, omnipresent, personal God? Matter is a reality, a verity, something tangible, something known to exist, but a personal God is a mere supposition. Let us now imagine if it is not as likely that matter has existed from all time, and is governed by laws inherent in itself, as that it resulted from the act of a God, unknown and unknowable. Matter is indestructible, and this fact is evidence that it could not have been created. Matter is separated and transformed; but not one atom of it has ever yet been destroyed. Put a stick of wood into the fire and the fire will separate the elements which entered into the composition of the wood (i. e., earth, air, water, etc.), each returning to its original element. Each atom of matter has an affinity for or antipathy to every other atom of matter, and this affinity and antipathy constitute the laws which govern matter (i. e., attraction and repulsion), the former constituting the laws of gravitation. This affinity or antipathy is not a principle of inert matter alone, but as known to exist in the ert. A duck gravitates as naturally towards a puddle as an unsupported brick gravitates towards the ground; and a bone has as much affinity for a yellow dog, as a magnet has for a needle. Antipathy, or the law of repulsion, is seen by uniting fire and powder. This inherent principle which governs matter is a part of it, as much so as is solidity, density or color. It does not require a God to make a stick have two ends instead of one, or to make a circle round instead of square; and it is a debatable question whether he could make two hills without having a hollow between them, or make a two year old calf in a minute. Deists tell us that intelligence and design prove the existence of a God. If the intelligence known to exist in matter requires a source, a God possessed of infinite intelligence would have still greater need of a source from which to draw. But a "design" is plainly visible to Deists. They put on their spiritual "specs" and in confusion they see harmony and design. The fact that water seeks its level convinces them of the existence of a God; but if it were to run uphill instead of down, or to stand still or spurt hither and yon in the most lawless manner, the design to them would be just and apparent. The green fields speak God's name; but if the fields were white, or black, or red, or yellow, they speak quite as eloquently. In the variegated flowers they see the hand of a God; but if the flowers were of a uniform color, could they not see the same? But let us inquire if this design is consistent with the designer. He made the heavens and the earth in six days, and rested on the seventh (tired), and commanded mankind to rest likewise. As there was no earth, sun or moon, etc., during this time by which to reckon, we will suppose he manufactured a few days just for the occasion. To proceed, he placed man, whom he created, in a garden, and also took particular pains to place therein a temptation and a tempter. Having placed the to-be-tempted, the temptation and tempter in proper order, he retreated behind a gooseberry bush to watch the result. The result is known to be "the fall of man," the manufacturer of aprons, the termination of Adam's lease, and his vacation of the premises.

If God designed man to be perfect, why did he not create him perfect, and if he did create him perfect, why did he not make that perfection perpetual? He made a heaven and planted therein a few holy angels. Why did he not make earth a heaven, and man an angel? If he was too exhausted from his exertions in creating suns, moons and stars, why did he not take his time at the job, there was no hurry, or else take a good long rest before commencing the creation of man? By so doing he would have been spared the mortification of seeing his "noblest work" become depraved and disobedient. He could then have all mankind, instead of allowing "old Nibsey" to get nine out of every ten. If he wished man to love him, why does he not so act as to merit man's love? Is visiting man with sickness, sorrow, pain and death, calculated to excite love? If he would have man believe, why does he not manifest himself? Nine of Jesus' apostles would not believe that Jesus was risen from the dead, even when told so by two of their fellow apostles, simply because they did not see him themselves (Mark xvi. 13th verse). Another apostle would not believe the statement of the other apostles, simply because they did not see Jesus; and that apostle required and received proof (John xxv. 25-27). God is no respecter of persons, then why are not we entitled to receive proof? But now, after eighteen hundred years have rolled past, whenever we call for proof, we are told to "believe or be damned."

A GREAT DISCOVERY ABOUT LIGHT.—Prof. Wm. Crookes has made one of the greatest discoveries in relation to the action of light which has come before the world since spectrum analysis was first made known. He has demonstrated that direct mechanical effect can be produced by light when luminous rays are allowed to fall upon one end of a most delicately balanced lever arm suspended in vacuo; the contrary has hitherto been assumed. This great discovery, fraught with unknown uses to society, may be fairly claimed as having been given to the world through Spiritualism. In endeavoring to obtain instrumental evidence of the assumed psychic force, and to test mediumistic power by causing it to move a few grains in a glass vacuum tube, he discovered a motion produced by an unknown cause, but finally traced to radiant heat, and, in working farther at the new discovery, Mr. Crookes has been able to make fresh revelations to the world relating to light.—Spiritual Scientist.

Honest Questions and Honest Answers.

We herewith proceed to reply further to the interrogatories of our correspondent. His fourth question is,

Do you think it more reasonable and truthful to suppose that the inferior races of men are evidence of the result of degeneracy, rather than of natural development from a still inferior race?

We do not. The law of progression and development we regard as the order of the Universe rather than retrogression and degeneracy. It is far from complimentary to an infinite, all-wise Creator to believe his works deteriorate and go backward to ignominy and decay. It is the same with the Universe; its law is progress, onward, forward, not retrogression, backwardness and deterioration. True, conditions have very much to do with the development of the human race. It is well known a particular family, tribe or nation may go backward instead of forward; they may sink in the scale of humanity instead of rising in it, but this is always dependent upon governing causes, the effects of which cannot be ignored. It is not improbable, even, that nations and races like individuals, may have their eras, their life-time, beginning in infancy, progressing through youth to maturity and old age, but it is evidently a law of the Universe that in the aggregate, the human race gradually progresses in intelligence, morality and in the enjoyment of happiness. Ignorance is the great obstacle to the more rapid advance, and where this is fully removed, and we learn to live naturally, rationally and sensibly in all things, according to the immutable laws which govern our existence, we may expect mankind will occupy a much more elevated position than now, be more healthful in body and mind, less troubled with diseases and afflictions, live to a greater age, be more physically strong, more intellectual, more virtuous and more happy.

5. How can an inferior animal produce its superior on strictly natural principles?

It can be done in no other way than upon natural principles; but that it is done it is hardly necessary to affirm. We have only to look at the improvements that have been made in the rearing of horses, cattle, sheep and swine to be fully convinced of this. The difference between the zebra and the wild horses of Tartary and South America, and the blooded horses which are the pride of Europe and the United States is very great. The same is true of cattle, sheep and hogs. Our Devonshire, Durham and Alderney cattle, reared under favorable conditions are largely in advance of the wild cattle of the forests and plains. Our Merino and other choice breeds of sheep are a great improvement upon the coarse wild sheep of olden times, the same as our Berkshire, China and Poland hogs are a great advance from the wild hogs from which they descended. The same law of development and improvement that rules in the animal kingdom prevails in the vegetable kingdom. It is well known the numerous and magnificent varieties of apples we now have were produced from the sour crab apple, as all our luscious pears, peaches, and plums were produced by the appliances of culture, art and development, from the bitter, puckery wild pear, the small, sour, wild peach, and the inferior wild plum. In a similar manner the hundreds of beautiful varieties of roses which florists now present us are the product of the wild rose, as the multitudinous varieties of beautiful asters, balsams, cockscombs, dahlias, gladioluses, pansies, petunias, pinks, tulips, verbenas, and other lovely flowers, are the products of the simple wild flowers from which they are the direct descendants.

All these improvements and developments are the result of natural laws, which men have learned and applied.

6. If the laws of Nature are fixed, who can turn them aside?

No one can change that which is unchangeable, nor turn aside that which is immovable. The laws of Nature can not be rendered inoperative nor nugatory, but they are unlimited in number, and are applicable to all conceivable conditions and circumstances. It is the proper study of mankind to become acquainted with them to the fullest extent, and to learn to apply them to all the affairs and necessities of life, and not to try to subvert them, oppose them, or live in opposition to them.

7. If plants grew into animals, and animals into human beings, in the long ago, why is it not so now?

We cannot say it is not so. These operations take place very slowly, and almost imperceptibly, and it is not at all unlikely some of them are taking place at the present time. The same causes under the same conditions will always produce the same results. This may be regarded as an axiom as unfailing as "twice two are four."

It is, perhaps, not easy to comprehend how one form of existence evolves into another, and how animal life may proceed from vegetable life, but it is still more difficult to understand how otherwise so many forms of existence came to be. We have come to understand the Universe contains all the forces and powers necessary to produce every result that has ever been accomplished. In the primitive condition of our planet, it was doubtless wholly unfitted to either vegetable or animal life. As it gradually condensed from a nebular condition, it required immense eras for the soil to be converted by means of oxygen and other influences from the primitive rocks, suitable for the production of vegetation, including grasses, herbs and trees. It is reasonable to suppose the first germs of vegetable life were simple and crude, and that the evolution of the thousands of succeeding varieties were a slow and natural outgrowth of the original; and without doubt these evolutions in the vegetable kingdom still continue as new varieties of plants are constantly being discovered. We have shown how man has produced new varieties of animals, fruits and flowers by making use of natural laws, and it is quite as probable nature, by the same laws, produces similar results.

When after the lapse of countless ages, the earth became adapted to the existence of animal life, all the various varieties did not come into existence at once. The simple animalcule and radiata were doubtless the first which nature produced, and these after an epoch—the length of which we are unable to judge—came the mollusca—shell-fish, then articulata—jointed insects and animals, next vertebrata, animals with internal skeleton, and divided into reptiles, fishes, birds, and mammals.

While the external forms of all these animals are so different, it is no less true that the whole, after all, are mere variations of a fundamental germ which can be traced as a basis through the whole, the variations being merely modifications to suit the particular variety, was fitted to live. Starting from the primitive germ, which we have seen, is the representative of a particular order of full-grown animals, we find all others to be merely advances from that type, with the extension of endowments and modifications of forms required in each particular case; each form, also, retaining a strong affinity to that which precedes it, and tending to impress its own features on that which succeeds.

This unity of structure, as it is called, becomes the more remarkable when it is remembered that the organs, which possessing a resemblance, are often put to different uses; for example, the ribs, become in the serpent, organs of locomotion, and the snout is extended in the elephant into a prehensile instrument. It is equally remarkable that analogous purposes are served in different animals by organs essentially different. Thus, the mammalia breathe by lungs; the fishes by gills. These are not modifications of one organ, but distinct organs. In mamifers, the gills exist and act at an early stage of the foetal state, but afterward go back and appear no more; while the lungs are developed. In fishes, again, the gills only are fully developed, while the lung structure either makes no advance at all, or only appears in the rudimentary form of an air-bladder. In many instances a particular structure is found advanced to a certain point in a particular set of animals, (for instance, feet in the serpent tribe), although not there required in any degree; but the peculiarity being carried a little farther forward, is perhaps useful in the next set of animals in the scale. These are called rudimentary organs and are most conspicuous in animals which form links between the various classes.

We cannot take the space here to enumerate the many instances of similarity of organs in the different varieties of animals; but in illustration will merely state, that as various as may be the lengths of the upper part of the vertebrated column (back bone) in the mammalia, it always consists of the same parts and the same number of bones. Thus, the giraffe has in its tall neck the same number of bones as the pig, which scarcely seems to have a neck at all. Man unlike most of the mammalia has no tail, but the necessary bones for a caudal appendage exist in an undeveloped state in the os coccygis of the human species. The limbs of the vertebrate animals are in like manner on one plan, however various they may appear. In the hind leg of a horse, for example, the angle called the hock is the same part which in man forms the heel; and the horse and nearly all other quadrupeds walk upon what corresponds to the toes of the human race. As these parts are, in many quadrupeds shrunken or compressed into a hoof, so the tail which would otherwise attach to the human subject is shrunken up into a bony mass at the lower extremity of the back. The bat, on the other hand, has these parts largely developed. The membrane, commonly called the wing, is framed chiefly upon bones answering precisely to those of the human hand. In the paddles of the whale, and other animals of its order, are found the same bones as in the more highly developed extremities of the land animals, and even the serpent tribes which present no external appearance of such extremities, possess them in reality, though in an undeveloped or rudimental state.

It is difficult to comprehend how so many forms of life as now exist upon this planet should have evolved from one simple germ or a few simple germs, it is certainly more difficult to comprehend that so many separate creations should have been necessary. According to Humboldt and Spencer, there are scattered over our globe at the present time some 320,000 species of vegetable life, and 2,000,000 species of animal life, and if to these are added the numbers of animal and vegetable species which have existed, but have now become extinct the total number would not fall short of ten millions of species. Which is the most probable that these ten millions of species of organized life are evolutions and modifications of an original germ or germs, or that they were all separate and distinct creations? We decidedly yield our assent to the former proposition.

If it is not easy to understand that all the forms of animal life should have arisen from a single germ, or if it is not clear how the animal kingdom could have evolved from the vegetable, it certainly is not difficult to understand that in the Universe exist, perpetually, the powers and forces necessary to produce all that now is or ever has existed. As no effect was ever produced without a natural cause sufficient to produce it, so these natural causes, operating under all conceivable conditions, necessarily produce an endless variety of results. In the great Universe is inherent all the powers and potency requisite to call into existence all that is or ever was.

If it cannot be fully comprehended how vegetables can evolve into animals, it can at least be understood that the two kingdoms approach each other so closely as scarcely to be separated. There is animal life so closely bordering upon the vegetable that at first it would appear to be the latter. The hydrozoa and the sponge family are samples of this class. On the other hand, there are vegetables possessing the characteristics of animals to a wonderful extent; and as illustrations we have but to mention the plants recently discovered both by Professor Darwin in England, and Mary Treat in this country, which not only catch animals, but digest them and appropriate them to their sustenance and growth. It is little more wonderful that one kingdom should evolve into the other, than that each should approach the other so closely and partake of the special province of the other to such a remarkable extent.

In connection with this subject, we will call attention to the fact that nature seems to evolve or adapt different forms of life to the varying circumstances in which it is placed. Thus certain kinds of plants growing in, and located where rain seldom falls, and requiring a store of moisture for their nourishment, are found to be provided with a cup-like vessel surrounding the stalk to retain water after a shower. This cup or pitcher, as it is sometimes called, is not a new organ, but simply an evolution or modification of a leaf of the plant. So fish, having eyes and good sight, if kept and propagated in the dark, although they retain their eyes, they become entirely useless, and the fish are "stone blind." If, however, they are brought into the light, by its magic influence their sight is gradually restored until they see again as well as ever. Indeed, we are hardly able to estimate the subtle and mysterious influence this wonderful element—light—exercises in the production of organs of vision. It seems to have the power to call forth organs of sight when needed, while animals who live perpetually in the dark have no eyes and no sight.

8. Do you believe in the infinite progression and development of good and evil?

According to our comprehension of this question, we answer, Yes. As we believe in the infinite progression and development of all material substances, we necessarily must believe in the progression of good and evil. Here it becomes necessary for us to define what we understand by "good and evil." They are simply relative terms. Every thing that exists is susceptible of becoming good or evil, according to the use that is made of it. There is nothing so good but if improperly used may it become an evil, and there is in existence nothing so bad but what is positive good if properly and legitimately used. Thus, fire, which in warming us in cold weather, and in cooking our food, is so great a good, when it is out of its proper place and burns our dwellings and destroys towns and cities, it is an evil of immense magnitude. So, water, which in floods, torrents, and devastating streams is a great evil, in the imperceptible dew, in the gentle rain, in sparkling springs, in murmuring rills, flowing rivers, and the great ocean, over which proudly float ships and steamers—in the multitudinous ways in which it refreshes thirst and sustains life, it is an indispensable good. So it is with food, alcohol, clothing, exercise, pleasure, the impulses, the passions, and every substance and every quality in existence—properly and wisely used they are all good, but when improperly used they become evil.

We believe in no personal good nor personal evil constantly warring with each other—no personal God, no personal Devil. These myths are the outgrowth of ignorance, and are, deservedly passing away as the light of truth shines upon the world, together with the belief in witches, gnomes, fairies, genii, hobgoblins and demons.

9. Will the present ungodly state of society eventually result in the reformation and happiness of the human race independent of Divine agency?

The word divine in this question is somewhat indefinite. If it means the efforts of a personal deity we answer yes; if it means all that exists, no. Our belief is that all that exists is, in its nature good, and that everything belongs to the divine system of the Universe. We believe the moral and social condition of the world will be greatly improved, until the human race is vastly healthier, better, and happier than now. The world has greatly improved within the period covered by history, but the advance made is slight compared with what we hopefully trust the future has in store for us. The race has inherently within its nature the elements of unlimited progress, and as it succeeds in dispelling the ignorance and superstition which pernicious creeds and dogmas for thousands of years have fastened upon it, it will rise permanently in worth, usefulness and happiness.

This advance may be slow; the effects of ignorance and defective education in the world are more serious and the tendency to selfishness and the indulgence of passion is strong in man; but still we have great hopes of him; he may still be considered in his infancy. Forever is a long time, and when he gets all the knowledge he is capable of acquiring, we trust he will be vastly better and happier than now.

What our friend calls the "ungodly state of society" is the result of disorder and the want of due appreciation of Nature's laws and requirements. It has no connection with any invisible personality, good or bad.

As the laws of health and the science of life become better understood and applied, disease will be greatly banished from the earth. As intelligence and science become thoroughly disseminated, ignorance, vice and crime will correspondingly lessen. As the human race learn that the highest morality consists in doing good to their fellow beings, and that this course produces the most perfect happiness, so will good deeds and kind actions abound, and what is called sin and wickedness will become comparatively unfashionable and unknown.

10. Does it not require more faith to be a skeptic than to be a Christian?

Decidedly not. A skeptic is one who has no faith at all, but doubts everything. A Christian is one who believes whatever his priest or creed demands of him, regardless of logic, sense or reason. A skeptic takes nothing upon trust—nothing because somebody, who knows no more than he does, commands him to do so. A skeptic and a Rationalist are not necessarily the same. A skeptic is simply a doubter, while a Rationalist is one who embraces the truths of the Universe, the teachings of science and reason so far as he understands them. He is only skeptical upon such subjects of which he is ignorant and does not accept as truth that which lacks the confirmation of experience and demonstration.

11. Is it easier to believe in nature than in God?

We answer, yes, if reason is followed and myths and superstitions are discarded; though were we to judge by the numbers of the human race who believe in some kind of a God, we should think to the contrary. In the last five thousand years not less than fifty thousand gods have been manufactured by men, and these have been believed in by countless millions of our race. Where ignorance has most prevailed, there has the belief in a god or gods most abounded. Many volumes would be necessary to recount the great diversity of characteristics and monstrosities these ignorant human beings have ascribed to their gods. The more ignorant and degraded they were, the more crude and depraved their gods. The more warlike and blood-thirsty the nations who have made these gods, the more fond their gods are for bloodshed and carnage, and they have even been called "the god of battles." Bloodshed, slaughter and destruction of life seemed their highest pleasure. The Jews and their God, Jehovah are cases in point. The more peaceful and inoffensive the nation, the more quiet and undemonstrative their god, and their highest conception of happiness is rest. The Hindoos and their God, Brahm, illustrate this phase; they rarely engaged in war, and their god never urged them to battle and slaughter. The European nations, as well as our own, in suit, unfortunately adopted a warlike fighting god, with a religion to match, and the consequence has been these nations have indulged in the most devastating and bloody wars the world has ever known. More blood has been shed and more lives have been taken in the name of the God Jehovah, than all the thousands of other gods the world has known.

As easy as it has been for the ignorant masses to believe in the numerous gods which wily and interested priests have foisted upon them, millions of them never stopping to doubt, to investigate or even to make an enquiry, have blindly and zealously taken the gods thus given them, and have been ready to kill or be killed in their defense. As easy, we say, as it has been for ignorant nations to believe in these gods, to rational, sensible, well informed people, it would to us, seem vastly easier to believe in nature than in any God. Gods are imaginary, mythical personages which ignorant men have invented and devised, possessing as we have seen, different and antagonistic qualities and dispositions, some made of wood, some of stone, some of metal, and some totally invisible, and of which no man, absolutely, knows anything; while nature is the great Universe containing all the suns, all the worlds, all matter, all life, all existences with all the forces and powers that are. While no reasonable person wishes a god of wood, stone or brass, while the invisible he cannot see nor comprehend, the boundless Universe is always before us, a reality, a power, a totality that for a moment cannot be doubted. To us it seems vastly easier to believe in nature than in any god.

12. Do you know everything that you believe?

We see no special point or pertinancy to this question. All men know certain things of which they have positive proof, and these they also believe. They also believe certain other things, which to them seem probable and reasonable, but which they cannot be said to absolutely know. We are no exception to the rule. Probably all men are liable to think they know what they really only believe. In this tendency we also doubtless participate. The best any of us can do is to exercise the best reason and judgment we possess, to examine and investigate whatever is presented us for our acceptance, and to believe nothing that is not founded in reason, truth, and upon the immutable laws of the Universe. The great error mankind has made, is to believe too much without proof, to accept the most absurd claims and the most unreasonable propositions upon the simple assertion of those who really knew no more of the matters involved than themselves. This habit, we trust is passing away.

13. Please give us the name and articles of your faith.

The name of our belief is known as Rationalism or Liberalism. We have never tabulated the articles of our faith, but have not the slightest objection to stating what they are. We claim to believe what appears to us as truth, and hold ourselves in readiness to accept whatever new truth is presented to our consciousness and comprehension. We must be our own judge as to what truth is, and feel ourselves under no obligation to blindly accept what somebody else may claim to be truth, no matter in what book it may be printed or what class of priests may demand it.

In addition to the points of faith already indicated, we name the following:

1. We believe the true God is the God of the Universe, and exists alike in all that is. Nothing is above him, nothing is below him, nothing is outside of him, all are parts of the great divine system which embraces all substances and all qualities. This God is just and impartial; he reveals himself to all alike, and speaks to all alike. He does not whisper privately his will to some obscure individual and commission him to proclaim the same to the world, and demand that it accept it without doubt or question.

2. We believe the highest duty of man and the purest morality consists in our good offices and kind acts to our fellow beings. God neither demands our oblations nor worship, nor does he need them. He is so far above us our actions can neither be any aid or injury to him. Humanity is the highest expression of deity of which we have any knowledge; to it are due all our service, all our devotion, all our worship. In following this course, the world will be made more intelligent, more moral and more happy than by all the creeds, all the religions and all the gods that have had an imagined existence.

3. We believe in good deeds actuated by benevolent motives produce happiness, and that our lives should be spent in cultivating the good and shunning that which is bad and hurtful. That every individual must be his own Savior, and can derive no real benefit from an unseen, imaginary personage.

4. It is the duty of all to endeavor to learn and understand the laws of our being, and to be controlled by the immutable laws of the Universe looking in that direction, in all cases, for guidance and information.

Without detaining our readers with a more detailed statement of what we believe, we will name some things we do not believe.

1. We do not believe the Bible account of the creation of the Universe is true.

2. We do not believe God ever delighted in, or incited wars, carnage and bloodshed.

3. We do not believe God ever created a Devil and made a hell in which to punish and torture his creatures to the latest hours of eternity.

Sketch of the Life of Rousseau.

No life was ever so romantic as Rousseau's. As related by himself it forms a volume of such subtle and exquisite charm, that the most accomplished literati read and re-read it with ever-increasing admiration. One of the most distinguished of his countrymen let no year pass without again enjoying the wonderful "Confessions."

Living, until past middle age, the life of a wanderer, with no ambition and no dreams of future greatness, his genius ripened by itself, and finally burst upon the world in all its splendor.

It is difficult to exaggerate the influence of Rousseau. In how many dwellings in France were the Emilia and the Contrat Social laid open upon the family altar, before which the lamp was constantly kept burning.

Born in Geneva in 1712, he was scarcely seven years old, when romances became his mental food; he and his father (his mother died at his birth,) often passing whole nights reading aloud to each other. Judge of the effect of so early and thorough an awakening of the imagination of one of the most sensitive temperaments that ever lived. After the library of novels was exhausted the two fell back on that class of fiction called history and biography; which differs from the first by being founded on fact.

We can easily understand that an apprenticeship to a brutal master was found to be unbearable, nor will it surprise us to learn that he embraced the first opportunity to run away.

Passing over the Alps into Italy, his imagination drank in at every turn the wild, the picturesque, and the beautiful, and he fondly imagined that he was entering a world where beauty and pleasure would vie with each other in making his life a dream. Forced by his poverty to accept menial situations, it was on one of these occasions that he purloined an old ribbon, which from the ado that has been made about it in Europe for a century, one might suppose it the first tifle ever stolen. Returning from Italy he found a friend and protectress in Madam de Warens, who, a recent convert to Catholicism, enjoyed a small pension from the king of Sardinia. This lady, then in the freshness of youth, and overflowing with generosity, undertook to have him educated for a priest, but upon trial it was decided that he did not possess the requisite capacity. He next essayed music, with little better success. Such was the singularity of his organization at that time, that he forgot everything as fast as he learned it. But if he could not learn from books, he could do what is still better, learn from life.

His organization, sensitive as a feather in the breeze, was swayed by every harmony and every beauty; and whether in the society of his fair patroness, who opened to him all the delights of a social life where sensibility vied with goodness; or whether in his wanderings in that delightful climate he went to sleep in the open air to the singing of the nightingale, and awoke to see the sun waking the landscape to new life and beauty, every-where he drank in the material which was to reappear in those pictures of life's possibilities, before which all Europe stood dumb with admiration.

He finally progressed in his knowledge of music far enough to enable him to invent a musical notation, which in 1749, he ventured to offer to the French Academy for their approval. While no member of this august body understood music as an expert, yet they did not hesitate to condemn the new system.* Although this attempt resulted in failure, it brought him in contact with the most brilliant men in France, Voltaire, D'Alembert, Diderot, and it was at the suggestion of the last, that, in the same year, at the age of 37, he wrote an Essay on the question, "Has the restoration of the sciences contributed to purify and correct morals?" This Essay secured the prize offered by the Academy of Dijon, and, on account both of the novelty of his views and the ability with which they were presented, placed the writer in the gaze of Europe and made him the correspondent of kings.

This was the commencement of his literary career, and was followed by The Discourses, New Heloise, The Contrat Social and Emilia, works composed with entire unanimity of purpose, and whose key-note is the boundless possibilities that exist for a life filled with beauty and happiness.

The conception of all this work dawned upon him in a moment, and he sank down on a stone by the roadside, his eyes suffused with tears, and the heavens of his imagination unrolling before him like a scroll. Nor were his the only tears shed; no works ever printed, whether we consider their immediate or their ultimate effects, are at all comparable to Rousseau's. Such was the rush for them, that a franc was paid for the use of a volume, and an hour only was allowed for its perusal; and when the General Assembly met in 1789, it was found to be saturated with the spirit of Rousseau. Mirabeau was its living embodiment, and it at times almost seemed that his rare union of genius and common sense could perform the impossible, could turn human affairs into an entirely new channel, and realize at once the reign of Liberty and Justice. That dream has passed, but Rousseau's ideals remain, nor does it matter whether he placed them in the future or in the past, the passionate wish to realize them in the present was still the same. In the New Heloise we have an idealization of domestic life, and half Europe was in love with Julia; in Emilia we have a picture of the training of children of such surpassing interest that the mothers of fashionable France took their practically orphaned children literally to their bosoms again, thus giving them the sustenance that nature requires.

Rousseau was deeply indebted to Locke and Montesquieu, but what in them were cold and halting utterances, read by few and understood by fewer, fused in the fire of his genius came forth images of such life and beauty that the world paused to worship. The opening sentence of the Contrat Social, "Man-kind were born free, yet to-day every-where they are slaves," thrilled through two continents and commenced two Revolutions.

In Politics, while in Europe the realization of Liberty seems subject to many vicissitudes and many reactions, do we, in this happier land, know how much we are indebted to Rousseau through Jefferson, the father of the liberal side of our Constitution, who, living in France from '85 to '90 drank so deeply of his spirit, that he frequently seems to express himself in Rousseau's own words. In Sociology we trace his influence through Fourier, St Simon, Comte, Stuart Mill and Herbert Spencer, down to the glorious Religion of Humanity, which the Infidels of to-day are seeking to establish.

Rousseau was not, of course, free from those errors of opinion which floated in the mental atmosphere in which he lived; not a few of which the ripe knowledge and more thorough criticism of an added century have shown to be baseless; but the impulse which he lent the hopes and imparted to the consciences of mankind still live and flow in a thousand channels, which it is almost as difficult to overrate as to define. Even the project of direct trade between producers, which the Granges are seeking to establish, may be found sketched at length in the pages of the New Heloise.

In one of his ramblings Rousseau called at a peasant's cottage for refreshment, and was offered a bit of sour barley bread. Eyeing him narrowly, the peasant became assured that he was not a spy of the tax-gatherer, and brought forth some palatable bread and wine, which he kept concealed in a hole under the floor. Rousseau never forgot this. "What!" exclaimed he, "is not a man allowed to eat the poor moiety of that which he wrings from the earth with so much toil and sweat, without constantly trembling lest he be spoiled by law; lest his simple bread and poor, sour wine be taken from him to satisfy a rapacity which is boundless?"

While in the "Confessions" he lays bare his faults as never human being did before nor since, the judicious remember in his favor how much of life is a masquerade, that we go into society with our company faces, that biographers trick out their heroes in so many plumes that they no more resemble the naked reality than does a peacock strutting resemble a peacock plucked. Rousseau's nature was deeply earnest, no trace of the humorous was found in his composition, and no one tried harder and few more successfully to live up to their ideals. He had the rare manliness to decline all gifts from his rich friends, even refusing to be presented to the king, when such presentation would, without doubt, have resulted in the offer of a pension; and, honest man as he was, earned his own frugal living. Fashionable society was revolting to him; he could bear neither its restraints nor its frivolity, and it is no doubt owing to this deep earnestness of his nature that it was said, that, while "Voltaire made only skeptics, Rousseau made fanatics."

It should be remembered that while Diderot represented Atheism, and Voltaire Deism, or natural religion, Rousseau differed from both in feeling that religion was one of life's necessities. They were all equally under the ban of the Church, however, and alike suffered from its persecutions.

Some monks got hold of him as he was running away from his master, converted him to Catholicism, and gave him four dollars: it is likely he prized the money more than he did the religion. After a long absence he returned to his native city and was seized with a strong desire to resume his citizenship, the indispensable condition of which was, that he should join the Protestant Church. He swallowed the bitter pill, but the truce was of short duration: the Contrat Social appearing, it was ordered to be burned by the public hangman at Paris, and its author thrown into prison: thus he got a blow from the Catholic side, and the Marquis of Luxembourg sent her carriage for him at two in the morning, to hurry him to Geneva as a place of safety. But the Protestants of Geneva were not a whit behind the Catholics of Paris. They too ordered his books to the flames and himself to prison. He took refuge from his persecutors on a small island in a remote part of the lake, and when they hunted him from thence, he wrote them this remarkable letter, "I am weary of being hunted, I have now nowhere to go; have mercy on me and place me in one of your dungeons, I ask only to see the sun, and to be allowed to walk for an hour each day on the green grass; you have made both my life and my liberty a burden to me and I care not how soon you deprive me of either."

We cannot trace the sorrows of Rousseau's later life, imbibed as it was by persecution and ill health, both of which causes were quite sufficient to shatter nerves less delicate than his. What wonder then that he sometimes mistook his friends for his enemies, and deemed himself the victim of conspiracies which had no other foundation than his own morbid fancies? Let him repose with our deepest gratitude as one of the great benefactors of our race. He died July 2d, 1778.

The following specimen of Rousseau's style will, we trust, prove of interest to our readers:

"Christopher de Beaumont, 'by the grace of God Archbishop of Paris, Duke of Saint Cloud, Peer of France, Commander of the order of the Holy Ghost,' had issued (Aug 20th, 1762) one of those hateful documents in which bishops, Catholic and Protestant, have been wont for the last century and a half to hide with swollen bombastic phrase their dead and decomposing ideas. The windy folly of these poor pieces is usually in proportion to the hierarchic rank of those who promulgate them, and an Archbishop owes it to himself to blaspheme against reason and freedom in superlatives of malignant unction."

Rousseau's reply to this most vindictive attack of the bishop's is a masterpiece, and vindicates well the dignity of human nature. At the very first words, the mitre, the crosier, and the ring fall into the dust: "Why, my lord, have I anything to say to you? What is there between you and me? You accuse me of temerity," he cried; "how have I earned such a name, when I only propounded difficulties, and even that with so much reserve; when I only advanced reasons, and even that with so much respect; when I attacked no one, nor even named one? And you, my lord, how do you dare to reproach with temerity a man of whom you speak with such scanty justice and so little decency, with so small respect and with so much levity? You call me impious, and of what impiety can you accuse me—me who never spoke of the Supreme Being except to pay him the honor and glory that are his due, nor of any man except to persuade all men to love one another? The impious are those who unworthily profane the cause of God by making it serve the passions of men. The impious are those who, daring to pass for interpreters of divinity, and judges between it and man, exact for themselves the honors due to it only. The impious are those who arrogate to themselves the right of exercising the power of God on earth, and insist on opening and shutting the gates of heaven at their own good will and pleasure. The impious are those who have libels read in the church. At this horrible idea my blood is enkindled, and tears of indignation fill my eyes. Priests of the God of peace, you shall render an account one day, be very sure, of the use to which you have put his house. . . . My lord you have publicly insulted me: I have now convicted you of heaping calumny upon me. If you were a private person like myself, so that I could cite you before an equitable tribunal, and we could both appear before it, I with my book, and you with your mandate, assuredly you would be declared guilty and condemned to make reparation as public as the wrong was. But you belong to a rank that relieves you from the necessity of being just, and I am nothing. Yet you who profess the gospel, you a prelate appointed to teach others their duty, you know your own in such a case. Mine I have done: I have nothing more to say to you, and I hold my peace."

The Savoyard Vicar in Emilia, had dwelt on the difficulty of accepting revelation as the voice of God, on account of the long distance of time between us, and the questionableness of the religious testimony. To which the Archbishop thus replied: "But is there not then an infinity of facts, even earlier than those of the Christian revelation, which it would be absurd to doubt? By what other than that of human testimony has our author himself known of Sparta, and Athens, and Rome, whose laws, manners and heroes he extols with such assurance? How many generations of men between him and the historians who have preserved the memory of these events?" "First," says Rousseau in answer, "it is in the order of things that human circumstances should be attested by human evidence, and they can be attested in no other way. I can only know that Rome and Sparta existed, because contemporaries assure me that they existed. In such a case this intermediate communication is indispensable. But why is it necessary between God and me? Is it simple or natural that God should have gone in search of Moses to speak to Jean Jacques Rousseau? Second, nobody is obliged to believe that Sparta once existed, and nobody will be cast into Hell for doubting it. Every fact of which we are not witnesses is only established by moral proofs, and moral proofs have various degrees of strength. Will the divine justice hurl me into Hell for missing the exact point at which proof becomes irresistible? If there is in the world an attested story, it is that of witchcraft; nothing is wanting for judicial proof—reports and certificates from notables, surgeons, clergy, magistrates. But who believes in witchcraft, and shall we be damned for not believing? Third, my constant experience, and that of all men is stronger in reference to prodigies, than the testimony of some men."

A NEW religious vagary in California is a sect of "Child Christians," who interpret literally the passage: "Except ye be converted and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven." They endeavor to feel and act like children, playing childish games and adopting an infantile manner of speech,

* It is said that the "Sol Fa" system so rapidly growing into favor in England is deeply indebted to Rousseau.

NO. IX.

"Science has hardly an existence where the Bible has not been, nor is there one fact in science that contradicts anything taught in the Scriptures."—J. S.

I think thou must surely be one of those over-zealous persons "who never read anything but the Bible," else thou would not make such a wholesale assertion right in the face of overwhelming evidence to the contrary.

It would be safer to say science only flourishes where intelligence and culture are known, for we all know that the old Jew-book has been one of the greatest enemies to science, and in spite of the efforts of all its believers and upholders, it is impossible to make its absurd statements tally with the scientific facts. Does science prove that "Christ saw Satan fall like lightning from heaven," or that he gave "people power to tread on serpents and not be hurt" (Luke x: 18, 19), or that "the sun and moon stood still," and then "went on" at the "light of thine arrows" (Hab. iii: 2), or that because of the prayers of Elias, it "rained not on the earth for the space of three years and six months," or that Lot's wife was turned into salt, or Elijah "went up like a whirlwind into heaven," or that Jonah was three days in the whale, or that three men could stand in a fiery furnace, and come forth without even a hair singed, or that any one could by any possibility see all the kingdoms of a round world by going to the top of a high mountain (Math iv: 8), or that flesh, skin and sinews could come again upon old dry bones, and a living, breathing army be made of them (Ezek. xxxvii: 1, 10), or that witches and devils ever existed, or that pure water could be made into wine, or that through faith any one could walk on water, or the story of the loaves and fishes, the tale of the quails, the myths of the ark, the plagues of Egypt, Balaam's ass, Samson's feats, or that "sycamore" trees could be plucked up by the roots and cast into the sea," by one who has faith even as a grain of mustard seed, or that any prayer ever was specially answered, or that an invisible God can have an image (Coloss. i: 15), or that rain comes from heaven, "when heaven is shut there is no rain" (Kings viii: 35), or that there is or can be any such heaven as is described in Rev., with its beasts full of eyes before and behind, as well as within? and indeed I could fill reams of paper with just such unscientific narrations as these, taken literally from this prolific volume. But I think I have given you proof enough to show that it was never inspired by a scientist. True those tales were natural enough at that day and time, for the people then thought it all the greater merit in them to be able to swallow incredible statements. "Fairy tales," "Arabian Nights," "Jack the Giant-Killer," and all those great works of imaginative idealists originated in this passion for the wonderful and the incredible. I was reading a story from the "Arabian Nights," of the "Enchanted Horse," to a group of listeners one evening, when all at once a young man spoke up, saying seriously, "I hardly believe all that!" He was one of the few "innocents" who still think that if a thing is in print it must be true. Christianity now claims to welcome science as a co-worker in its cause. Precisely so did she claim the new school of Astronomers when she found that science had fairly proved the world to be round, and she felt that it was yield or die!

So likewise did she adopt the geological researches that proved the world to be sons of ages old, and man to have inhabited it tens, if not hundreds of thousands of years, instead of the paltry "six thousand" that she once so zealously maintained; and now that science has so effectually demonstrated that the "best of books" (?) was never divinely inspired by the God of Moses or any other god or goddess, and finally that there is not, nor can there be, any such infinite beings, she will have to yield again or be totally annihilated. She may remodel, fix up, re-translate and rebuild upon continually changing foundations, and call it the "same old jack-knife yet," but it will not be the Christianity of to-day, nor that of one hundred and fifty, nor five hundred years ago, though called by the same name, as the liberal Christians of to-day call the unknown forces in nature "God" yet do not mean by that name, the old Bible Deity who was made in the image of man; though to those who do believe in this God it conveys that idea, and thence they cry "they all believe in God," yet we know they do not believe in any personal identity who specially creates, makes or unmakes worlds, systems or a Universe! or who interferes in any way, or knows or cares, or can know or care what is taking place here or anywhere.

The Liberals and Scientists, many of them, use the term God to express a far different meaning from the one that they really hold themselves, even as Christ himself is said to have spoken in parables "that seeing they might see and not perceive, and hearing they might hear and not understand." It has always been the fashion to do all that was possible to deceive the vulgar, to blind the ignorant, so that they may be kept in leading strings. Should our Liberals and Scientists come out frankly and say what they actually know—"There is no God and no use for any," it would shock the ignorant and the zealous, but would it not be far better in the end than stooping to deceive, and truckling to popular prejudices? Rev. E. A. Washburn says, speaking of God, "That this personal

Will is benevolent, and is shown to be so by the fact of the Universe, which evinces a providential care for men and other animals." This is just one of the plausibilities which passed muster before scientific method was understood, but modern science rejects it as unproved. Respectfully,

Answer to "How is it?"

A POEM PUBLISHED IN THE TRUTH SEEKER, MAY 15, '75.

Not every one that crieth Lord—
So it is written in the word—
But he that does my Father's will,
His conscience whispers, Peace, be still.
Thus it is.

'Tis those who do profess the most
And those who vauntingly may boast
We've prophesied in his great name,
That will ensure us from all harm.
Thus it is.

They that a cup of water give,
To help the thirsty soul to live;
If in my name the gift be press'd
The giver shall be surely bless'd
Thus it is.

He is a good Samaritan
Who helps the needy all he can;
Who dresses wounds with healing oil,
And from good deeds does not recoil.
Thus it is.

Pardon me friend, there is no hell,
For Christian or for Infidel.
Love and good works if all will do
Will surely carry us safe through.
Thus it is.

The liberal mind despises creeds,
For his religion is good deeds.
The naked clothe, the hungry feed,
And thus he scatters the good seed.
Thus it is.

And here you ask has he a soul?
Have you not seen the lengthy scroll
From Georgia to the State of Maine,
How men are being born again?
Thus it is.

The darkness of the dreadful past
Is brightening to the reader fast.
The poor despised had Infidel
Is rolling back the pall of hell.
Thus it is.

And Science with many golden rods
Is after all the ancient gods,
Whether of wood, or stone, or gold,
Old Orthodoxy's story's told.
Thus it is.

Saving Mankind

From the Influence of Church and Priest a Solemn Duty.

The recent atrocious murder of a little girl in Boston, in a church on Sunday in broad daylight, by one of the officers of the "holy institution"—one who had probably experienced a "change of heart"—(was it changed to adamant that it had no pity for a tender and defenseless babe?) been baptized and washed clean in the "blood of the Lamb," should certainly be an admonition to church-gogers to keep away from places that every now and then are shown to be the resort of villains of the deepest dye.

Had such an event transpired in some Infidel or Spiritualist meeting, every publication in the land would be filled with warnings; and I am not certain but the strong arm of the law would be invoked to close the doors of the building.

"Why do you not attend church?" once asked a "hard-shell Baptist" preacher of your correspondent. "To me, attending church is a silly waste of precious time," was my reply. There are many palpable reasons why people ought not to go to church. And now, it is evident that life is in peril in the sacred sanctuary. Who would go where danger lurks? Where one's life is in jeopardy? Who can have a desire to have his skull fractured, be shockingly mutilated and disfigured, and then flung into the belfry of an orthodox church steeple and there left to die, as was little Mabel Young? And lastly, there comes a tale of a burning church in Holyoke, Mass., and nearly a hundred victims crushed, mangled and swallowed up in the devouring element. Where was God that day? Was he in his holy temple? Was he there where men and women had come to worship "his holy name?" When such calamities strike men dumb with terror, I like to know the whereabouts of God in the trial hour; I inquire, but alas, only echo answers—where? I inquire of believers if their God is blind, deaf, dumb and helpless; if he is a mocker, and heartless in moments of peril; and they answer by calling me a blasphemer. And I would as soon be called that as be known as a believer in a stupid, insipid, lifeless God, as cold as the waxen image of the Virgin Mary.

But has it not at least become the solemn duty of Infidels and Liberals generally to use every lawful means to induce Christians to see the error of their ways, and shun priests and churches as they would venomous serpents? Should not all be guarded, and avoid those dismal abodes of wickedness and crime, as they would a pestilence or plague? And those who have the light must be constant in spreading the good news of salvation from the Christian yoke of oppression and murder, for life is too precious and beautiful to be ruthlessly destroyed within the gloomy walls of an ill-ventilated, musty church edifice.

SUSAN H. WIXON.

Fall River, Mass.

A New Prophet.

A Prophet has arisen at Appleton, Wis. Is he the Messiah, or is he John the Baptist?

He preacheth not in temples made with hands, nor behind costly pulpits; the blue canopy of the heavens is the roof of his church, and mother earth his sacred floor. With pulpits he is, nevertheless, abundantly provided, nor is it often that he uses the same one a second time, as the materials are often used in building the abode of Christians, or in cooking the meals of a banker. When he preaches in the streets of our city Gomorrah, standing aloft on a pile of stones or cord wood, a dry goods box, or some other temporal eminence, which his young proselytes, after school hours will erect for him, he crieth forth with a loud voice, saying: "Repent, and flee the wrath of God before it is too late!" He delivers more sermons than any other follower of Christ in this God-forsaken place. He is not Elias, for I saw him preach last winter in a snow bank three feet deep, a dozen "young Americas" in his rear, who, of course, did not call him bald head, as such would not have been applicable; but when they saw he was possessed of the Holy Ghost, and was getting too hot, they pushed him occasionally into the snow in order to cool him off. I immediately started off in full run to get a gun; for sure, I thought he would now call on the she-bears; but no—this meek man of God did not even reproach them with a single word—which shows that also the prophets have improved. He arose and continued preaching, was pushed again, stumbled and fought against the snow, being so full of the spirit, that he kept preaching continually the mighty word of God. Whether he will be crucified or not, there is no telling as yet. The unbelievers—our Christians—have persecuted, and at last accused him, saying, he is a nuisance! Accordingly he was cast into prison by the authorities; but, as nothing could be brought against this prophet, by which they could find him guilty to deserve crucifixion, they turned him loose again. But he did not leave the country like his predecessor Jesus, when he was in danger of being caught. On the contrary, he is now preaching again in the streets, the same as before, as though nothing had happened. But the Christians will no more listen to him; as they could not hang him, they now say he is crazy.

O Christianity! is it thus that thou treat thy prophets in the nineteenth century? Had he been born a thousand years ago, when the Christian world knew better how to esteem those gems of the gospel, the same persons who now say he is crazy, would pray to him, "St. Brown pray for us!"

He works with the common laborer through the week, preaches in the evening, sometimes in the day; but especially on Sundays, without wages; nay, without a church, in all he is a true follower of Christ's teachings; and yet they will not listen to his words. Verily, I see, the good times for the prophets have vanished.

CROW NOT TOO SOON.—Charles J. Simpson of Keithsburg, Ill., whom the Christian papers were making much ado about, as the converted Infidel, is not likely to add much peace to their souls. Thirty years ago he was a licensed Methodist preacher, and but few in the West could excel him in eloquence or power of converting souls at revivals. Poor pay drove him from the ministry, and he commenced to earn his bread in an honest way, and for ten or fifteen years worked steadily at the shoemaker's bench. He then abandoned the work and began lecturing on Veterinary surgery. He is a great joker, and delights in playing pranks on the Church. A few years ago he was at a town in Iowa, where a protracted meeting was in progression, and as he wished a good time, he introduced himself as a minister and offered his services, which were accepted, and he assisted until the close of the meeting, when the congregation, who were so well pleased with his services, raised a collection and presented him with a $50 American watch, which he is still wearing. He is a Materialist in every sense of the word, and the "Convention at Memphis" was only one of his practical jokes at the expense of the clergy.

A NEAR-SIGHTED Boston man was lately riding in a street car, when a lady opposite bowed to him. He returned the bow, raised his hat, smiled sweetly, and was just wondering who she was, when she came over and whispered in his ear, "Oh! I'll fix you for this, old man! Then he knew it was his wife.

4. We do not believe he ever established the great evils, priesthood and kingcraft in the world to oppress and curse the human race for thousands of years.

5. We do not believe God ever co-habited with a young Jewish maiden and thereby begot a son half god and half man. This idea appears so entirely a borrowed one from prior heathen mythology we give it no credence at all. If there was such a person as Jesus Christ, he had a natural father, the same as every other being who came into the world, and was no more God than any other good man.

6. We do not believe any human being is to be eternally damned for not believing that which is impossible for him to believe, as it is every man's undoubted right to believe and accept that which to him seems just, right and true.

Having now answered our friend's questions; having told him some things we do believe and some things we do not believe, we wish to ask him a few questions, and hope he will reply to them with the same fairness we have endeavored to exercise.

1. If it is necessary the Universe should have been created, is it not just as necessary its author should have been created?

2. Whence came the Jewish and Christian God, and how long has he existed?

3. How could God make the boundless Universe from nothing?

4. Is it likely a good God would make millions of creatures, and make also a wily Devil to decoy ninety-nine hundredths of them to eternal destruction?

5. Why did God make the Devil?

6. If he did not make evil, where did it come from?

7. What possible good can it do to punish forever countless millions of weak and unfortunate beings? Can keeping them in torture perpetually, really add to the glory of God?

8. If God is unchangeable, and always the same, how could he repent on one day of what he had done on another day?

9. Would it be unjust or unkind in God to rule that all men should be happy in whatever state of existence they may occupy?

10. By what principle of justice can cruelty inflicted upon an innocent person be counted as justification to the guilty?

11. Is it possible for father and son to be of the same age, or for the latter to beget the former?

12. If God raised up the priesthood to lead and guide the world, why did he not endow them with more self-denial and virtue than they seem to possess?

13. Is God so influenced by blood, whether of bullocks, rams, he-goats, or his only begotten son, as to forgive the sins of the blackest criminals, while towards countless millions of other unfortunate beings his displeasure continues forever?

We have propounded the same number of questions our friend asked us. If he will be kind enough to reply to them we will be glad to ask him a few more. Shall we hear from him?

"Common Sense."

We regret that the able, sprightly and well-conducted Liberal, Spiritualistic Journal by this name, published more than a year in San Francisco, has been compelled to succumb and go to the wall for lack of support. It certainly deserved a better fate. The cause of Liberalism and Freethought has not too many advocates, and too much is not being done to liberate the sons and daughters of America to free them from the shackles and fetters of bondage and superstition. We are truly sorry that any able advocate of mental liberty and the rights of man is obliged to "step down and out" for want of appreciation and encouragement. When a new Liberal paper starts, we fear too many stand back and withhold their support until they see whether it is going to "live" or not—to see whether it can survive, before they venture to risk a dollar upon it. This is not right. As well might the parents of a new-born babe withhold nourishment and protection from the little new-beginner until it proved itself able to live without them. How many petite squallers could survive under such treatment?

Within a few days we were conversing with a friend from Baltimore, a Mr. R., who is engaged in publishing an Insurance Journal. We were comparing notes as to the effect of the hard times upon our respective journals and as to the relative assistance each received from advertising space. He showed us a page of his paper, considerably smaller than THE TRUTH SEEKER, on which were four advertisements, each occupying a quarter of the space. He asked what we thought he obtained for that one page. We feared we would not make the estimate high enough, and we said one thousand dollars for a year. He assured us he obtained three thousand dollars for it. We replied that we did not believe it was worth half that amount to the companies thus advertising, especially as the journal circulates only among insurance men who would not be the ones to patronize them. "O," said he, it is not the benefit they expect to derive from the advertisements that induces them to pay for that amount of space, as they really derive little or no benefit from them; they do it to sustain an insurance organ in which they have confidence. They are well aware it costs money to publish such a Journal, and they take that means of contributing to its support, and it is similar with the seventy-five or one hundred parties who occupy our advertising columns.

This set us to thinking. Here are four parties that cheerfully pay $750 each per year to sustain a journal devoted to their interests, and there are three or four score more of others doing similarly. How, queried we, does the support of our Liberal friends compare with this? We fear unfavorably. Many of them do not seem to think it incumbent on them to patronize any Liberal paper. Some deign to invest 25 cents for THE TRUTH SEEKER for three months and then "haul off" for fear of too much extravagance, while others are able to get their hearts open wide enough to risk $1.75 or $3.00, or even $3.50 per year.

Has not the Liberal element of this country a vital interest in the success of its organs? Is it any more than right and just that they should make a slight effort to help them stem the current of popular prejudice and priestly opposition? The Liberals of America certainly have a duty to perform in this direction. They should realize their journals are advocating their sentiments, that they ought to be promulgated throughout the land, that Christians will not support these journals, and that Liberals only can be looked to for that purpose. No one certainly ought to cripple themselves or endanger the welfare of their family for the sake of any paper, but there are thousands who are perfectly able to take a Liberal journal who do not do so.

Were it vouchsafed to us that two wishes that we might make should be accomplished, the first would be that every free-hearted Liberal may have all that is necessary for his happiness. The second would be, that such Liberals as already have the pecuniary ability to aid in spreading truth may have the disposition to use a portion of it for that purpose.

Died.

Two faithful, earnest and devoted Liberals have recently fallen asleep in death. CAPT. E. G. POTTER, of Bellevue, Iowa, died on May 29th, aged eighty-three years, seven months and twelve days. He was born in Brookfield, Mass.; he moved to Iowa in 1842 with a moderate capital, which he invested in farming lands. By industry, frugality and good management he acquired an ample fortune of some $300,000. He was a Liberal of positive and strong convictions, but by his uniform upright character, he secured the respect of all who knew him, whether believers or unbelievers. He died calmly and placidly in the full enjoyment of the belief he had cherished scores of years. The funeral services were performed by the friends of the family, without the aid of any priest.

JOSHUA BELL, Esq., of Chicago, a very worthy citizen, was also far advanced in life. By the practice of manly, upright conduct he secured the esteem of his numerous acquaintances.

These were men of more than average intelligence and integrity, and it is a loss to the world when such pass away. We trust their mantles will fall upon worthy successors.

THE TRUTH SEEKER will still be sent three months, post paid, to trial subscribers for the small sum of twenty-five cents. Readers, can you not afford to send it to some of your friends who are needing and craving truth?

TRUTH SEEKER TRACTS. Send for a lot of these little documents to hand around among your neighbors and acquaintances. They are well calculated to do missionary work and open the eyes of those troubled with mental blindness. See list on last page.

PATENT BINDERS. We still have these on hand, of suitable size for THE TRUTH SEEKER, with the name in gold on the front. They are very convenient for keeping the papers regular, clean, and in place. We send them, postage paid, for $1.10. Who takes another?

Studying the Bible.

We have before us 'Studying the Bible' by ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER. A more novel style of presenting questions we have never seen nor heard of. No person who has not given the subject considerable attention could compile a work of this character, and present in so strong a light its contradictions and absurdities, found in the Scriptures.—Iconoclast, Washington, D. C.

"A running, racy, joking, laughing, sentimental, poetical commentary—a cutting sceptical commentary—a sound sensible, useful, truthful commentary."—Liberal, Chicago.

"A capital book, and everybody should read it; its obvious qualities are fearless discussion, honest independence, a strong desire for truth, and a warm interest in everything that can promote the welfare of humanity."—Investigator, Boston.

To read it is to lose faith in the Bible.—Z. Hockett M.D., Anderson, Ind.

It opens out the Bible and shows just what it is, all its absurdities—not one of them is spared, all its trash, nonsense, folly, mischief and rascality of the old Jew-book and a little of the ignorance, depravity, conceit and villainy of the jugglers and medicine men who make it their business to impose that holy volume upon society as the word of God.—Liberal, Chicago.

It is seldom we find so much truth, sense and research, combined in a small compass.—J. Hazletine, Baraboo, Wis.

The original poetry, simple, yet always to the point is well worth the price.—C. M. Sautelle, Oregon.

My convictions are that this little book is doing more good alone in opening the eyes of the people to the truths than all the salaried preachers on the globe.—Sam Leonard, St. Jo. Mo.

It is one of the keenest, boldest written, and most sensible commentaries on the Bible ever written. It embodies the thoughts of a life-time and deserves to stand side by side with Paine's Age of Reason, which it fairly eclipses.—Irenius, Jr., Bronson, Mich.

PLYMOUTH WILL STAND BY HIM.—From the Buffalo Courier:

"There came to hear Beach a good deacon of Plymouth,

As pious a man as you'd meet in a day;

He listened awhile, and then, making a wry mouth,

Looked scornfully around him and hastened away;

Saying, as he went out: 'It is really outrageous,

The language this lawyer's permitted to use;

But one thing he can't do, this Beach the rampageous,

He can't bust old Plymouth or damage the pews.

'No matter what happens we will stick to our pastor,

Let Beach and the Tiltonites talk as they will;

We ain't apprehensive of any disaster,

But let the worst come and we'll stick to him still.

We feel pretty sure of the jury-box sages,

And Henry himself ain't got nothing to fear,

For if they convict him we'll just raise his wages,

And make 'em at least thirty thousand a year.'"

MR. TILTON's counsel profess to have proof that the jury have been improperly approached, and say that evidence is almost daily proffered to them. Mr. Beach has received the following letter: "SIR: Last evening I was dining with several gentlemen in Brooklyn, among whom were two staunch supporters of Plymouth Church. The conversation turned upon the Beecher trial, in which the two gents joined. I asked one of them, 'What is the real opinion of the Plymouth Church congregation in regard to Beecher?' He replied, 'Oh, we all believe him guilty, but for the credit of the church we must get him through it at any price. It has already cost us a deal of money; the jurymen are rather high in their wants, but we have fixed five or six of them, so there is sure not to be a verdict against us. We have got the foreman all right.' This definite information, however, is represented by them as being only an indication of positive proof that they have accumulated. They say they can prove that a member of the Brooklyn Ring boasted that nine of the jurors "were sure for Beecher," some through purchase and others through other influences.

Woman's Rights and Man's Wrongs!

BY JOHN SYMPHERS.

The present age is a concentration and focalization of the light of all the ages that have gone before it. The grand accumulation of all the rays emanating from the great luminaries that have arose and set, and under whose influence we have been continually revolving.

Our world began in midnight, and progressed to twilight—from twilight to starlight—from starlight to moonlight—and from moonlight to sunlight. This being the sunlight age of the world it would naturally be supposed to be super-eminent the age of new thought and progressive ideas.

A close study of history will reveal unto us the fact that every nation has had a mission; some of them succeeded pretty well in working out their peculiar missions, others only partly succeeded, while many others failed altogether. The mission of the great American government is to solve the great problem of universal liberty. American slavery was one of the great hindrances to the fulfilment of our mission; but that, we have now fortunately got rid of, although at an immense sacrifice and a very narrow escape of our national life. Yet we still have another system of slavery and bondage hanging over us, which we must also get rid of.

Women, by the constitution, are citizens, and it follows then that fully one half of our American citizens have no political status; and as long as this remains the case, the great problem of our national existence is only half solved, and the end of our mission only half attained. We must solve the other half of this great problem, or we will yet be where Greece and Rome now are, and contribute our share to that great heap of ruins—the driftwood and debris of "busted nations" and empires, now scattered all along down the great highway of nations. Modern science has taught us that there is no effect without its appropriate cause. This being axiomatic, it behooves us to dig deep and search close for the cause that can produce so great an effect, as the downfall and ruin of a republic, kingdom or empire. I am almost ready to proclaim to the world, that I have discovered the key that unlocks this great secret. There are two great elements pervading the entire realms of nature—the positive and the negative—the male and the female. All things that would live, even governments themselves, must have these two elements united within them. In the union of these two elements there is life, in their separation there is death.

"Let no man put asunder what God hath joined together." A purely male government, one in which woman has no political voice, no vote, no status, will and must, according to the eternal fitness of things, soon go to the dogs. I affirm in the light of all history, that this was the great cause that wrecked so many kingdoms and "busted" so many empires. It will most surely do the same thing for us, sooner or later, unless we heed the great warning of the past, and hasten to correct this matter which looms up before us as one of the world's great mistakes. Our best statesmen and political economists declare that signs and symptoms of our political death and decay as a nation are already becoming so very apparent, that even men of the most ordinary capacity cannot help but discern them. Our politicians have become fearfully and awfully corrupt. Our American manhood, too, is rotting down. The destroying influences of beer, gin, rum, brandy, whisky and tobacco are fast doing the job for us, and I tell you that unless we reform, and that speedily too, old mortification will have us, and in fact I am not absolutely certain but it has already set in. Old Sal-oon and Mrs. Spittoon are the Devil's right and left bowers true indices of man's drunkenness and nastiness. A spittoon filled with nasty, stinking, poisoned saliva—old exhausted quids and gutter snipes, is enough to make hell sick and the Devil spew.

Oh! when will men learn to purify their bodies and live clean and inspired lives? We need a religion—it is absolutely the world's great desideratum. A religion which shall make the salvation of the body the great central idea, instead of the salvation of the soul. True morality is physiological instead of theological. The time will come when bodily conditions will be the recognized qualifications for church membership, instead of a head crammed full of myths and silly doctrines, and perhaps a mouth full of tobacco. The time will come when committees, appointed to examine applicants for church membership, will look into their mouths and smell their breath, instead of asking them a hundred silly questions about Gods, Christs, hells, Devils, gardens, Adams, Eves, original sins, falls, &c., &c. A tooth brush sticking out of a man's pocket, to me is a synonym of heaven; a black plug of tobacco in a man's pocket is a synonym of hell. I know many preachers who both chew and smoke, and seldom wonder why God don't answer their prayers. They pretend to know so much about God, and yet have not learned the great fact, that no prayer issuing from a dirty mouth, and enveloped in a stinking breath can ever enter into his ear. His ears are open only to prayers that issue from clean mouths and pure hearts. I once saw the President of these United States; I was listening to his talk; he looked nice and clean, and I was thinking to myself what a pity that he is such an inveterate smoker. But you cannot imagine how my estimation and admiration of General Grant arose, when I discovered a large splendid tooth brush sticking out of his pocket. I never think of General Grant now without thinking of his tooth brush.

I will now mention a most fearful thought. Did you ever think that all those millions upon millions of money, used by this government and collected as revenue, arises from the manufacture and sales of whisky and tobacco—that which sends the bodies of tens of thousands of our fellow citizens to fill drunkards graves every year? I say nothing of their souls—which, if the popular religion be true—must weep and wail in woe, and kick the firebrands of hell in every direction; not only for a few hundred years, but for all eternity. The scriptures inform us that the wages of sin, are death; and unless we reform, and that quickly, we will be made to feel the awful truth of this declaration, both as a nation and as individuals. No nation whose revenues are derived from a price set upon that which destroys the souls and bodies of its citizens, can exist for any great length of time. But,

We will "bust" as sure as hell,

Will "bust,"

With an overload of sin,

For I tell you that our outer crust

Is getting mighty thin.

The salvation of our country demands that we have some new element of life and vitality infused into our great political system, and that it be done immediately. But there is no element in existence, not yet appropriated, that can be brought in, except the female element. Everything else, except that has already been brought in and used up. The chains of woman's slavery which has held her down through so long a lapse of ages, must now be broken. She must have a voice in the making of those laws, to which she is held amenable, equally with man. Taxation without representation, will in time "bust" the strongest nation that ever existed. Our politics must have some purifying element infused into them, or we will soon be called upon to assist in singing our death requiem, thus:

Farewell vain world I'm going home,

We die just like old Greece and Rome,

Our policy, it cut our throat,

We would not let the women vote.

The female element alone has that redemption in it which we must have. She alone is pure, temperate and moral.

The whisky problem of this country will never be solved or settled, until we put the ballot into her hands. The female half of humanity will go almost solid for abolishing the making and selling of intoxicating drinks, by law. She will go for imposing heavy fines, penalties and imprisonment upon all the violators of said laws. Woman is now going to those hell-holes and saloons into which her husband and sons are creeping, both day and night, and has knelt upon her knees, with tears in her eyes and prayers upon her tongue; but comparatively it has done but little good, for still the demon rages. The next place she goes to will be to the poles, with the ballot in her hand, to see what can be affected by a change of tactics.

Woman must be made to stand side by side with man, his equal and his peer in everything. The old idea that man is the head of the family, is an exploded humbug, a monstrous lie. Woman is the head of the family, and not man. Man, instead of being the head of the family is only its tail—a kind of ornamental appendage. From woman, all the nations of the earth derive their existence. She gives birth, life and being to us all. But the objectors sneeringly asks what kind of a figure would woman cut upon the battle field? I answer, give her a political status equal with man, enfranchise her, and she will soon inaugurate such reforms in this world, that very soon there will be no battles to fight. She will bring about that long prayed for time when our swords shall be beaten into sheep shears, and our shears into fish hooks. But then suppose that wars actually should come, we will find that women, if needed, can do their part as they have often done, in this world's great battles. How about Joan of Arc? Was not she something of a success in the way of commanding an army? Woman has sometimes happened to have something to do in the affairs of government, and uniformly she has proved herself competent and a great success. Queen Victoria is a woman, I believe, and has swayed the sceptre over old England with great success, and to the general satisfaction of her millions of happy subjects.

But now in conclusion, I will give a few very definite reasons for female suffrage, and arrange them in numerical order:

1st. Women have the same natural and inalienable rights, and the same common interests, as men.

2d. They have as much concern in the establishment of justice; in domestic tranquility; in providing for the common defense, the common welfare, and in the securing of the blessings of liberty for themselves and their posterity, as men have.

3d. They are naturally as capable of determining what laws and measures will be equitable and right as men are.

4th. They have as strong a love of country, and as exalted and pure patriotism, as men have.

5th. They are taxed without representation, which is plainly unjust in any government claiming to be founded upon the principles that ours is.

6th. They are made amenable to the laws, even to the extent of capital punishment, and are thus judged by laws and often condemned to death by laws in which they have no part in enacting, and to which their consent has never been asked nor given.

7th. Deprived of the ballot, they have no means of self protection against any form of legal or judicial injustice.

8th. With the ballot, they will possess an equal share of political power with men, and thus be enabled to redress their wrongs.

9th. All class legislation is wrong in principle, and always sure to be oppressive.

10th. A government which excludes one half of its population from a participation in its affairs, is not a government of the whole people.

11th. To make sex alone the ground of exclusion from the exercise of political rights, is as tyrannical and unjust, as it was to make the color of the skin a crown for those abuses.

12th. Woman is the head of the family, and not man, and now with his round dozen of good substantial reasons for the speedy enfranchisement of women, and a solution of the great American problem of equal rights for all, I bid you good-by.

A Challenge.

TO REV. L. W. CHURCH, of West Winfield, N. Y.
My Dear Brother: I address you as brother, albeit you may not clearly apprehend the sense in which the term is used by Infidels, who regard all human kind one grand brotherhood, bigots not excepted, irrespective of their being either in Christ or out of Christ. Well, brother, I have a few words to say to you right here through THE TRUTH SEEKER. I was present a few months since at a convention of Spiritualists in Winfield, where after you had offensively notified the audience of your purpose of opening a pulpit crusade against Spiritualism upon a stated Sunday, you were challenged to public debate by Dr. H. P. Fairfield, one of the speakers. Upon your absolute refusal to meet him upon any conditions whatever, either at the Public Hall or your own church, the Dr. made some remark about "skulking behind a sectarian pulpit." I afterwards listened to the reading of your pulpit tirade against Spiritualists, Infidels, Atheists, Blasphemers, and such scientists as Darwin, Huxley, Spencer, &c., all of whom you ignorantly conglomerated into one hell-deserving lump of villainy, upon which you proceeded to pour your orthodox slops without stint. Allow me to whisper here to you that your pious essay was regarded by the sensible part of your audience as merely a medley of vituperation, fulminated by an ignorant, irate priest.

It was a discourse thoroughly infused with the spirit of Romans iii. 7: "For if the truth of God hath more abounded through my lie unto his glory why yet am I also judged as a sinner?" I am informed that you have read that stereotyped sermon upon two occasions since. Perhaps you imagine it will continue ever new, like the good old song of Moses and the Lamb. But you are quite as particular as the spirit mediums to have the "conditions right." Your reading seems to depend wholly upon right conditions. You would not read at Cedarville, I am told, until arrangements had been made with the trustees of the church by which any attempt at reply would be squelched. At the close of your second reading in Winfield, an esteemed fellow-townsmen of yours, who attempted some remarks, was effectually Doxologized by a choral contrivance. Rev. Brother, Truth never seeks cover. David, the man after God's own heart, never stood for cover. He just uncovered, did that same David. See 2d Sam. vi. 20: "How glorious was the king of Israel to-day, who uncovered himself to-day in the eyes of the handmaids of his servants, as one of the vain fellows shamelessly uncoverth himself."

Now, Brother, I propose to give you an opportunity of meeting, upon a free platform, an humble youth, who is conscious he can oppose to you nothing more formidable than his modicum of common sense. I have the most implicit faith in common sense against superstition, and I hereby challenge you to meet me in public debate, upon any issue involving either the merits of Christianity or Infidelity. The one condition I ask is that the platform be free; that there shall be no chance for clerical hide-and-seek—no playing Paul, as per 2 Cor. xii. 16: "Being crafty I caught you with guile." None of that, you understand! And should you, as the valiant shepherd of a flock, consider a duty you owe the sheep to come out boldly and face a so-called enemy of the fold, I will undertake to provide you a fit occasion. I pause for a reply.

Yours for free and fearless investigation,

CHARLES HYDE.

[TWO HUNDRED AND NINETY-FIFTH MEETING.]

A lecture was read by FREDERIC R. MARVIN, M.D., Professor of Psychological Medicine and Medical Jurisprudence in the New York Free Medical College for women, on

The Literature of the Insane.

In entering upon the study of the literature of the insane, we are venturing into new fields of thought. Little information has been obtained with regard to the subject of this lecture. Essays have appeared, it is true, wherein the writings of Swedenborg, Blake and Fox are carefully and perhaps analytically studied; but such essays are constructed on metaphysical foundations which render them useless to students of science.

To understand the pathology of mind, and correctly appreciate the literature in which it frequently manifests itself, we must set aside as comparatively worthless all unknown factors in the problem which are not directly inferable from such as are known, we must be satisfied with the discovery, classification and study of the laws of phenomena; all search for essences and primary causes is unscientific and must be fruitless. When I speak of mind, understand me to mean not an essence, but a force resulting from and liberated by nervous action. This force must be studied objectively, since studied otherwise it vitiates its own results.

The literature of the insane has received superficial attention. The remarkable eccentricities, eloquence and wit which characterize a large part of it tend to dazzle and mislead even earnest students.

When we look at the vast and imposing structure of Islamism, overshadowing one hundred and forty millions of votaries, looming like a spectral city through the mist and darkness of the middle ages, and lifting its minarets into the full blaze of the nineteenth century, and remember that its foundations rest only on the wild visions of an epileptic—when we look at the mediæval world and behold millions of men, women and children casting their lives away with joy and exultation, leaving home and country to rescue Jerusalem from the hand of the Infidel, and remember that the Crusades grew out of the heated visions and reckless eloquence of an insane hermit—when we look at the prophetic writings of Emanuel Swedenborg, who was the forerunner of modern science, and remember his madness—when we look at the profound philosophy and splendid triumphs of Auguste Comte, the man whose genius streams like a ray of light into the far future, beyond our strongest vision, ever widening till it seems to cover the whole race with its transcendent glory, and then behold the founder of the Positive Philosophy groping his way like a child with nerves all unstrung, and shattered mind through Esquirol's asylum, carrying ever in his crazed brain the seed of a wisdom which should make men wise long after the illustrious teacher should be gathered to his fathers:—

When we behold these things, we are often too dazzled and amazed to correctly or carefully contemplate them. But it is not my purpose to devote this lecture to the study of any of the world's great madmen. Men like Mahomet, Swedenborg and Fox will be frequently referred to, but more as illustrating than as forming the subject of this discourse.

The two kinds of insanity which most frequently exhibit themselves through means of literature are epileptic insanity and melancholia. Epilepsy, in itself is not insanity, but is very closely related to it; the children of epileptics being especially liable to insanity.

Rapid and excited ideation is a frequent forerunner of epilepsy, especially among the young. Brilliant and poetic fancies are suggested to the imagination and frequently find expression in language wholly beyond the patient's command when in a normal condition. There is often developed a fondness for literature which at first exhibits itself in poetry and afterwards in vision. A large portion of the literature of epileptics consists of visions, revelations and religious dreams. The prophetic mania is common among them.

Were we to judge of epilepsy only in the light of muscular convulsions, we should form an erroneous estimate both of the disease and of the morbid literature of many of its victims. Muscular convulsion has been assigned a too prominent place in the ordinary definition of epilepsy. There are forms of epilepsy unconnected with such convulsion. In nocturnal epilepsy the morbid phenomena of motion are so slight that the disease may exist for years without attracting attention. In epileptic vertigo and syncope we frequently find no convulsion. And separate from all recognized forms of epilepsy, who can doubt the existence of an epileptic neurosis which manifests itself by convulsive phenomena of a mental rather than muscular nature. This epileptic neurosis is characterized by other phenomena than those which pertain to convulsive epilepsy. The latter is accompanied by violent muscular convulsion and loss of consciousness, and followed in most cases by fainting, while the latter may never manifest itself through the muscular system, and is frequently connected with exalted consciousness, and does not lead to fatuity, but is characterized by remarkable intellectual activity, and frequently terminates in acute, sub-acute or chronic mania.

Ordinary epilepsy is frequently connected with premonitory symptoms, which may occur several days before an attack. These premonitions assume various forms. Some appear in the shape of dreams, some in the form of illusion or hallucination, spectacle, or otherwise, and others in that of confusion of thoughts. But the most common is what is known as the aura epileptica, and is a sensation like that produced by a breath or gentle breeze. It is usually first experienced in the end of a finger or toe, and from that points it mounts to the epigastrium or head, on reaching which the convulsions immediately appear and the patient becomes unconscious. The nature of this sensation is a matter of dispute among physicians. Dr. Harpin considers the aura as the commencement of a true spasm of the muscles which precedes the loss of consciousness.

Psychical epilepsy, or that epilepsy which convulses the mind rather than the muscles, is not to be regarded as another disease than that which we have described. It sometimes has its aura, but more frequently it seems to be the aura itself unaccompanied by muscular convulsion. The premonition appears to be the attack. Dr. Winslow records the case of an epileptic "who, at the moment of invasion, perceived exclusively with the left eye, a toothed wheel, the centre of which was occupied by a hideous figure." "In another patient," continues the same author, "the fit was immediately preceded by an intense feeling of hunger." In a third, since insane, "a little blue imp perched upon the table and moped and mocked at him as he lost his consciousness." In a fourth, a guitar seemed to have been roughly grated near the ear.

When the epileptic neurosis or diathesis exists apart from true epilepsy, we find hallucinations like these, unaccompanied by muscular convulsion, but connected with exalted imagination and rapid and excited ideation. The victims of these hallucinations possess a "wonderful aptitude for conceiving things quickly and examining them under the most brilliant and poetical aspects." These conceptions usually result from pseudo-impressions referred to the termini of sensitive nerves. These impressions or sensations are carried to the cerebrum, where, instead of being challenged and detected, they are allowed to pass as faithful reporters of the outer world. As a natural result, the patient attributes to his environment impressions which originate only within himself. He outwardly forms and locates conceptions arising from them. The act of thus forming and locating these conceptions is accompanied by another act, which is that of faith in them, as so formed and located. The patient believes in them as objective realities, and here enters delusion. The first experience to recapitulate is that of morbid impressions or pseudo-sensations, the second that of hallucination, and the third that of delusion.

These personified conceptions are usually of a poetical and religious nature, and figure in the folios of epileptics as heavenly messengers, angels, fiends and spirits. Such were the hallucinations of Mahomet which preceded violent attacks of epilepsy.

Says Maudsley, in his "Responsibility in Mental Diseases," "There can be little, if any, doubt in the minds of those who do not subscribe to that (Mahometanism) faith, that an epileptic seizure was the occasion of Mahomet's first vision and revelation, and that, deceived or deceiving, he made advantage of his distemper to beget himself the reputation of a divine authority. The character of his vision was exactly of that kind which medical experience shows to be natural to epilepsy. Similar visions, which are believed in as realities and truths by those who have them, occur not unfrequently to epileptic patients confined in asylums. For my part, I would as soon believe there was deception in the trance which converted Saul the persecutor into Paul the apostle, as believe that Mahomet at first doubted the reality of the events which he saw in his vision."

Washington Irving, in his "Life of Mahomet," says: "He would be seized with a violent trembling, followed by a kind of swoon, or rather convulsion, during which perspiration would steam from his forehead in the coldest weather; he would lie with his eyes closed, foaming at the mouth, and bellowing like a young camel. Ayesha, one of his wives, and Zeid, one of his disciples, are among the persons cited as testifying to that effect. They considered him at such times as under the influence of a revelation. He had such attacks, however, in Mecca, before the Koran was revealed to him."

Were Mahomet now living, he would be confined in an asylum, and the Koran would not be revealed. We shall never know how many revelations as wonderful as any which dawned on the astonished vision of Mahomet or Swedenborg are prevented, and how many incipient religions are nipped in the bud by judicious doses of bromide of potassium, belladonna, zinc, confinement and other remedial agents. Certain it is that the wards of asylums are thickly settled with prophets, apostles, saints and media of whose visions and revelations the world is deprived; whether wisely or unwisely, it is not our province to discuss.

Ann Lee was an epileptic, and her revelations and system of theology are the outcome of insanity. She is described as "a wild creature from birth, a prey to hysteria and convulsions, violent in her conduct, ambitious of notice, and devoured by the lust of power." While confined at Manchester, she was suddenly enveloped in light, and Jesus Christ appeared to her and identified himself with her person. Her convulsions are described as violent and protracted; her countenance was distorted, bloody foam issued from her mouth and she became unconscious.

Cæsar and Petrarch were epileptics, and the writings of the latter clearly indicate the misfortune of their author.

The literature of epileptics, since it chronicles the patient's delusion, is usually of a religious nature. The delusions grow out of visions preceding or succeeding the epileptic trance, which may be separate from or connected with muscular convulsion. The case of a boy confined for epilepsy is recorded by Dr. J. C. Howden. The doctor says: "On admission to the asylum, he spoke with an earnestness, and granting his premises, an intelligence beyond his years. He told me he was Adam, the first man, born again into the world. When questioned as to his previous life in the Garden of Eden, he replied that he had been so long dead, that he could not be expected to recall particulars, but added that it was perfectly true that he had eaten the forbidden fruit, and when asked why he had done so, replied: "'Tis all very well to blame me; but you would have done the same thing if you had been in my place." He pointed to a picture of a woman on the wall, which he said was the portrait of Eve. He says he has been in heaven, and describes what he saw there. He has a fit every two or three months, and on recovering from them he is dull and stupid, then he becomes possessed of some extravagant delusion, always of a religious nature. Sometimes he returns to his old delusion that he is Adam, sometimes he is God, and at other times Christ, and not unfrequently the Devil. When questioned as to the ground of his belief, he generally says that it has been revealed to him, and that he feels that it is true, pointing with his finger to his epigastrium."

I have cited this case because one very closely resembling it came under my observation. The patient was a woman, aged thirty-five years. When quite young she married, but forsook her husband in obedience to a vision. In early life she was connected with the Episcopal Church, but soon after marriage she forsook its communion and united with the Methodist Church, which she abandoned for the Unitarian. Not satisfied with the Unitarian, she joined a Second Adventist and finally made her home with the Spiritualists. When she came under my observation she had invented a religion of her own, which she called "Bible Spiritualism"—the nature of this religion is too impure to be here recited. Like Dr. Howden's patient, she believed she had been dead many years. She was raised from the dead that she might acquaint the world with the gospel of "Bible Spiritualism." She called herself "the Bride of the Lamb," "the Woman Referred to in the Prophecy," "the Anointed of the Lord," and "the Saviour of the World." She had been confined in an asylum because, as she expressed it, scientific men were unable to recognize the phenomenon of resurrection from the dead, and looked upon it merely as an evidence of intellectual derangement. She complained of too much sanity, and wished to be reduced to a state of imbecility which she believed to be characteristic of the rest of mankind. This lady was a Latin, French and German scholar, and possessed a remarkably cultivated mind. When asked to write a simple sentence, she did so with ease, but was unable so to guide her pen as to make it follow the straight lines marked on the paper. There seemed to be an almost irresistible tendency to write in a circle; this tendency I have noticed among the insane on other occasions. When left to herself she wrote in an almost perfect circle. Beyond this there was nothing in her penmanship to indicate insanity.

In delusional insanity penmanship and orthography are seldom affected, and the composition only betrays the disorder. Very different are the symptoms of approaching general paralysis; the first indication of which is a tendency to omit and misspell words. As the paralysis advances the writing becomes irregular, and finally consists of unconnected strokes.

In an attack of acute mania there is abundant indication of incoherence, but the patient seldom forgets his letters.

In calm melancholia there is usually nothing in the penmanship, though much in the contents of the letter to indicate insanity.

Frequently the letters of the insane exhibit a curious tendency to economize space—words and sentences being so crowded as to be illegible, and often crossed several lines deep. The tendency to underscore words without reference to meaning is often discovered, especially in the early stages of melancholia associated with delusions. Frequently every other word is underscored. Occasionally a sentence will be followed by a number of exclamation points, dashes or commas. I have seen letters in which every other word was underscored, and others in which some one letter was always omitted. Such omissions are due to defective memory, and are precursors of general paralysis.

The artistic designs of the insane frequently furnish the key whereby we unlock the secret workings of their intellects and discover the nature and extent of their delusions. A young man who would speak to no one unless compelled, and who could not be induced to discover the cause of his melancholia, was found to have drawn several female heads on cards. An examination and comparison of these heads made it evident that they were all intended for the same person. The care with which they were executed aroused suspicions that they were in some way connected with the intellectual disturbance of the artist. A close examination and comparison with pictures of persons known to the family made it evident that these drawings were all intended to represent a lady to whom the patient had been engaged, but who had proved unfaithful to both her engagement and honor. These drawings, though from memory, were creditable likenesses of the original, and served to throw much light on the nature of the patient's disorder. While confined in an asylum he executed a picture of the lady, and with her features so combined his own as to make a drawing as wonderful for its skillfulness of detail as repulsive for its weirdness of spirit. Gradually he became dull and mechanical in his motions, and his later drawings seemed to be purely automatic—the result rather of reflex than of cerebral action.

I have examined spiritual pictures—that is, pictures believed by their artists to have been produced under what is termed impressment—and, whenever I have had reason to believe the artist sincere, I have had equal reason to regard his pictures as the work of reflex and automatic action.

Few appreciate the wide realm of unconscious life over which automatic action presides. Consciousness does not play so large a part in our systems of psychology as it used to. Memory is no longer regarded as peculiar to the brain, nor is it beyond physical explanation. Dr. Maudsley has clearly shown that the acquired functions of the spinal cord and of the sensory ganglia imply the existence of memory which is indispensable to their formation and exercise. How else could these centres be educated? "A ganglionic cell," says Maudsley, "whether of mind, sensation or movement, which was without memory, would be an idiotic centre, incapable of being taught its functions. In every nerve-cell there is memory, and not only so, but there is memory in every organic element of the body."

What is memory? Nothing but the organic registration of physical effects; wherever that registration takes place there is memory. Wherever there is a particle of living matter, animal or vegetable, there is memory. Memory preceded consciousness in the line of development, and often exists apart from it—we picked it up in our journey from the past, and it may be we shall cast it from us in our journey to the future. Our little consciousness is like foam on the surface of the wave, that sparkles a moment in the sunlight and then disappears forever, but under the foam lies the fathomless and unruffled ocean, and under our little dream lies the everlasting forgetfulness.

But we are drifting from our subject. The facility with which the insane compose in verse, and the ease with which they fly to figures of fancy has frequently astonished thoughtful observers. But a brief inquiry with regard to the nature of poetry will, I think, dispel the mystery, therefore without preface I proceed to the examination.

It is customary to speak of poetry as the finest form of language. Authors are not wanting who speak of the "pre-eminence of poetry." Montgomery calls poetry "the most excellent of the fine arts" and "the most perfect form of literature." It is described by a poet as "she chariot wherein King-thoughts ride," and Scaligerana says, in a moment of fanaticism, "never was there a poet or a man who delighted in poetry whose heart did not lie in the right place." And Emerson declares the poet to be in advance of his age. But all such opinions are based on a misunderstanding with regard to both the nature and history of poetry. Poetry is not what its votaries would have us believe, the best language for the noblest thought. Poetry may be studied either as an emotion or a language. A man may have one without the other, as he may acquire a language in which he has never learned to think. As a sentiment it results from passion and emotion acted on by imagination. As a language, it is that of passion and emotion. Measure and rhyme are unessential, though they are useful in expediting expression, and ornamental in contributing to its beauty.

Poetry, since it is the language of passion, emotion and imagination is the oldest language known to man. When the human race first separated itself from the animals by the development of distinctively human traits, it naturally sought to give expression to its newly acquired faculties which were those of children; and the language in which they found embodiment was fanciful, emotional and passionate. Reason and judgment being in abeyance, if in existence, made little impression on the vocabulary of the infant world. The development of judgment is necessarily associated with the recession of imagination, and the ripening of analysis marks the autumn of sentiment and the winter of poetry. Say what you please, you cannot close your eyes to the fact that poetry was the language of the infant world, and is to-day the natural language of the infant man.

A language may outlive the stage of development which gave it birth; the language of mythology has done so, the language of metaphysics has done so, and the language of poetry has done so, and they who now cultivate it are perfecting and adorning a dead language. Do not understand me to speak of poetry with contempt: I reverence it as the sweet and musical language of childhood, only I do not wish it to regulate, as it once did, the busy affairs of life. It must yield to the better language of Science and Commerce. For poetry I have tenderness and affection, but for Science I have an abiding confidence and truly religious veneration. Poetry resides in the temple of beauty and is the priestess of the past: Science leads the armies of truth, and she leads them toward the future. Truth and beauty are not identical, and nothing but unbridled fancy can make them so.

But what bearing has this on the subject of our lecture? Let us see. Insanity is a return to childhood. The intellectual faculties most frequently interfered with in insanity are such as distinguish the man from the child. The strongholds of reason break and crumble; the fortress of judgment falls, and, how often over their ruins the wild and luxuriant verdure of emotion and imagination blossoms and blooms! The insane man reverses the process of development; he turns his back upon the future and retraces his steps. Science tells us that the human race started in the very mud and has arrived by a process of evolution at animal life and intellectual consciousness. There was a point in time—probably the Terrace Epoch—when the nervous system thought for the first time; when the little gray nerve cells first caught the golden sun-light, and in the mint of their own consciousness turned it into the coin of thought; when they knew for the first time the color of the violet and the odor of the rose as distinct sensations. The currents of thought were at first rudimentary and imperfect; but as the brain strengthened and convoluted and developed, there came thundering along the track of the nervous system such trains of living thought as announced the arrival of the human epoch. Faith, hope, love, honesty and all the virtues are but mile stones on the road of progress, and so is it with thought and consciousness; we pick them up in our journey from the past, and we shall cast them from us in our journey to the future. These things are not finalities; there are no finalities, they are stages of development.

The insane man, as we have seen, turns his back on the future and retraces his steps, he descends the stairway of development and returns to the childhood of his race. He may go farther, he may sink to the lowest depths of imbecility, he may enter through the shadowy portals of idiocy into the realm of brute nature, and become less than the beasts of the field. There are men who recoil from the thought that their ancestors were apes; but let such remember that there are men living who are ages behind that venerable ancestor, and who might, were they wise enough, look longingly forward to his estate with feelings of respect and almost adoration. There are paths of development behind the ape and there are men who tread them.

The insane are, so far as the race is concerned, children. The same instinct which taught the savage who is the child of the race, to cower before the ordinary phenomena of nature, and that teaches the infant to shrink from an unaccustomed sound, leads the insane to recoil from things in no way dangerous or frightful. Like children they live in their senses and are ruled over by imagination. The child lives in an ideal world; so does the savage; so does the poet; so does the madman. All speak of spiritual things, because to their heated vision the ghosts, fairies and genii have as real an existence as those of living men and women. They all dwell in an enchanted world. The critic has no place in that world; he is the disenchanter. They do not criticise—they dream. We learn from Herodotus, that Phrynicus produced a tragedy on the fall of Miletus; the citizens wept until the play was ended and then fined the author for torturing their feelings. What audience in England or America ever wept through a play and then censure the dramatist because of the power and truthfulness of his tragedy? I venture to say none. We are not children—our judgments never so relax as to deliver us wholly into the hands of imagination. We can criticise a play while it is being enacted before us; but not so with our remote ancestors; they witnessed a play very much as a child listens to a ghost story.

When we remember how often and in how many ways insanity is a return to childhood, can we wonder at the remarkable gifts of poetry which have so often shone like stars through the darkness of clouded reason, giving us gems of poetry so pure and exalted that they must ever adorn the literature of the world? Insanity does not affect all minds alike; it will not supply an absent talent, though by intensifying and exalting existing ones, it often seems to do so. Where there are no poetical possibilities there can be no poetical attainments. I have seen the rude and illiterate under the influence of excitement produce stanza after stanza, which in their ordinary condition they could never have constructed. Most productions of the kind are vulgarly but correctly styled doggerel, and yet we occasionally find among them gems of undoubted lustre. Not many years ago there appeared a little book called "Poems of the Inner Life;" if any of you possess that work, you possess a specimen of pathological literature of remarkable value. Many stanzas in that book are almost faultless in the conception and finish, and yet one has only to glance at the book and its pretensions to see that its author was the victim of a delusion incompatible with sanity. Those of you who have attended spiritual lectures and seances, will call to mind many remarkable examples of this tendency to versification and figurative language. The morbid exaltation of the speaker hurries him with rapid flight over abysses of darkness and heights of glory, while his sane companion stands on the solid earth and watches with astonishment his Icarus-flight. If you will visit asylums for the insane you will find the same thing—men and women, who believe themselves media for interplanetary communication between this world and the next, bubbling over with stanzas of ineffable vapidness and building rhetorical air-castles on the ever-shifting clouds of their own fancy.

Do not understand me to say the insane never reason; they frequently reason, and reason well. They even reason with more logical sequence and precision than they would were they possessed of sanity. This arises from the fact that the insane are often free from concern as to the morality of their arguments—they are proverbially sophists. Their logic is everywhere tainted with an overweening self-consciousness. They reason, as do children, with no large reference to the whole, but with the attention fixed on a fragment, that fragment being themselves.

Poetry has been carefully defined as the "rhythmic expression of feeling." A thoroughly sane and cultivated poet skillfully employs the language of childhood to explain truths so profound that no philosopher can reply to them. But the skill with which he uses the language finally converts it into something that is not poetry. "The degradation of poetry begins with the educated. As knowledge extends itself and reason develops, the imitative arts decay." They decay because imitation is characteristic of the child, and as knowledge and reason develop, the child departs and the man arrives.

Look about you and see who are the imitators—the automata whose movements result rather from the medulla oblongata than the cerebrum. They are the children—not perhaps in years, but in intellect. On a warm, sunny day, station yourself in a window on the avenue and you will see thousands of these adult children shopping, promenading, or loitering. They have no end to serve, they move with the throng merely because others by whom they are surrounded do the same. They are borne on by the force of example. If you closely examine the faces of these men and women who have spent years, perhaps life, on the avenue, you will see that the lines which usually indicate character are wanting, and that the features—if indeed they may be spoken of as such—are blank and expressionless.

As knowledge and reason develop, the inventive arts triumph over the imaginative. The same thing was true centuries ago in Greece—the imaginative school of poetry was followed by the critical. After Pindar came Sophocles; and after Sophocles, Euripides; and after Euripides the "Alexandrine Versifiers." Latin literature is merely degraded Greek literature and the only Roman poets that really influence this age are Lucretius and Catullus.

Homer, Shakspeare, and Goethe, are not exceptions to what has been said. They are usually called poets, but are not what is usually understood by the word poet. They are great representatives of the race; grand incarnations of humanity. The pages of Homer, Shakspeare, and Goethe are not devoted to poetry alone, but to commerce, war, philosophy, science, the arts, and domestic life. Everything which pertained to humanity interested those great men, and found welcome to their pages.

They who in this age cultivate poetry are by that very culture destroying it. Culture is the fruit of criticism, and criticism and poetry are not friends. The language of the sane adult of the nineteenth century is the language of commerce and science.

Do not misunderstand the nature of my argument; I neither hold poetry in contempt nor seek to undervalue its mission. The teacher must adapt himself to the pupil, and the best language in which to instruct is that with which the pupil is acquainted. The majority of men—I say it sadly, and in no censorious spirit—are either savages or children, and understand only such things as appeal to the simplicity of their intellects. The brains of savages and children exhibit on dissection the same shallowness of sulci and feebleness of convolution. The cineritious, or thinking tissue, is deficient in quantity. To such minds it is useless to address prolonged argument, for they have not the faculty wherewith to appreciate logic. They are children and mind childish things, and if you wish to make them understand you and profit by your discourse, you will have to address them in a child's language. In dissecting human brains nothing has more thoroughly impressed me than the poverty of thinking tissue which characterizes the average cerebrum.

I am not speaking of leading merchants, bankers, financiers, and professional men, but the rank and file of humanity. Now if you wish to reach these children of a larger growth, you must resort to the language of rhythm and emotion—that is, to poetry.

But poetry has another use, the discussion of which is foreign to the subject of this lecture, but which we recognise in passing. Poetry is useful as a means of recreation and inspiration to the mature and cultivated mind. In it we revive the feelings of childhood and recall the merry and innocent hours of boyhood.

Olympian bards who sung
Divine ideas below,
Which always find us young,
And always keep us so."

I have a noble mission and am entitled to our warmest love. But the age of prose has arrived—a grander age than any which has preceded it, and as the years move on the oracle will be dumb, the priest will wind his mantle about him and depart, and the poet will be remembered only as a vision when it is ended. Farewell Poetry! Thou hast won the laurel and we crown thee but for thy burial. Thy harp shall hang on the willow, and the reed, no more responsive to its master's will, shall be laid aside forever.

Insanity in women of sensitive nervous temperament is frequently characterized, especially at its commencement, by a taste for poetry and a propensity to versify. This taste and tendency are often observed in the insanity of pubescence. The nervous excitement attending birth of sexual life is frequently associated with morbid self-consciousness which finds expression in sombre verse. Physicians who practice in ladies' seminaries can call to mind many examples of this tendency. Insanity of pubescence, unless maniacal, is melancholy, romantic and hysterical. The poetry in which patients indulge is of a depressing nature. Among boys the insanity of pubescence is frequently characterised by acute mania. In girls however, it is marked by a dislike for work or amusement, by great nervous depression, especially at menstrual epochs, and paroxysms of apparently causeless weeping. The patient fancies herself uncared for and neglected. She looks upon her friends as enemies, and on her guardians as cruel and mercenary. She seeks for sympathy in the fictitious griefs of the novel, and if she cannot find the "Sorrows of Werther," she will fly to the pages of Byron. As the disease progresses she becomes more and more excitable, frequently breaking into violent passion or rhapsodies of verse. Such an invalid was Mary Alacoque, whose letters and memoirs abound in pages of excited verse. We gather from a little book, written by Louis Asseline, that she was precocious, and at an early age inclined to nymphomania. She relates of herself that from the age of four years she had a lively sense of the virtue of chastity, and the sight of men so wounded her modesty and alarmed her innocence that she would have fled into the desert but for fear of meeting them even there. The same nymphomaniacal phenomena may be found in the life of Saint Louis de Gonzaga as related by the Jesuit Cepdari; he "never liked to be left alone even with the Marchioness, his mother. If he was obliged to remain with her he was observed instantly to blush." "A child eight years old blushing from chastity because he finds himself alone with his mother!"

When eight years old, Mary Alacoque experienced cataleptic attacks in which she had visions of bleeding bodies, usually of Jesus or of the saints. From an attack of paralysis she recovered by the use of a remedy which my respect for you prevents me from mentioning. She renounced her family, and, to use her own language, "became absolutely passive to the will of God." She wrote long and foolish poems to her Saviour. She says, "in order to give some drops of my blood to my Saviour, I tied cords around my fingers and then thrust needles into them. I made myself a bed of potsherds on which I lay with extreme pleasure, although my whole frame quivered. Once having retired to my chamber, I was laying aside with much satisfaction the ornaments that I had worn during the day. The Son of God showed himself to me just as he had appeared after his cruel flagellation—that is, with his body all bruised, torn and bleeding—and told me it was my vanity which had brought him to that condition. On the 25th day of May, 1671, she entered the convent, and took the habit of a novice on the feast of St. Louis, in the same year. She was twenty-four years old. From the day she entered the convent hysteria and religious monomania influenced all her thoughts and actions. Some of her poems written during convent-life are very remarkable. While in the convent she wrote, "Our Lord showed me that that day was the day of our spiritual betrothal; he afterwards made me understand that he wished me to taste all that was most sweet in the tender caresses of his love. In fact, these divine caresses were so overpowering that they made me quite beside myself, and rendered me almost incapable of any physical exertion; and it was a subject of such strange embarrassment to me that I dared not show myself." Her relations with the divine spouse are related in Latin, and are too repulsive for translation. Her verses are all aglow with a flame that is not of God, but of the flesh. The following lines she dedicated to the Abbess of Paray, who deemed her insane:

"The more my love they would gainsay,
The fiercer glows the flame repress;
Let them afflict me night and day,
They cannot pluck it from my breast!
Ah, yes! the more I suffer smart,
The more I lend me with his heart."

On All-Saints' day she wrote the following lines:

"No stain in innocence is seen,
No loss in power hath ever been;
Nothing dieth here above;
All consumes itself in love."

Archbishop Manning tells us that Mary Alacoque saw her saviour, "suffused by an intensity of light, she beheld his sacred heart enveloped as it were, in flame, girdled with thorns, surmounted by a cross; and these words came to her: 'Behold the heart which has loved man so much, and has been loved so little.'"

I take great pleasure in preparing this lecture, because, of all ages, the present is most likely to be concerned in and profited by such discourse. All around us the insane are found—on every hand they plead, perhaps unconsciously, for help. They employ every avenue through which they can make their misfortunes known. The Press, the great engine of civilization, is often converted by their frenzy into an engine of folly, and their fingers are ever busy turning backward the wheels of progress. They have formed themselves into societies, they publish books, edit papers, and publicly proclaim their folly. Many of them are men and women of talent, genius and culture, and their literature has in it much that is calculated to challenge admiration. What shall we do for these men and women, our brothers and sisters? We are prevented, by virtue of their numbers, from confining them in an asylum, nor can we subject them to medical surveillance. This age is, as I have frequently said in your hearing, an inter-civilized age—it lies between two great civilizations, and is at once in the twilight of the old or metaphysical epoch and in the sunrise, the early morning of the new and scientific era. On one side the stars, the moon and the deepening shadows of night peopled with ghosts and visions, and receding faiths; and on the other the eager sun glancing upon the rising mists of ages transmutes them into gold. This is a sad, a very sad age, full of dead and dying faiths, full of burials of the past, and of idle prayers sent out in vain search for the departing gods. But O, it is a glorious age, full of the golden light which streams from the ascending sun of science. It is an age in which men lose their minds; it is an age in which they find them. There are three ages known to the human intellect. They are called respectively the mythological, the metaphysical and the positive or scientific ages. I believe the third age has arrived. The age of metaphysics is practically dead, and the intellectual disturbances which we behold on every hand are but the lingering phenomena of its dissolution. What shall we do for the throngs on every hand who are shipwrecked in faith and bankrupt in intellect, under whose feet the past is crumbling, but who will not plant their feet on the rock; but who seek comfort in the mirage of Spiritualism, the will-o'-the-wisp of Mesmerism, or the delusion of Transcendentalism? The best thing—the only thing that can be done, is to push steadily toward the future. They who keep abreast of the age will survive. In the evening of life they shall strike sail in the haven where is neither wind of doubt nor storm of regret, but where the banks are scented with the lilies of repose.

Mr. WILCOX followed with criticisms upon the lecture. He disapproved of classing Mahomet, Auguste Comte, George Fox and the grand old poets of the past with the insane. Of the first, he said he had founded a grand religion, which had served an important purpose in humanity, and which is to-day making converts in the world faster than any other system. It is an unwarranted assumption to say he was insane or that his visions were the result of epilepsy. He paid a merited tribute to the poets and quoted some fine extracts from Shelley's "Queen Mab," and remarked: "If that is insanity, it is a pity the world has not had more of it."

Dr. T. S. LAMBERT made some strictures upon the insanity of the race in the use of tobacco and alcohol, and said in this particular they were inferior to the apes, from which, according to Darwin, they had descended; they would make no use of either. He made a few remarks upon the nature of mind, memory, etc.

Mr. HENRY EVANS criticised the lecturer in the line that it was too severe upon the poets. In his remarks he said the literature of the poet had come down to us in ballad and rhymes, because in this way it was so fondly received by the people. He could not regard poetry as an indication of insanity, and thought the lecturer had not based his theory upon a sound philosophy. The facts given he did not question.

Dr. R. T. HALLOCK followed in further criticisms, as well as upon some of the claims of scientists. He alluded to severe injuries the brain had sustained in many instances without the mind being seriously impaired, citing the case of Caruth in Vineland, with half an ounce of lead in his brain, and a case where a crowbar, even, had penetrated the brain without destroying consciousness.

Dr. E. P. MILLER defended the poets and others of antiquity who had been styled insane. He criticised some of the claims made by scientists, and eloquently defended Spiritualism.

S. P. ANDREWS deemed the lecture deficient in proper definitions, which are of the first consequence. He made an application of his own special theory to the subject, "Unism, Duism and Trinism." He expressed regrets that remedies for the evils mentioned in the lecture were not prescribed.

T. B. WAKEMAN regretted that such severe criticism upon so able a lecturer had been expressed. He feared Prof. Marvin would not soon feel like favoring the Club again with another of his productions. He deemed a hygienic treatment essential for all forms of insanity. A healthy body will produce a healthy mind. He gave his views of the classifications of the sciences, placing poetry where it belongs. He spoke eulogistically of Psychology and the effect it must have upon the future of the race. He gave due credit to the poets who have preceded us, but said there was a wide difference between the productions of a Goethe and the effusions of some of our Spiritualistic friends.

JUNE 18th, 1875:

[TWO HUNDRED AND NINETY-EIGHTH MEETING.]

Mr. J. K. INGALLS read an interesting paper upon the subject of

but want of room will prevent our giving but a small portion of it.

I wish, this evening, to take up the question as it is related to morals, and to the rights and duties of the members of a society, like our own, where the theory, at least, is "the equality of all before the law."

Scientific men, and especially political economists, affect to ignore morals, and deny that any Science of Morals exists. And also that all assertions of human rights are speculative and impertinent in any scientific inquiry into social or economic questions. Yet it strangely happens these very persons expatiate grandly upon the "sacred rights of property," and the binding obligation society is under to maintain the inviolability of contracts.

In respect to Rights, let me say right here: that without such respect, such as we have, to the right of private property, for instance, society could not exist. We should be like ravenous beasts of prey; no economic, land, nor other reforms, could have any place or consideration. And I do not consider the right to life or personal freedom secondary to right of property.

With all my leanings to Positivism I cannot accept either the doctrine that we have nothing to do with rights but only duties. The highest duty I acknowledge toward my fellow-man is to respect his rights, and the dearest right I cherish is the right to perform my duty. Of rights and duties which are not the counterparts and complements of each other, I know nothing.

The point, however, I want particularly to urge, is that even such political economy as is current, has no other basis than one of right, and cannot urge inviolability of contracts or honesty in transaction, except upon moral ground. It may, to be sure, advocate "honesty as the best policy" on general terms, but in its application to individual cases, that is not honesty at all, since gains by dishonest practices are more rapid and immediate, and sufficiently permanent to suit the particular desire.

I accept the theory of evolution in thought, as well as in the more tangible and visible unfoldments of nature. Knowledge proceeds from the simple to the complex. Ethics is more complex than arithmetic. But it is only where we rise above the scruples of knowledge, and attain a comprehension of the relations they sustain to the general order of things, that our special knowledge can be corrected and made really available to wise and beneficent uses. Moreover, the investigation of the subject phenomena, involves the exercise of a high degree of moral power. Without "fidelity to truth," science is impossible. The honest inquirer, is the only one who can aid science, or is qualified to deal with facts, or discover the law by which they are classified. Moral quality, then, if not the first, is an indispensable requisite in dealing with the simplest matters of science. How much more is it requisite in dealing with so complicated a question as that of labor and wealth.

There are accepted principles enough to direct us in our inquiry if we really wish to know the truth, and not to justify some existing wrong, or class interest, or establish some pet theory. It is not at all necessary to resort to a line of speculative thought, or to appeal to mere human sympathy and benevolent feelings. However, this question may be solved, it cannot be so determined as to prolong human life indefinitely; nor place man beyond the necessity of struggle, toil, and often painful effort to supply his wants, and accommodate himself to his environments.

It is doubtful if the condition, as regards mere material enjoyment, of the ordinary skilled worker would be much increased if the most equitable division of the results of industry could be secured. But as regards stability of position, and freedom from the cares and depressions which attend the present uncertain and precarious condition of affairs, his condition would be immeasurably improved. Because then no general stagnation of business could ever take place; only local and special over-production would be possible, always accompanied by increased demand in other localities and departments, the adjustments of which would never produce any general panic or distress.

It was hinted by Prof. Royce that higher wages should be paid to labor. This, of course, would be very desirable to the laborer, but it could determine nothing. The political economists would say, and with truth, that a rise in wages would be attended with a corresponding rise in commodities, and terminate in precisely the same relative situation as at first. A demand for a reduction in the hours of labor would be met by them with the same answer: but not, it seems to me, with equal force. It must be quite evident to you, however, that these matters, however desirable and reasonable, or unreasonable, have no power to reconcile the, at least apparently, conflicting claims of capital and labor.

Let us, then, analyze the position of these factors, or assumed factors, in the production of our wealth. If possible, let us lay aside our class interests whether laborers, capitalists, or middle men, and for the evening resolve ourselves into a court of equity.

For myself, when I last spoke to you on these subjects, I was an employee. For about two years, on a small scale, to be sure, I have been an employer. My friend was kind enough to express a wish that I should speak now, so as to satisfy him as to whether change of relation had wrought change of views. I should be unwilling to admit that I had lived two years in vain, without broadening and deepening my ideas on subjects, especially upon which I had thought so earnestly. But otherwise I cannot say that my opinions have undergone any change. Essentially the view I now entertain is the same as presented itself to me more than forty years ago, when at work at the bench, apprentice to a mechanical trade.

But here is wealth being produced at the rate of several millions annually. By what rule or process is it divided? In this production, it is claimed, there is so much labor and so much capital incorporated. Before analyzing this claim, let us ask how the rate to capital and the rate to labor is determined? Economists tell us indeed what is the "natural rate of wages," that which will keep the laborer in existence and enable him to reproduce himself, in order to keep undiminished the supply of laborers. In all my readings of political economy, I have seen no other attempt than this to indicate what is or ought to be the rate. With regard to the rate to capital as well as to labor, the usual rate is the only one these exact scientists ever attempt. But upon what ground is any rate awarded to either? With respect to labor, we have a principle in the very fundamental basis of the civil law, that property in a thing rests upon the ground, than that it is the result of one's efforts, toil and self-denial.

Were the question of capital eliminated, then we should have the universal assent of civilized society, that the whole of this production belonged to the laborer or laborers who produced it. We have then reached an undisputed point. To the laborer, belongs that which he has produced, and necessarily, in any complicated transaction, that portion of anything which he has contributed to produce. Now let us consider the capitalists claim. He has put so much capital in the enterprise; he had taken risks, and assumed responsibilities; therefore, he is entitled to all the results of this operation, minus, what he thinks a fair remuneration for the laborer's services, or which pressing want or whelming competition compels the laborer to accept. It may be claimed the capitalist is also subject to competition, and if he does not give the laborer as much as another is willing or necessitated to give, he will lose his services. With this gratification, I am sure you will regard the above statement as entirely fair.

Now there is more in that claim than remuneration to capital, and when we have separated that, we shall be able to judge truly of the nature of the claim. 1st. Risks. Now risk is justly chargeable. It could be met by a system of guarantee or assurance not open to the objections of our insurance system. We may therefore leave that out. Service in management of responsible and efficient agents is also justly chargeable. We may therefore leave that out. Now we have the naked claim of the capital vs. labor, which is a compensation to wealth for its mere use, over and above guarantee for risk, reward for services in administration, etc.

For a moment let us admit this claim, upon the only logical ground upon which it can stand. And then upon the same ground let us ask, whether the laborer should not be awarded for the capital which he employs? As quoted by the lecturer at your last meeting, later writers on political economy have seen fit to treat man as a part of the productive capital of a country. It has been estimated that every able-bodied man, arrived at mature strength, has cost society at least two or three thousand dollars.

We regret we have not room to give the whole of this practical, sensible lecture. The usual discussion by members of the Club followed its delivery.—[Ed. T. S.]

Friendly Correspondence.

S. K. TERRY, Orient, N. Y., writes: Please continue THE TRUTH SEEKER. It suits my digestion well.

B. F. Underwood writes from home: Your paper is making many friends in the West, I hope you are getting along well.

L. A. BARNETT, Greenup, Ill., writes: I have taken THE TRUTH SEEKER since it first started, but find my interest in it increases. It suits me to a scribe.

Dr. IRA W. RUSSELL, Keene, N. H., writes: May all the friends of liberal tendencies find it in their hearts to encourage and sustain you in the good work in which you are engaged.

CHARLES HYDE, Frankfort, N. Y., writes: I will take this occasion to give my hearty endorsement of your radical paper, which I think justly deserves to become the most popular organ of Free Thought in America. I hope ere long you will conclude to issue it weekly.

JOHN CLARK, Smithland, Ind., writes: Please add my name to the regular list. Three months as a trial subscriber has pleased me so well, that I do not think I can afford to do without your valuable sheet, THE TRUTH SEEKER. Let us have more light and more mental liberty.

WM. CHESTNUT, Ossawatimie, Kan., writes: Your readers here continue well pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER. In my opinion, your reply to Elder Shelton is well worth a year's subscription. Your articles on the Bible and Christianity are well written and very interesting.

MISS NELLIE EATON, Yakima City, Wash. Ter., writes: If our Liberal friends all knew what a treat it is to receive and read THE TRUTH SEEKER, they would not hesitate to subscribe for it. I feel as though I can hardly wait till it comes, and cannot think of doing without a single number. I will be very glad to have it a weekly.

ISAAC IVINS, Middlebury, Ind., writes: I have read the HEATHENS OF THE HEATH you sent me. I pronounce it one of the best books ever printed. The truth in it is quite equal to the romance. I think THE TRUTH SEEKER is one of the best and most scientific papers I ever met with, and I expect to be a subscriber as long as I live.

T. H. CALLAHAN, Buffalo, N. Y., writes: Credit me with the enclosed, and continue to send THE TRUTH SEEKER regularly. It has more practical common sense in it than nineteen out of twenty of the papers now published. I hope you will meet with success, and that your paper will become in due time a permanent, popular, and indispensable institution.

WM. Sisson, Port Hope, Ont., writes: I must say your reply to Elder Shelton is worth a year's subscription of itself. In penning it, you must have been in a rather happy mood to make so many good hits. Your Bible articles are wonderfully telling, and must satisfy any unbiased mind of the probability of the truth of such stories. On the whole, your paper is a real gem.

Mrs. L. HUTCHINSON, Bishop Creek, Cal., writes: Please send me eight copies of your discussion with Elder Shelton. There is much of the orthodox element here, and I wish to let in some light upon their dark and superstitious ideas of God, the laws of life and salvation. THE TRUTH SEEKER is getting to be a power in the land for good to the souls of all who dare to think for themselves.

J. F. RUGGLES, Bronson, Mich., writes: There is one thing I especially admire in THE TRUTH SEEKER: it is not afraid to puncture to the very quick the stupendous Beecher bubble. While other Liberal journals are playing "shy" of the matter you sail right in and tell the truth in good Anglo-Saxon language. I deeply regret that some Liberal papers should be so decidedly pro-Beecher in their insinuations.

M. W. St. JOHN, Cedar Falls, Iowa, in sending in the names to complete the list of twenty-five subscribers, he has sent us, writes: I wish your readers one and all on the fourth of July, would unite in an effort to obtain subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Let us all endeavor to, at least send the name of one new subscriber each, and thus help the good cause of leading our fellow men to a knowledge of the truth.

J. B. Cowen, Pierce city, Idaho, writes: The last mail brought the copy of THE HEATHENS OF THE HEATH you sent me. I think it the finest book I ever read as a historical romance. The author has no living equal in my estimation. Scattering such books amongst the reading public does more, I think, to open the eyes of the public than any kind of reading I know of. A person who reads it is bound to think if he has any brains at all.

E. S. Beckley, Toledo, Iowa, writes: Enclosed I send you a postal order for THE TRUTH SEEKER and the "Heathens of the Heath" for Benjamin Freet. He says he likes the paper so well he intends to take it as long as he lives, if it is published so long. We hope it will before long be changed to a Weekly. The orthodox begin to cry out "What shall we do to be saved from infidelity?" The Baptist convention recently assembled in Illinois came to the conclusion that they must meet the issue, and that they could no longer sneer down scepticism. Surely the world moves.

H. H. MORRISON, Green Castle, Ind., writes: I wish I had thousands of dollars to use in the Liberal cause. My heart is in the work. I live where a man is measured by his devotion to authority, blind superstition and intolerance. O the depths of the ignorance of the "good Christians" hereabouts. It is at once disgusting and discouraging to see their earnestness and honesty in their delusions. Some of them seem to believe all they profess, and others to care nothing for it at all. You have my sincerest wishes for your success and progress in all your undertakings. Count me a life subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER.

BRICK PALMER, Paradise Valley, Nevada, writes: I send you the name of one more convert to THE TRUTH SEEKER—one more poor soul turned from darkness into light. He has confessed his love and good wishes for the paper by placing $1.75 in my hands, and has gone on his way rejoicing, trusting he may find more of the same kind that are able and willing to do likewise. We liberated the negroes by one of the greatest wars ever known upon the earth. Let us now liberate the white man, woman and child from mental bondage and priestcraft, which is the worst bondage the world has known. Let us say to all who are in bonds: Flee from the bondage of the Church; shake off the chains of superstition; take and read THE TRUTH SEEKER; do good to your fellow-beings; feed the hungry, clothe the naked and assist your brothers and sisters of the great human family all that is possible.

MORRIS BARNES, P. M., Clay, N. Y., writes: I wish you to send me a lot of your Discussions with Elder Shelton as soon as they are out in tract form. I think they will be a good "eye-opener" for Bible skeptics. I have less faith in that old book every day. As fast as reason and common sense show its errors and absurdities, just so fast I lose confidence in it. How long will the people worship a fabulous God? As long as the priests are able to control the minds of the masses. THE TRUTH SEEKER has and will do more to emancipate the people from clerical bondage than more elaborate bound volumes, as it comes directly to the people, while bound volumes too often lay upon the table idle and unread. Go on, Brother, in your noble work. You shall have a seat with the "Heathen Philosophers" in another world.

M. P. ROSECRANS, Clear Lake, Iowa, writes: Our town is an orthodox village—has four churches in full blast, with a few Liberals that sometimes think but fear to speak, dreading the loss of business. Your paper is read by them privately and they admire your boldness and the invincibility of your arguments. I believe you and your paper are doing a good work, and one that will tell on the nation and people, long after you and I have passed out of mortal vision. You are starting a ripple that will spread on and on, and perhaps start other ripples and waves, until the sea of human life will be stirred and purified and settled, with naught to mar its brightness and glory, when the Ship of Life will be guided and steered by the rudder of reason into ports and harbors of safety. Go on, my brother, you will live to see the good results of your arduous labors. Though at present your undertaking may undoubtedly seem an unprofitable one, your medicine at length will act like a charm: the scales will drop from the eyes of the mentally blind, and as they see the glory and brightness of the world governed by law, not mystery, they will bless D. M. Bennett and his glorious little TRUTH SEEKER.

C. W. HALL, P. M., Rock Rapids, Iowa, writes: Your card is just received, and I do not stop a moment to enclose the "almighty" dollar for Vol. I. of THE TRUTH SEEKER; and oh how I wish I was able to give you money enough to support the paper, for it does seem the greatest blessing that can be bestowed upon man to roll back the dark pall of superstition that has so long covered the orthodox world with a cloud of thick darkness. What a mission to the heathen of orthodoxy and to ignorance. May it be abundantly sustained.

Writing later, he says: My Dear Sir, I am pleased, and so is every one that has seen your paper here, and if money was not so exceedingly scarce here, I could get you several subscribers; but we are in a "grass-hopper country," and the old foggy superstitious nannies think they are sent because people are so wicked, and are praying for their removal. O dear, I wish all the Elder Sheltons and "such like" had to eat grass-hopper pie until they could learn common sense. Here is the money for your paper. We wish to train in the same company with you while you are battling the monster superstitions and errors.

LEVI WOOD, Galesburg, Mich., writes: I must say I am well pleased, yes, highly delighted, with the controversy between yourself and the renowned Alabamian, Elder Shelton. Though the odds may be against you, though it may tax every fibre of your intellectuality to meet the lofty, powerful arguments of so learned an antagonist, keep up good courage, Brother Bennett. If perchance it should shatter your mentality, and you be obliged to resort to an asylum, we, the readers of your excellent paper, will raise a contribution to defray the expenses of the same. It appears that Elder Shelton is mistaken about some things. He estimates you to be a mean kind of a fellow, gray-headed, dirty, etc. He says you are not the first dirty fellow he has come in contact with; possibly he may be attracted by dirty things naturally, and all this because he thinks you have some ideas in the past been a preacher. Well, I believe—yes, I know—that sign does not always hold true, for I know of some very dirty, gray-headed old sinners that have never been preachers. Don't give up the ship, Bro. Bennett. We want the pro and con of this controversy. Agitation of thought is the beginning of wisdom. It is said "children and fools speak the truth." Elder S., doubtless, said what he considered to be truth according to his highest capacity. He will soon "blow off" his sulphuric gas, and it is to be hoped he will then feel easier.

A. WASHBURN, Euclid, N. Y., writes: My time as a trial subscriber having expired, I enclose you the price for a year. I do not want the paper discontinued. I am sure THE TRUTH SEEKER is doing good, even in this place, although the Church here has the people bound with the old fetters of superstition and error to a degree that is almost beyond hope; but yet there is hope for the young even here. The few Liberal minds we have are doing a good work, and they have made their power felt for the last two years to such a degree that the Church has been frightened to such extent that they have called on God to remove the offenders—a polite way of saying "we would take your lives if we had the power." Thanks to the power of Liberal thought, they have not. Within the last two years there have been two pow-wows called revivals by the Church. They continued about six weeks each. At the first one they got one man and two infants, at the last one they got never a starter. They say "it is the work of the Devil." Poor fellow, how he has to take it. A word to my Liberal friends. With but little trouble I have obtained four subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER. That is not much I confess, but I want every Liberal in the land to try and do better within the next thirty days. Come, here is a challenge, who will accept it? For the sake of mankind do not let this paper go down for the want of a few subscribers.

MANNING F. HUNT, Chaplin, Conn., writes: Enclosed I send you the price of THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year. I like it because it is so outspoken and fears not to tell the truth. I was formerly an agent to solicit subscriptions for the Boston Investigator as long ago as when it was published by Abner Kneeland; so I leave it for you to draw your own inferences whether I understand the baneful influences of priestcraft or not. Born and reared among them, I have had an opportunity to witness their infamous tricks, and I consider them a pack of base scoundrels—the black devils of the earth. They are lazy, idle drones, who devour the substance of hard laboring people, and make pastoral calls among the women, especially when their husbands are absent. They demand large salaries for their services in preaching from an old book called the Bible, a book which had its origin in the Dark Ages, and which contains nothing more nor less than a few relics of Paganism and Jewish idolatry. Is it not a shame that, in this Nineteenth Century, we should adopt such a book as a standard of truth and morality? Let a person write and publish such a book now, with the coarse vulgarity it contains, and he soon would be persecuted for obscenity. And this is what supports priestcraft. O shame, where is thy blush? I hope the time is not far distant when the light of science will dispel the mists of ignorance, priestcraft and superstition, and the human race be left free in the enjoyment of mental liberty.

THE BHAGAVAD-GITA;

Or, a Discourse on Divine Matters, between Krishna and Arjuna.

A SANSKRIT PHILOSOPHICAL POEM,TRANSLATED, WITH COPIOUS NOTES, AN INTRODUCTION ON SANSKRIT PHILOSOPHY, AND OTHER MATTERS.

BY J. COCKBURN THOMSON,

MEMBER OF THE ASIATIC SOCIETY OF FRANCE, AND OF THE ANTIQUARIAN SOCIETY OF NORMANDY.

This work contains curious details of the Manners, Customs, Mythology, Worship, etc., of the Hindus. The principal design of these dialogues seems to have been to unite all the prevailing modes of worship of those days; the Brahmins esteem it to contain all the grand mysteries of their religion, and have exercised particular care to conceal it from the knowledge of those of a different persuasion.

The spirit of the age prompts thoughtful people to inquire into the traditions of the past. In doing so, it is found that Mythology has played her part well. The traditions of the fathers have been systematized by thoughtful men, from time to time, in different ages of the world. Later generations have believed such traditions, so systematized, to be nothing less than divine commands. Imaginary gods have been constructed, to whom the world has paid homage and divine honors.

If we receive as truth all that is believed by credulous devotees, the world has had numerous incarnate deities.

Those who have been educated to belief in the Christian religion, and to regard the gentle Nazarene as the only Son of God, take a very limited view of the various religious systems of the present and of the past ages.

Among the incarnate deities that different systems of religion have recognized as having existed, through omnipotent love for fallen humanity, by the overshadowing of females of vestal purity, Krishna was a character as important in the Brahminical system of religion, as Christ is in the plan of salvation instituted by the Jews' Great Jehovah, believed in by Christians.

His coming was foretold, even as was Christ's.
At the age of sixteen Krishna began to preach, and was, like Christ, the founder of a new religion.

Prior to the great Chicago fire, the Religio-Philosophical Publishing House published the Bhagavad-Gita, from a translation of the Sanskrit by that celebrated scholar, Charles Wilkins. Nearly two editions of that work were sold when the fire-flood came and destroyed the stereotype plates. The demand for the work being so great, we were induced to send to England for a copy of a more recent translation, by J. Cockburn Thomson, member of the Asiatic Society of France, and the Antiquarian Society of Normandy.

The translator accompanied the work with copious notes, which are doubtless of more or less value, as explanatory of the text, but the reader will take them for just what they are worth—nothing more is expected.

The text, as correctly translated, contains gems of thought, transmitted from antiquity, which are of real intrinsic value to the thoughtful people of the age, and to them he work is most respectfully recommended by the American publisher.

PRESS COMMENTS ON THE BHAGAVAD-GITA:

"More than ordinary care and trouble have been spent upon this work. It is in every way creditable to the scholarship and enterprise of the west."—Inter-Ocean.

"This curious volume purports to give a full and accurate compilation of the tenets taught by Krishna. The text contains many brilliant thoughts, well worth the attention of the thoughtful student of history, literature or science."—Our Fireside Friend.

This translation of a Hindoo poem, dedicated by Mr. Thomson to his sometime instructor, Professor Wilson of Oxford, is one of a class of works demanding all the consideration and assistance that scholars everywhere can afford. It belongs to a class of books believed by great numbers of our fellow-men to have been supernaturally inspired, and trusted by them for their guidance in the ways of this life, and for light to pierce the dividing darkness between death and a future existence. No such book can, in the nature of things, have been thus esteemed by rational beings without having in itself much that is intrinsically valuable for comfort and instruction in righteousness, or at least, considered at its lowest, much that is curious and suggestive, as affording insight into the desires and needs of the souls that found therein their bread and water of life."—Overland Monthly.

"This is an unusually interesting publication. Mr. Thomson has rendered good service to the more thoughtful class of readers. There is a peculiar charm about ancient literature of the profounder sort. The old Hindoos were an intellectual people.
The poem before us is probably older than the time formerly fixed in Christian chro-nology for the creation of the world. It breathes a lofty spirit of unselfish devotion to good objects. We cannot refrain from complimenting the Religio-Philosophical Publishing House, upon giving to the public so excellent a book."
"A rare work from the ancient Sanskrit, in which will be found many of the religious ideas and notions which the Christian Church adopted long after. . . . It contains some 275 pages, printed on beautiful paper, and richly bound. . . . It is profusely supplied with notes, definitions, and explanations."—Truth Seeker.

"This is a rare book, which sheds more light upon the subjects of which it treats than any we have ever read. We heartily recommend it to those who wish to look into antiquity in regard to the religious views of a most remarkable people."—Samuel Watson, D.D., Editor Spiritual Magazine.

superior manner, being printed on heavy tinted paper, and bound in extra heavy cloth with richly illuminated back, borders and side title.

A NEW BOOK. THE Doctrine of Descent AND DARWINISM.

By PROF. OSCAR SCHMIDT, of the University of Strasburgh.

This is No. 13 of Appleton's International Scientific Series, and is not excelled by any one of its fellows, and is richly worthy the perusal of every enquiring mind. It is a work of 334 pages, 12 mo., and contains twenty-six illustrations. It is an elaborate review and survey of the whole subject of Evolution and Darwin's special philosophy, giving in clear language a comprehensive view of the subject.

It is eminently a whole library in one volume, and we recommend it in the highest terms. Sent by mail. Price, $1.50; postage, 15 cts. Address,

THE Boston Investigator!

THE OLDEST REFORM JOURNAL
IN THE UNITED STATES

Will commence its 45th year April 18, 1875
PUBLISHED EVERY WEDNESDAY

at 84 Washington street, Boston, Mass., by JOSIAH P. MENDUM.

HORACE SEAVER, Editor.

PRICE: $3.50 per annum. Single copies, 7 cents. Specimen copies sent on receipt of a Two-Cent Stamp to pay the postage.

The Investigator is devoted to the Liberal cause in religion; or, in other words, to Universal Mental Liberty. Independent in all its discussions, discarding superstitious theories of what never can be known it devotes its columns to things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who have entered its unknown shores. Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interest of this world, it confines itself to things of this life entirely. It will soon commence its Forty-fifth year and asks for support from those who are fond of sound reasoning, good reading, reliable news, anecdotes, science, art, and a useful Family Journal. Reader, please send your subscriptions for six months or one year; and if you are not satisfied with the way the Investigator is conducted, we won't ask you to continue with us any longer. Now is the time to subscribe.

WHY is a schoolmistress like the letter C? Because she makes classes of lasses.

DETROIT has a firm entitled Wood & Cole, which ought to be engaged in the fue business.

"YOUR son died rather suddenly yesterday of throat disease," is what an Idaho sheriff wrote to a fond mother in Indiana the other day.

THERE is a phrenologist in London who can tell the contents of a barrel by examining its head. He makes his examinations with a gimlet.

THE Spaniards say: At eighteen, marry your daughter to her superior; at twenty, to her equal; but at thirty, to anybody who will have her.

A SCOTCH divine recently praying, said: "O Lord, give us neither riches nor poverty," and pausing solemnly a moment, he added, "especially poverty."

A CORRESPONDENT of a Western paper having described the Ohio as a "sickly stream," the editor appended the remark: "That's so—it is confined to its bed."

A MINNESOTA minister, who said that the grasshoppers were a plague sent to punish the Grangers, is coming East to find another pulpit. They couldn't believe him.

"WELL, Pat, Jim didn't quite kill you with the brick bat, did he?" "No; but I wish he had." "Why so?" "So that I could have seen him hung, the villain."

A RED nosed gentleman asked a wit whether he believed in spirits. "Ay, sir," replied he, looking him in the face, "I see too much evidence before me to doubt it."

A NEGRO woman in Pitt country, N. C., recently gave birth to triplets: the first was white, the second mulatto, and the third black. This all comes from Civil Rights.

"OH, John! Drunk again," sobbed his wife, as he returned from a midnight spelling school. "N-n-o-t so, Elizabeth," he replied. "It's only the bird singing in my heart. That's all."

THE Boston Advertiser has found a loyal Indian who will not steal and who doesn't drink whiskey. He is at present occupying a prominent position in front of a cigar stand.

A BRIDE in Indiana, after the conclusion of the marriage ceremony stepped gracefully forward and requested the clergyman to give out the hymn: "This is the way I long have sought."

"WELL, I always make it a rule to tell my wife everything that happens." "Oh, my dear fellow, that's nothing," replied his friend; "I tell my wife lots of things that never happen at all."

AN experienced Sunday school teacher says that it is impossible for a scholar with a boil, to satisfactorily fasten his mind down even upon the simplest exposition of the scheme of salvation.

"Well, my boy," asked a gentleman of a little eight-year-old boy, "what are you crying for?" "Cause I can't find dad. I told the old fool if he went off too far he'd lose me," was the filial reply.

A MAN who pretended to have seen a ghost was asked what the ghost said to him? "How could I understand," replied the narrator, "what he said, I am not skilled in any of the dead languages!"

AT a teachers' institute in Ohio recently a lady teacher was given the word "hazardous" to spell and define, and did it in this style: "H-a-z, has-a-r-d ard-e double s ess—hazardess, a female hazard,

A WESTERN girl laughs at the idea that a woman cannot live comfortably with her mother-in-law, and advertises for some good looking young fellow to give her the chance to try the experiment.

A SILLY fellow whose ears were unusually large, once smirkingly asked a witty lady, "Will I not make a fine angel?" "Well, no," she replied, pointing to his ears, "I think your wings are too high."

JOHN FRODE is no more. You probably didn't know him. He lived in western Missouri, and on entering the smoke-house of a friend to see how the hams got along, a trap-gun blew his head off.

At a printers' festival, lately, the following toast was offered: "Woman—second only to the Press in the dissemination of news." The ladies are not yet decided whether to regard this as a compliment or otherwise.

UPON the death of her husband, the lady married his brother, and when a friend saw the portrait of the first husband in the house, he said, "Is this a member of your family?" "It is my poor brother-in-law," she said.

A CLEVELAND woman recently married a Chinese laundryman, and three days thereafter the unhappy Celestial appeared at a barber's shop and ordered his pigtail cut off, saying in explanation, "Too muchee dam yank."

AN Irish peasant being asked why he permitted his pig to take up his quarters with his family, made an answer abounding with satirical naïveté: "Why not? Doesn't the place afford every convenience that a pig can require?"

A COLORED gentleman went to consult one of the most high toned lawyers in Boston, and after stating his case, said: "Now I knows you's a lawyer, but I wish you would please sar, jiss tell me the truff 'bout dat matter."

HERE is sympathy for you. A woman in the city bit her tongue off in a very unaccountable way the other day; and now her husband goes home two hours earlier than usual every night. Husbands cut this out and show it to your wives.

THE Brooklyn Argus says that ever since people heard that it is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven they have all been anxious to get rich, so as to encourage the camel.

"We read in de good book," says a colored Baptist brother down South, "of John de Baptist—neber of John de Methodist." And that, says a Charleston correspondent of the New York Observer, is the reason most of the colored Southern people are Baptists.

A GERMAN peddler sold a man a liquid for the extermination of bugs. "And how do you use it?" inquired the man after he had bought it. "Ketch to bug, and drop von little drop into his mout," answered the peddler. "The deuce you do!" exclaimed the purchaser. "I could kill it in half that time by stamping on it." "Vell," exclaimed the German, "dat is a good vay, too."

THUS wrote a fond attendant of spelling matches:

I want to be a speler

A Webster in mi han.

There right before the awgence
So gorgus and so brite,
He wrasels with the big words
From mornin until night.

A PLAIN spoken preacher delivered the following from his desk: "I would announce to the congregation that probably by mistake, there was left at the meeting house this morning a small cotton umbrella, much damaged by time and wear, and of an exceedingly pale blue color, in place whereof was taken a very large black silk umbrella of great beauty. Blunders of this sort, my brethren, are getting a little too common."

ROCHESTER has prohibited religious exercises of any nature in its public schools. Good for Rochester.

REV. A. W. TORREY of the M. E. Church of Kalamazoo, Mich., has been tried by the church for falsehood, and found guilty.

The last bid for notoriety by the Rev. Henry Morgan of Boston is an offer of $200 for the best essay on "Why men don't go to church."

A NEW BOOK is soon to be published concerning Lord Byron and his Dulcinea the Countess Guiccoli, in which very favorable things will be told of this loving couple.

THE AGRICULTURAL LABORER'S UNION of England is not getting along prosperously. Dissensions, inharmonious and incompetent officers appear to be the difficulty. They have fallen off twenty-five per cent. in numbers.

THE papers report that Robert Dale Owen has become insane. It is feared Katie King was too much for him.
It is to be regretted that so clear an intellect as he has had for scores of years should meet such a fate.

MR. CONRAD, of Cumberland Co., Pa., member of the church, has just been arrested for incest with his daughter, who is soon to become a mother. The country round about is much excited at the unnatural crime.

A SWARM of grasshoppers moving at the rate of fifteen miles an hour occupied sixty hours in passing over a town in Missouri, and was estimated to be from thirty to seventy miles wide and a half a mile deep.

A NEW coloring matter called essin has been introduced into commerce. It was first produced by Caro at the Baden aniline works, and named by him, on account of its beautiful color, after the Greek "eos," the red of the morning dawn.

At Middletown, Del., an immense peach refrigerator is to be built, capable of holding 200,000 baskets of fruit, which the projector guarantees to keep by a peculiar freezing process for six months. Won't it be fine to have peaches the year round?

ROWELL'S Newspaper Directory has come out with statistics showing the number of newspaper failures during the past year. It records the demise of one thousand journals in that time, and the disappearance in their ruins of over $8,000,000.

THE Khedive of Egypt is searching the monasteries and mosques of his dominions for manuscripts to form a library at Cairo. He is said to have obtained thirty different manuscripts of the Koran, and among them one computed to be 1,150 years old.

A CLERGYMAN HELD FOR TRESPASS.—Cold Spring, N. Y., May 17.—The Rev. Benjamin F. Bowen, of this village, was to-day held to bail for his appearance at the next County Court, on a charge of malicious trespass in forcing open the church door after it was closed and locked by the trustees.

THE REV. MR. COLEMAN, of the M. E. church in East Janesville circuit, in Bremer county, Iowa, is under $5,000 bonds for committing a rape on a girl thirteen years old. Nice men, these divines.

SPIRITUALISM has found a new field in Russia, where it has made several converts among men of standing.
These men have published their belief, and of course the consequence is a numerous following. Home and several other mediums are living in St. Petersburg, where the simplest forms of "manifestation"—rappings and table-tippings—are exciting great wonderment.

RARE MUNIFICENCE.—Plymouth church, at an evening meeting on the 7th inst., voted Mr. Beecher the munificent sum of $100,000—twenty thousand dollars salary and eighty thousand towards defraying the expenses of the Adultery Suit. Their generosity and their devotion to their pastor are unbounded. Whether he is guilty of adultery or not, whether he is guilty of perjury or not, they are determined to stick to him "through thick and thin."

It is recommended that the pestiferous grasshoppers be used as food. They are said to make a fine dish when properly prepared, and have been used for food by many.
One John the Baptist is said to have lived upon them for some time, the locust and grasshopper being nearly identical.
It is said snails and caterpillars are regarded as excellent food by some people, and why not grasshoppers?
Perhaps that is the best way to get even with the miserable plagues.

REV. MR. PARSHALL, of Oakland, Cal., was a few months ago tried by a church council for lascivious conduct with some of the sisters of his congregation. He was convicted and left town. This circumstance has led to disreputable conduct on the part of a member of the church, named P. H. Sumner, who, it seems, organized a conspiracy to further injure the pastor, by pretending an attempt was made, at his instigation, to assassinate him. Really, it is very difficult to see wherein Christians are any better than sinners.

THOMAS A. EDISON, of Newark, N. J., not yet thirty years old, is probably one of the most thorough electricians of the age. He has for ten years been almost constantly experimenting in telegraphy and electrical experiments. He has made many discoveries and improvements of value in the telegraphic art.
He has succeeded in recording 3,000 words per minute by telegraph and in transmitting four distinct messages in different directions at the same time over a single wire. Thus while it is satisfactorily demonstrated that two trains cannot safely meet and pass each other on a single track, it seems the electrical currents can. Mr. Edison estimates that the time required for the current to pass from Valencia in Ireland to Heart's Content in Newfoundland, was less than the hundredth part of a second, thus proving if a continuous wire encircled the globe, the current could make the entire circuit in one-quarter of a second.

THE BEECHER ADULTERY TRIAL after enduring the frosts and storms of the chief part of Winter, the fitful weather of Spring and the sweltering heat of the first Summer month has at length terminated. The jury after deliberating seven days became thoroughly convinced they could never agree, being divided on the final vote, three for Tilton and nine for Beecher; though on earlier ballots the result had been different, sometimes four for Tilton, sometimes five, sometimes six and once seven. The result is what thousands anticipated, and when the immense wealth, power and influence of Plymouth Church are considered, the finale is probably all that could reasonably be expected. True, the consequence will be a lessening of confidence in trial by jury, indicating that at a day not far distant another way of settling legal questions and litigations will have to be adopted. It is pretty clear there were some men on that jury whom no evidence of Mr. Beecher's guilt could convince. Some have even declared they were "Beecher men from the start," and could not be made to believe in his guilt. Again, they were all Christians, and they deemed it necessary the Church and the cause should be spared the odium of its most prominent pastor being decided guilty of such a charge. It is probably the first instance on record where the oath of an accused culprit, in his own defense, has been found sufficient to set aside the positive testimony of three or four, or five, first-class, unimpeached, intelligent witnesses. This is a conclusive proof of the immense power of money and influence. Mr. Beecher is triumphantly sustained by his church and congregation, which will probably increase his salary five thousand dollars, and he will continue to deal out bread and wine as the body and blood of God, and desecrate upon his extreme love for Jesus, and the great intimacy between God and himself. If the Christian Church lends herself to excuse and sustain adulterous and perjured clergymen, she must be classed among the abominations of the earth.

THIRTEEN REASONS WHY HENRY WARD BEECHER MUST BE GUILTY.

1. Because his letters put in evidence in the trial cannot be rationally explained on any other hypothesis than that he had committed adultery with Elizabeth R. Tilton.
 2. Because his letter of contrition, especially, either means adultery or it means nothing.
 3. Because his conduct from the beginning of the scandal up to his appearance as a defendant in court, is the conduct of a guilty man, and not the conduct of an innocent man.
 4. Because he paid $7,000 to Moulton "to keep Tilton quiet," and mortgaged his house to raise the money.
 5. Because during all those years when a single manly declaration from him, "I am innocent!" would, if it were true, have ended the whole scandal, he never once said that he was innocent; and though sore pressed to say that he was not guilty, he declined even to say that; and in fact never would say it till he was brought to bay in court, and compelled to speak.
 6. Because when Dr. Storrs wrote to him telling him that he had learned of the scandal, professing faith in his innocence, and desiring to render him service, he refrained from replying, and did not as much as say: "I am innocent. God bless you for your belief in my innocence."
 7. Because when Mrs. Bradshaw wrote him an affectionate letter, imploring him for God's sake to tell her he was innocent, he positively refused to answer, and instead of giving the desired assurance, begged her to join with him in keeping silence.
 8. Because when his sister, Mrs. Hooker, proposed to him that she should go into his pulpit and read to his people his confession of his guilt, he put her off with devices and evasions, but refused to say even to her that he was innocent.
 9. Because he did not dare to produce Elizabeth R. Tilton on the witness stand in the trial, when the plaintiff offered him the opportunity of so doing.
 10. Because Elizabeth R. Tilton has not only confessed in writing that she and Beecher were guilty of this sin and crime, but has confessed to several persons orally, namely, to Mrs. Bradshaw, before mentioned; to Mr. and Mrs. Richards, her brother and sister-in-law; to Florence Tilton, her daughter; and notably to Miss Susan B. Anthony, to whom the confession was made in her own house after an angry quarrel with her husband, during which Miss Anthony protected her against the fury of her husband.
 11. Because Mrs. Moulton has sworn that Beecher repeatedly confessed to her his adultery with Elizabeth R. Tilton; and nothing has been adduced to shake her credibility.
 12. Because Theodore Tilton and Francis D. Moulton, in their testimony, which likewise remains unshaken, confirm and corroborate all these different kinds and facts of evidence.
 13. Because all the undisputed, admitted facts comport with his guilt, while forty-nine fiftieths of them cannot, without being twisted out of all shape, be made to comport with his innocence.
- For these reasons Henry Ward Beecher must be held to be guilty. Guilty of adultery, guilty of lying, guilty of perjury, guilty of treachery to every man and woman who trusted him.—N. Y. Sun.

The Pro and Con of Supernatural Religion; or,

An Answer to the Question: Have We a Supernaturally Revealed, Infallibly Inspired and Miraculously Attested Religion in the World?

BY E. E. GUILD.

PART IV.

Particular Remarks on the Supernatural Origin of Christianity, and Statement of the Views of Rationalists on Inspiration, Revelation, and Religion.

The Epistles usually attributed to Paul are his genuine writings, except that to the Hebrews. This latter was written by some learned Jew, who was a convert to Christianity. The authors of these epistles were to a great extent the real founders of Christianity, i. e., in the form in which it exists in the creeds of the various Christian sects. The doctrines of these creeds are based more on these epistles (not always correctly interpreted, to be sure), than on the teachings of Christ recorded in the four Gospels. To these epistles we are indebted for the origin of the doctrines of the Fall, Original Sin, Total Depravity, Predestination, Election and Reprobation, Miraculous Change of Nature, Vicarious Atonement and Universal Salvation, by Christ.

The difficulty to account for the origin of Christianity, without supposing it to have been established by supernatural and miraculous means I fully appreciate. The problem was to me a puzzle and a mystery for years. It was only after long and diligent research and investigation, that I was able to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion. I have been abundantly rewarded for my pains. It is now clear to me that it is no more difficult to account for the origin of Christianity than for the origin of Brahminism in India, Confucianism in China, Parseeism in Persia, Mohammedanism in Turkey, or Mormonism in the United States.

We will state what are the main facts bearing on the question, and the conclusions to be deduced from these facts. Modern criticism has proved, so far as the nature of the case admits of proof,

1. That the five books of the Old Testament, commonly attributed to Moses, were not written by him, but were compiled hundreds of years after his death, partly from some fragments left by him and others, and partly from oral tradition.

2. The other books of the Old Testament are made up of partly genuine, and partly spurious writings.

3. The Gospels were not written by the Evangelists to whom they are ascribed—i. e., in the form in which we now have them—but were compiled after the death of their reported authors, partly from records left by them, to which many additions were made derived from oral tradition.

4. Notwithstanding, the Bible contains many valuable and important truths, noble and sublime sentiments, excellent moral precepts and many beauties, we are not warranted to believe that they had any other than a perfectly natural origin.

5. The numerous mistakes, errors, contradictions, inconsistencies and absurdities contained in the Bible, justify us in believing that it is not an infallible standard of truth, not authoritative in its teachings, not the product of supernatural inspiration, and that nothing is to be believed simply because it is taught in that book.

6. The several books of the Old and New Testament were compiled, collected and published in two separate volumes by fallible men, who acted without any direct divine sanction or authority.

7. Christianity is not a supernaturally revealed and inspired religion, miraculously authenticated, but is a natural product of the human mind; the result of long ages of progress and development of religious thought and ideas.

Without doubt many of the marvelous stories recorded in the Bible had a historic basis, but they were not recorded at the time the events are said to have occurred, but long after, and at a time when the original facts had become greatly exaggerated. The compiler and writer believed them to be true, and they obtained ready evidence among a people who were very ignorant, very credulous, full of the belief in supernaturalism, and ready to endorse anything that tended to glorify their nation or their religion.

Nevertheless, there is in the books both of the Old and New Testaments quite an element of pious fraud and imposition. Almost all history is written in the interest of a nation, party or sect, Bible history not excepted. A comparison of the books of kings and chronicles, shows that the latter was written in the interest of the kingdom of Judah, and with a view to glorify David the great Theocratic king. Hence, it omits all mention of some of the worst acts of David, and represents him to have been a peculiar and exceptional favorite of heaven. The book of kings is far more candid and impartial, and tells the whole truth about the personal character of David and the doings of his kingdom. Between these two books there are other conflicting statements which no ingenuity has succeeded in reconciling.

The gospels—however blind some may be to the fact—bear internal evidence of having been written in a partisan spirit and with a polemic aim. The first and third gospels especially, were written to prove that Christ was the true Jewish Messiah. To prove this, they relied mainly on establishing that he possessed miraculous powers. Hence, they exaggerated purely natural occurrences into miracles, and collected and recorded all the wild and extravagant legends that had descended to their day and with which the air was filled. In order to make it appear that Christ answered to the description of the Jewish Messiah contained in the Old Testament, who, it was supposed, must be a descendant of David, they related the silly, ridiculous and absurd legend relating to his miraculous birth; a story which defeats its own object, inasmuch, as if it proves anything, it is, that he was in no wise a blood relation of that personage. Besides, the legend is self contradictory, and contains many genealogical mistakes and errors. In order to prove that he was a subject of prophecy, they quote and apply to him passages which have no more relation to him than to Josephus, or any other man conspicuous in Jewish history of that time.

The fourth gospel was written to prove not only that Christ was Messiah, but that he had a pre-existence and answered to the Logos of Plato. It is the production of an Alexandrine Christian, who sought to blend the philosophy of Plato with Christianity, and thereby commend it to the favor of the Pagan philosophers. This book, the writings of Paul, and the epistle to the Hebrews, constitute the first great departure from the simplicity of the teachings of Christ, which finally culminated in the establishment of that particular form of Christianity known as Catholicism. Let it be remembered that at the time when these books were written it was an almost universally received maxim, that it was right to lie for the truth, and to deceive those who require to be deceived. Nothing was more common than to forge books and ascribe their authorship to distinguished persons in order to give them authority among the common people. We may state, also, that of all the miracles recorded in the Bible not one was ever submitted to a scientific test.

The early history of every nation is a mixture of truth and falsehood, fact and fiction, legend and tradition. Even our own early history is by no means entirely destitute of the mythologic element. How much more is this true of Jewish history and of the history of Christianity?

The whole superstructure of supernatural Christianity is made to rest by Paul on the fact of the resurrection of Christ from the dead. Now, that this alleged fact is intrinsically improbable no one will deny. It ought, then to be sustained by the most unimpeachable testimony, the most indubitable evidence; but we have not the direct testimony of a single eye witness of the event. Not one of the New Testament writers says he was present and saw him rise. The four different accounts of the affair are conflicting. The only points in which they agree, are: first, that Christ's body was laid in the tomb of a man who was a friend to him; and second, that when the tomb was visited on Sunday morning the body was not there; both of which statements we can very readily believe, without supposing that the body was dead when placed there, or that a man who was really dead had been restored to life. It is much easier to believe that the body was in a state of swoon, from which it was restored and afterwards released from the tomb; or, that if dead, the body was taken away by secret friends and kept out of sight. We have plenty of witnesses who say "he was seen alive" after his crucifixion; but not one who says, I saw him, except Paul, and he only in a vision. I need not say that such testimony is not within the rules of evidence, nor that it would not be admitted to prove anything in a court of justice, especially so astounding an occurrence as the resurrection of a dead man to life and his subsequent ascension into heaven.

There is much better evidence to prove that miracles equally astounding as any recorded in the Bible, were wrought in the second, third and fourth centuries of the Christian era. For, in the latter case, we have the testimony of hundreds of persons, and among them, no less than nine Bishops of the Church who affirm in the most solemn manner that they saw these miracles wrought. And even in our own day—if we can credit human testimony on this subject—the world is full of miracles. In our own country—the most enlightened in the world—within the past half century, we have seen a Matthias persuading otherwise intelligent men to believe, not only that he was a prophet of the Lord, but that he was the very and eternal God himself. We have witnessed the rise of a sect of Religionists who have sent their apostles to every civilized nation on the globe; making converts in each, and basing their claims mainly on the possession of miraculous powers. We have seen another sect arise, claiming, not miraculous powers to be sure, but extraordinary gifts of healing, prophecy, inspiration, direct revelation, etc., and they have made more converts in thirty years than Christianity did in three centuries. The power to work miracles has always been claimed by the Catholic Church, and the same claim is made by the Mormon Church. We have the testimony under oath of living men who certify that they were eye witnesses of the miracles said to have been wrought by Joe Smith, the founder of the Mormon Church. And that Church, too, claims to have a book containing a supernatural and miraculous revelation from God. If such things can be in this age of the world, what might not have been done eighteen hundred years ago?

But, we shall be told—as we have been thousands of times—that to the Bible we are indebted for our civilization, refinement of manners, elevation of character, and for the progress of science and the arts. I greatly marvel that an argument for the supernatural origin of the Bible, should be based on this ground. The facts do not sustain it. Civilization existed before the Bible was known. The Hebrew Bible did not elevate the Jews in the scale of civilization above the Pagan nations around them did not make them any less cruel, treacherous nor inhuman; nor any more honest or faithful. It did not prevent them from carrying on a war of invasion against the inhabitants of Canaan, and on the plea that they were idolaters, and therefore, abhorred of God, making an indiscriminate slaughter of all who would not submit to their authority and give up to them their possessions. It did not prevent a civil war among them, nor the establishment of two separate kingdoms, between which an almost incessant war was carried on for hundreds of years. It did not hinder them from siding with the priests in their antagonism to the prophets, nor from persecuting these, the best men of their nation "from city to city." In spite of the Bible, they set up in both kingdoms that very idolatry which they came there ostensibly to destroy. It did not save them from being proved haughty, dictatorial, exclusive and domineering; nor did its influence stay the hand of vengeance against Jesus Christ, the greatest living teacher of his time.

In our time, to the Hebrew Bible, we have super-added the Christian Bible, the latter supposed to be an improvement on the other. Both are bound in the same volume and we have the influence of both. We shall speak of it as one. That its influence has been salutary in many respects we very cheerfully grant; but we claim that this is owing not to its being accepted as a supernatural revelation, but to the plain, practical, and common sense moral truths which it contains. It is these that give it its vitality and its hold on the veneration and love of mankind. It is these that have saved it from oblivion. Instead of its having been a great instrument in promoting science and civilization, the car of human progress has rolled on, and science and civilization have prospered in spite of its influence. Scarcely a scientific truth has been discovered, or a reform proposed that has not been opposed by the whole weight and power of the Church, which is the depository of the Bible. The Church opposed the doctrines of modern astronomers and geologists and philosophers, until the advanced opinions of the people compelled it to relax somewhat. In the incipient stages of the temperance and anti-slavery reforms, the Church arrayed itself against them. And how is it with Christian nations as compared with others not Christian? Are they any more faithful to their treaties than the Turks? Any more peaceable than the Chinese, the Japanese, or the Hindoos? I hesitate not to say, that in all the records of knavery and cruelty we shall search in vain to find a parallel to the frauds, cruelties, inhumanities and enormities that have been perpetrated by men who professed to receive the Bible as a revelation from God, and to be guided by its precepts. Witness the treachery to his own kindred, the fratricidal and matricidal murders of Constantine, the first Christian emperor, whose private character was even worse than that of Caligula or Nero. Remember the persecutions of each other of the two great branches of the Church, viz: the Catholic and Protestant, carried on for years and involving the destruction of millions of human lives. Think of the horrors of the massacre on St. Bartholomew's day. Call to mind the history of the Inquisition, that terrible engine of destruction which existed during five centuries; during which every possible engine of torture that ingenuity could invent, was employed to inflict suffering and death on the bodies and minds of innocent persons. Recollect the thirty years religious wars in Germany, the numerous wars that have been carried on in Europe by the Christian kings and princes of that country; notice the treatment of the natives of this country by their Christian conquerors, the stupendous frauds that were practised upon them, and the vices that were introduced among them; see the Christian government of England deriving a large revenue from India by taxing the inhabitants for the privilege of worshipping Jugernaut; see her send her missionaries of the gospel, and her men of war into the ports of China compelling the inhabitants to accept her missionaries and buy her opium, under the penalty of having their cities bombarded and their lives destroyed by the murderous cannon. Look now to our country and reflect on our late war, carried on by fellow-Christians and fellow-countrymen. How terrible the conflict, how fierce the combatants, what woe, what sorrow, what desolation, what destruction of property and life; and yet the two contending parties were cheered on, and sometimes led by men who, not only believed in the Bible, but professed to be the ordained teachers of the gospel of the Prince of Peace, whose mission to our world they admitted to be a mission of peace and good will to men. Instances have been known of clergymen appealing to the Bible to sanction the greatest of outrages, even the seduction of youth and innocence.

When I reflect on the crimes against humanity, I am led to exclaim, are these the actions of men, or is the idea true that infernals have assumed the shape and appeared in the guise of men? Where, in all the history of the world, is there a parallel to these enormities? Do the Pagan nations persecute, destroy and war with each other on account of their religion? Do men of science, philosophers, and so called Infidels war upon each other on account of their differences of opinion? But if they do not, why not? Simply, because they do not believe that the interest of religion can be promoted by striking down the liberty of thought and speech, and the right of every human being to believe whatever approves itself to his judgment. They are the friends of free toleration, freethought, free investigation, free discussion and the liberty of the human mind.

The believers in Bible supernaturalism claim—as all supernaturalists claim—that they have a God-ordained priesthood, whose function it is, by precept and example, to lead men to the practice of every virtue. But what has been the history of priests in all countries and in all ages? Are they exempt from the vices against which they declaim? Are they any less selfish, mercenary lovers of the good things of this world and of the indulgence of their passions than the average of other men? I shrink from the task of detailing the horrors of their record. I hesitate not to say that no class of educated professional men but what can show a cleaner record. The labors, investigations, discoveries and disclosures of lawyers, physicians and scientists have been of incalculable benefit to the world. But the priests, what have they done? They have filled the world with piles on piles of books, pamphlets and tracts, filled with the silliest nonsense and trash. Priestcraft and kingcraft are twin brothers, they act in harmony and concert together; they have filled the world with carnage and blood ever since the organization of human society; they have robbed men by confiscation of more property than all other robbers; filched more money out of men's pockets by frauds in dealing in the relics and rotten bones of saints and martyrs than all other thieves; caused more human suffering and tears, made more widows and orphans than all other human causes combined; they have inflicted more tortures than all other savages, and destroyed more lives than all other murderers. The Jewish priesthood began with Aaron, who manufactured an idol in the shape of a golden calf for the people to worship, and then told a deliberate falsehood in order to hide his iniquity. It ended in the crucifixion of Christ. The example of Aaron has been imitated by multitudes of his successors; the priests were denounced and their time-serving policy exposed by the prophets, and in their official capacity they were scorned and condemned by the teacher, Christ. Everywhere they have proved themselves to be tyrants over the human mind, intolerant, opposed to human progress, unless in the direction marked out by them, and dealing out damnation to every one who dares to dissent from their opinions, or question their authority. In fine, they have in some instances "exalted themselves above all that can be called God or is worshiped," and in other cases assumed to be the vicegerents of God on earth, the only medium through which God's blessings could flow to mankind.

It is in no carping spirit that these statements are made, nor with any desire to slander, abuse or wound a single human being. These are not the sayings of a mad man. Sincerely do I wish that I could say in all honesty and truth, that they are false; but they are truths, every one, and being so, are necessary to my argument. I now appeal to the reader, and ask him to lay his hand upon his heart and answer me. Have we not a right to expect from a people claiming a God-given revelation, constituting an infallible guide, a God-ordained Church, and a God-appointed ministry better things than these? Do not the facts, then, prove that the arrogant claims and pretensions of these men ought to be discarded by every rational man?

I may be asked if I thus impeach all of the clergy? By no means; God forbid that I should make so false and foolish a charge. No, the question has two sides, and I have been speaking on one side only and in general terms. I am by no means insensible to the fact that there are among the believers in supernaturalism, both of the clergy and laity, some as good men as ever existed; some of them I number on my list of choicest friends, around whom are entwined my heart's best affections. To the credit and honor of human nature I am glad and proud to say that the priesthood and the Church have produced many as noble specimens of humanity as ever dignified and adorned our race; men as wise, as great, and good as any other; But what I claim is that they are not good because they believe as they do, but they are made so by reason of their natural character, dispositions and superior cultivation and development. They are good Christians. They would have been good Muselmans, or Hindoos, or Deists, or Free Religionists. We have good men outside of the Church as well as in it; good men of all forms of religion; good men of all sects and of no sect. Men we have, good as any who have no faith whatever in any form of supernaturalism. They are good, not because they are unbelievers, but for the reason mentioned before.

Nor am I blind to the beauties of the Bible; but if it contains beauties, it also contains deformities. If it fills the minds of some with the most comforting hopes, it fills the minds of others with the most tormenting and distressing fears. If to some it imparts joy and peace, to others it imparts sorrow and gloom; if it makes some happy, it makes others miserable. The eloquent Saurin, a French divine, admitted that it had the effect on him to make "food insipid, society irksome, and life itself a cruel bitter." The influence of the book, then, in the one direction neutralizes its influence in the other. We can conserve all its good influence and prevent the bad by abandoning our belief in its authority and infallibility.

If we reject the Bible in this sense, do we reject the idea of the existence of any such thing as revelation and inspiration? Far from it. But we claim, that "it is not necessary for God to speak in an audible voice in order to reveal himself and make his will known." And we affirm that ever since men took it into their heads to make him speak, each one makes him speak in his own way and say what he thinks he ought to say. Our book of Revelation includes the Bible and all other books. It is the volume of nature. God reveals himself in the laws and phenomena of nature, and in the powers and faculties of the human soul. He speaks to us in the sun and moon; in every star that shines in the blue vault above; in the globe which we inhabit; in the great ocean of waters; in every lake and pond; in every river, rivulet and spring; in the mountains, hills and plains; in every spire of grass; in every plant and shrub and tree that grows; in every flower that blooms; in every shower of rain; in storms and Tempests; in volcanoes and earthquakes; in the lightning and thunder; in every movement of the mind; in every feeling and emotion of the heart; in every sensation we experience; in every object that meets the eye, and in every sound that greets the ear.

As to inspiration, we believe as the Bible teaches, that "there is a spirit in man, and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth him understanding." We cannot believe that for a period of four thousand years, God confined his gifts of revelation and inspiration to a comparatively small nation of people inhabiting an insignificant portion of the earth, to the entire neglect of all the rest of mankind. We regard such an idea as too monstrous a reflection on his character—an impeachment of his partiality and goodness. God's sunshine and rain descends upon all; why should not his blessings of revelation and inspiration? Yes, we believe in inspiration, but it is universal. All are inspired, but not all in the same degree; some more, some less, each one according to his deserving and capacity; none to a degree that makes them infallible. Those who are the most inspired are the natural teachers of those below them. God has given them their credentials, noble intellects, hearts that beat high in humanity's cause, and an irrepressible spirit which makes each one feel, woe is me if I proclaim not God's truth. "The world is their parish, and mankind universally are their parishioners." They feel that they have a mission on earth, and until that is accomplished no harm can befall them. God's inspiration and revelation cannot be confined within the lids of any book, nor the limits of any one man's mind, nor to a single nation only; not to only one quarter of the globe. The true light, as saith the scriptures, "enlighteneth every man that cometh into the world." That the Jewish prophets were inspired we do not doubt; so were Confucius, Buddha and Mahomet, so was Christ and his Apostles, and Christ more than all who had gone before him. Paul was inspired more than all the rest of the apostles put together. He dared to put the spirit above the letter of inspiration, and to teach that in all cases where there was a conflict between them the letter must yield. No doubt the Bible contains revelations from God; but the book itself is the work of human hands and bears distinct marks of its human origin. No doubt God spake to Moses; but in the same way that he has always been speaking to the human race. In the infancy of the race his voice is only faintly heard because the peoples' hearing is indistinct; but as the race progresses and intellect and moral sense is more developed, his voice is more distinctly heard and better comprehended. Inspiration, then, is progressive; the final word has not yet been spoken. Revelation is more full and complete to-day than ever before; but we may expect even greater revelations in the future. The difference between us and other religionists is not that we believe less, but a great deal more.

Our God is the power that controls the universe of matter; mind and morals; the all-powerful, wise and good. Our Church is the whole world; the members of it the entire race of man. If some are bad members it is the duty of the rest to make them better. Our Temple is all space. Our altar is "earth, sea and skies." Our sacrifices and hymns of praise are joyful and thankful hearts. Our prayers are good desires and wishes, accompanied by corresponding acts and deeds. We endeavor to manifest our regard and reverence for the Supreme Being, by discharging with fidelity the duties of life and doing good to our fellow-men. Upon our altars no victims die; no blood is shed; no offering is presented of burning flesh or sweet scented herbs. "We never presume to offer aid to almighty power; to counsel infinite wisdom; to communicate intelligence to omniscience, nor to desire to avert the judgments of immaculate purity and justice; nor to try to make infinite love more kind to his creatures." We tolerate all opinions, and persecute for none. We seek to combat ignorance and superstition, not by force and violence, but by imparting knowledge and instruction. We endeavor to lead the erring from vice and to the practice of virtue, not by threats and denunciations, but by mild reproof and gentle persuasion. We worship God, not so much by set forms and ceremonies and prescribed rules, as by doing good to each other. We use no signs, symbols, amulets or charms. We fear no devils worse than men carry in their own bosoms. We make no pilgrimages to Mecca, to the Ganges, nor to Jerusalem. We are not solitaires, recluses, monks, nuns, anchorites, misanthropes nor pillar saints. We do not believe that the owl is a better bird for his gravity, or the lark a worse one for his merry notes; nor that a man's religion can be measured by the length of his face. We believe in cultivating cheerfulness, mirth and laughter; in manifesting a spirit of kindness to all men without exception, the bad as well as good, and to everything that lives and breathes. We believe in making men good by making them happy. We believe that the most acceptable return we can make for all our blessings is to be thankful for them and enjoy them, and that in so doing we only obey God. We do not fast nor torture our bodies for the good of our souls. We do not spend our days in gloom and sorrow, and fancy that by so doing we are serving either God or man. We fear no truth, and accept without hesitation from whatever source, whatever appears to be true, and as unhesitatingly reject what we deem to be false. We endeavor to cultivate a sufficient amount of manhood, moral courage and heroism, to fearlessly avow our honest opinions.

If we reject the idea of the supernatural origin of the Bible and of its absolute authority and infallibility, do we reject the beautiful moral and religious precepts, the sublime and elevating sentiments contained in the Old and New Testaments? Surely not; or in accepting these, must we endorse the gross, vulgar ideas, the incredible statements, the unreasonable, absurd doctrines therein contained? If we read in a book that two and two are four, and in the same book that two and two are ten, if we believe the last, must we, in order to be consistent deny also the first? But this is precisely what is meant when we are told that if we reject one part of the Bible we must disbelieve the whole. Again, if we reject the supernaturalism of Christianity, do we therefore renounce all religion? As well might we renounce our nature, or our manhood. The Bible did not make religion, nor is it dependent on it. Religion existed before there was any Bible. It had its birth in the heart of the first man that ever lived. Moses, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, Socrates, Plato and Seneca were religious men; but they never saw the Bible. The same causes that made them religious can make us also. Religion has its foundation in the nature and constitution of men. Human religion has no existence outside of human nature. It cannot be infused into man nor engrafted on him; it has its seat, its root, its germ in the heart. All true religion must be of the heart and be developed within. If all the Bibles in the world of every name were exterminated, religion, however much it might suffer from the loss of what is good and true contained in them, would still survive the shock and re-appear in all its inherent power and splendor.

Tell me not, then, that Rationalists are Infidels to religion, when I know that their belief is that religion stands in no need of falsehoods, deception, pious frauds, supernatural agencies nor miracles to support it, and that in no way can it be destroyed except by exterminating the human race. Religion is goodness, and just as much goodness as there is in the world, in so much is the world blessed by religion. In proportion as goodness is developed in the individual man and carried out by him in practice, in that proportion he is religious. Religion existed before writing was known or books made, or ever ceremonials instituted, creeds drawn up, or a priesthood established. It will remain even if all these should be swept away.

THE son of a clergyman was delivering a college valedictory, when, in pulling out his handkerchief, he pulled out a pack of cards. "Hulloa!" he exclaimed, "I've got on my father's coat!"

THE American revivalists, Moody and Sankey, have driven a man in London into insanity. James Castle, aged twenty-eight, a hackney carriage driver, who appeared in the dock with ribbons attached to his cap, was charged at the Clerkinwell Police Court, the other day with disorderly conduct, and causing a crowd to assemble at Islington. A policeman stated that on Monday night, April 26, he found the defendant in the midst of a large crowd, declaiming about Moody and Sankey, and singing. He threw his stick about, and caused a great disturbance; and finding that he would not go away the constable took him to the police station. All the night he had been raving about religion, and singing the songs of Moody and Sankey so loudly that the men who lodged there could not get any sleep.

D. M. BENNETT, Editor and Prop'r.

No. 333 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

A Fourth Salute from Elder Shelton.

This valorous defender of ancient superstitions and absurdities evidently does not belong to those governed by the rule "three times and out." We have already published three of his frothy, feeble letters and supposed we had done with him, but here he comes again with another of his vapid productions, which he wants us to print, and as he promises, upon his "sacred honor," this is his last, we will, notwithstanding the decision we had formed to the contrary, let him be heard still once more. He will understand, however, this must be the last. We have his measure; we know what there is in him, and it is of a quality that does not bear repetition.

BROOKSVILLE, BLOUNT Co., ALA., June 8th, 1875.

MR. D. M. BENNETT—Sir: Being warned, in your very kind and generous communications to me, published in your so called TRUTH SEEKER, that you can follow me no longer, and hinted slightly at my ignorance and great lack of being a gentleman in all things. But stated that you were going to publish a small pamphlet containing the discussion between this (ignoramus) and yourself. If you are so well informed and I am so ignorant; I am sure the pamphlet will not bring any credit or profit to either of us. But for fear you do take a curious notion and print such a pamphlet, I send this as a closing Article of recapitulation. There is one thing that I acknowledge, you can beat me at; it is a low vulgar kind of Ridicule against all things that are holy, and righteous, written in the word of God, with a vulgar prejudice actuated by a diabolical heart, and a diseased conscience. You seem to think it very strange that I should believe in the Scriptural account of the flood, though I have indubitable evidences of such a flood and evidence that you have tried to ridicule but have not nor never will overthrow by false argument, which is so thin that a twelve year old boy could not fail to detect it. And right on the end of this; insult my senses by quoting B. F. Underwood on Evolution, 10th page TRUTH SEEKER, June 1st. In a Lecture by that gentleman he states that our Solar system was once a fire mist, and also that life appeared in the same way. Now, I do think that, that Theory is a long way more mystical or more properly (misty) than the flood possibly could be, so much so that none but Philosophical Maniacs could possibly believe it. And Mr. Editor you and B. F. Underwood may both go and seek your Ancesters among the Ape and monkey tribes, in your false Theories. I assure you they are no connexion of mine.

I try to worship a God that has made man and has given him Soul and Spirit life, which elevates him far above the scale of Animal beings. Not a drop of animal or monkey blood tracks its course through my veins. I claim that God made me a human being, and you and professor Underwood can have as much animal about you as you want. But I will stop right here and ask you and the Professor what created this fire mist, which has created the Universe. I reckon both of you can give me about as good answer to this, as the negro did when asked, what he believed the Earth stood on, he said it stood on a large Durham Bull, when asked what the Bull stood on, said that it stood on a large Turtle, and when asked what the Turtle stood on, said he did not know unless it floated about on the sea of nothing. Hence such systems generally taper down to a fire mist or otherwise vapor and smoke. Such men are determined not to have the Soul humbling doctrine of the Gospel, and the flood, though an Angel declare it unto them, and though a righteous Moses should by Inspiration, tell them how the Earth was made, and how the flood came, yet my Editor is compelled to believe Mr. Underwood's fire mist Theory of the Universe because he sees, or imagines he sees, a great deal of nice Philosophy in it. Oh! consistency thou art a Jewel. Now, Sir in conclusion I will honestly say to you that I would not have my wife to believe as you do for nothing in the world; you may ask me why. It is because the fear of the God of the Universe would not be implanted in her heart, the fear of hell and the reward of heaven would not be in her mind. Creating a good conscience within, which never mislead any one, I would be afraid of such a wife, from the fact that she might get the free love fever, in her head, and would be free to love some body besides the old man of the house, and if there is no God, no Heaven, no Hell, she might undertake to make the best of surrounding circumstances, and poke a spider in the old man's dumpling; knowing that there would be no Hell, nor a Just God to punish such conduct, then she could go and exercise her free love with her free lover, under her grand system of Infidel belief which things go hand in hand and beautifully harmonizes in this present world. And there is another thing, I will never suffer an Infidel or Materialist to swear in Court against me, nor neither will I vote for one to fill any office. You see at once that I firmly believe that it is the Bible and the words of Christ, that has made us such a great civil and religious Government, and have made so many millions of noble hearted, and pious men and women. Look at China, look at Africa, and all the heathen countries that have not the Bible, and see how degraded they are. The man that would tear away every thing that makes a people noble, and happy, certainly is a monster. I now close on my part, the argument on the flood question, if my theory is correct, I will meet you at the Judgement, and then we will know how it is, but if you are right there will be no Judgement, and it will not matter whether any thing was ever right or no. Please publish this as my closing remarks; you can close on your part as you see proper, and do not stop to quibble about our bad spelling or grammar. I want you to meet the argument if you can. If you publish in Pamphlet form, send me two or three copies and I will send you an equivalent for them.

ELDER J. C. SHELTON.

REPLY.—Much that the Elder says is unworthy a reply, containing, as it does, neither sense nor argument. His talk about our "vulgar prejudice," our "diabolical heart" and "diseased conscience" is a kind of Christian twaddle not worth noticing. He is quite welcome to the "indubitable proof" he boasts of having of Noah's flood. He is, perhaps, entitled to boast a little, for he is the only person in the world that has any such proof. If, however, that popular log in Mr. Scott's ridge in Blount county, Alabama, which he mentioned in his first letter, is his indubitable proof, he can have the enjoyment of it all alone to himself, for nobody else will regard it as having the most distant connection with Noah's flood any more than it had with the whale's swallowing Jonah.

The Elder seems offended at us; he says, "And right on the end of this, insult my senses by quoting B. F. Underwood on Evolution, on tenth page of TRUTH SEEKER, June 1st." Now it seems to us if Elder Shelton had the intelligence of a three year old Esquimaux boy, he would not have fallen into the mistake we were quoting B. F. Underwood on him, and he would have been saved this dire insult he complains of. In that number of our paper we gave a synopsis of a lecture of Mr. Underwood on Evolution, but it had no more reference to Elder Shelton or his belief than to a blind Hottentot and his fetish idol. Possibly the simple Elder thought all THE TRUTH SEEKER contained was addressed to him personally. If so, he is mistaken. True, we gave up considerable space to him, but not the entire paper.

Smarting under this imagined insult, that the fire-mist theory should be quoted on him, with a zeal worthy of Sancho Panza, he at once draws his spear and charges upon the dangerous foe—the windmill of Evolution. In the simplicity of his heart, he supposes the fire-mist theory is a new idea of Mr. Underwood's. Probably he never heard of it before, and is wholly unaware it has been taught more than fifty years by La Place, Herschel and other distinguished philosophers and astronomers who found evidence in the Universe that not only the solar system, but other suns and worlds have evolved from a nebular state or fire-mist. Indications are found with the aid of immense telescopes, that worlds in their very infancy, are now emerging from this condition and are gradually condensing and evolving into solid spheres. But the pious Elder, deeming this a new heresy of Mr. Underwood's, he rushes upon it in his most valorous style. Having never read anything of fire-mists in the Bible; finding nothing of it in the song of Moses and the Lamb, he essays to demolish it at once. Stay, Elder Shelton, sheath thy sword, thou art hardly the man to overthrow the theories and deductions of the great astronomers named.

The Elder is positive not a drop of monkey blood courses through his veins; but we are not so sure of it. Were he to compare a little of his blood with the blood of an ape or monkey, he would not find much difference.

To the Elder's question, who made the fire-mist; we have to reply it was not made. It is a form of matter of which the Universe is composed, and always existed, the same as he would say his God has. It is so easy for him to believe his God always existed, why cannot he strain his imagination a little and think something else might also have always existed? Can he imagine how God could exist for countless ages with nothing else in existence besides? Where did he stay, and what was he doing for myriads of ages? Is it really any more difficult to understand that matter in some form should ever have existed than that God is capable of making the boundless Universe of nothing, and that he existed alone with nothing besides him for numberless trillions of years before he commenced the enterprise of making a Universe.

The Elder is so well pleased with his story about the negro, the Durham bull, and the large turtle, we will leave him in the enjoyment of it. There is nothing in the story, and besides he has changed it from what it used to be, but it appears just fitted to his calibre, and we are content.

The Elder's most powerful argument in this fourth letter is where he says he "would not have his wife to believe as we do for nothing in the world," for fear she would get the free-love fever in her head and leave him and the house and children to go after some other man; first putting spiders in his dumplings and poisoning him off and getting him out of the way. We believe that is the last argument against infidelity he has yet heard.

We are truly sorry the simple Elder thinks no more of his wife than that it requires a belief in a Devil and a hell to keep her from feeding him upon spiders and running off over the country with some gayer Lothario than himself. Now we think much better of Mrs. Shelton than her husband does. We do not think she would do any such thing, even if she should cease to have faith in a Devil. It would be a monster that would mix spiders in dumplings and pies to feed her husband and children, and we do not believe Mrs. Shelton is that kind of a woman. She may not have exercised good judgment in selecting a husband, but we have no idea she wants to kill him.

How little, indeed, Elder Shelton seems to know about Liberals and unbelievers, and how bad his own heart must be to suppose, because a person has not his crude belief to govern them, they would wish to kill somebody and commit other heinous crimes. If the Elder is really such a man that it requires his religious faith to keep him from committing inhuman offences, we pity him, and are compelled to give some credit to his belief, as abhorrent as it otherwise is. The Elder evidently knows very little about unbelievers or Infidels. Probably he has never met many. He lives in a part of the country where Freethinkers do not greatly abound, and where it is customary for every negro, however ignorant, and every white man, however unlearned, without the first doubt or enquiry to believe in a Devil, a hell and a cruel God who got a son by a young Jewish maiden, and though he was much pleased with his son, he caused him to be put to death in a most cruel manner, on account of the great animosity he held towards the human family. Nearly every negro in Alabama believes this beautiful creed and so does Elder Shelton.

As the Elder knows so little about the character of those who differ from him in belief, we will condescend to enlighten him if he is able to receive it. We will be glad if he can believe the truth. We have met many unbelievers in the Christian dogmas and for years have been well acquainted with considerable numbers of them, and we have invariably found them good, well-disposed people, who neither wished to murder nor violate the laws of the land. We have found them quite as moral and upright, as honorable and honest as the best Christians we ever met. Infidel women are as virtuous, stay at home as well and are as true to their husbands as any class of wives in the country. We and our wife have jogged along together thirty years; her belief corresponds closely with our own, and we can bear cheerful evidence that she has been a faithful, good wife. We have not the slightest idea that she ever put a single spider in our food, in fact we have noticed she has been very careful a fly even did not get in; nor have we ever had occasion for the faintest suspicion that she was running off on free-loving expeditions with other men. No, no, Elder Shelton, Infidel women do not act that way, they are governed by honest convictions and upright principles, and not by fear of the Devil. You have made a sad mistake, 'good Elder'; it is Christian women that most practice free-love; it is in Christian Churches to-day that free-love most largely abounds. There is scarcely a Church in the country that has not more or less of it. There is scarcely a priest, pastor or elder but what is guilty of loving the sisters too well. There are, unfortunately, hundreds and thousands of sisters ready and willing to yield themselves a free offering to please these good men of God, whom they so highly revere. We can scarcely pick up a paper but what we find accounts of some new case of some preacher having criminal connection with some of the sisters of his flock, and not one case in a score is ever allowed to come to the light. There is vastly more of this kind of business going on in the churches than outsiders dream of. Talk, indeed, about Infidels being free lovers! Christian preachers and elders have no occasion to look outside the churches for that article. And why should not the dear sisters be all to them the name of wife implies? It is scarcely wrong to please a man of God, and if it is, if it is even sin, if they only have faith, the blessed Savior wipes it all away—he pays the debt, if any is contracted. Though their sins be as red as scarlet he makes them as white as wool. Even Elder Shelton himself, if we had a full account of his “true inwardness” would not, we fear, show an entirely clear record. It is quite likely a man of so much faith has abounded in works also, if not, he is an exception to the general rule.

Among all the Infidels we have known, we never knew a woman that fed her husband on a diet of spiders; nor have we known a man who died of eating spiders. That is entirely a figment of Elder Shelton's brain. We beg him to divest himself of it and to try and have a little more confidence in his injured wife. She is probably a better woman than he would be in her place.

The pious Elder shows his illiberality by saying, “I will never suffer an Infidel or a Materialist to swear in Court against me, nor will I vote for one to fill any office.” He doubtless feels just as he says. He would deprive every Infidel of giving evidence in courts of justice, and of holding offices of honor and trust. What a bad heart he must have, and how fortunate it is for we poor unbelievers that all Christians do not feel just as he does, and that his sort are not more numerous than they are. Why, if Elder Shelton could have his way we would not be allowed to breathe; for, by the same rule that he would deprive us of the right to testify and hold office, he would deprive us of the right to think for ourselves, to speak and to breathe. That is precisely the spirit that actuated Christians in the past centuries in putting to death hundreds of thousands, yes, millions of unfortunate heretics that did not think and believe as the Christians said they must. These cruel murderers were simply Elder Shelton's, who were satisfied they were right and were determined every body should arrive at the same conclusions they did. How unjust and untrue the decision that a man cannot tell the truth and is not to be allowed to give his evidence in courts who does not believe the Christian dogmas; as though a special form of belief made a man truthful.

If any difference is to be made between a Christian and an Infidel, the latter should have the preference. Christians as usually are a class who subscribe to a set of dogmas or articles of belief without much scrutiny, doubt or investigation. They take for granted everything their preacher or elder tells them is true, and like an unfledged robin they swallow it without hesitation, especially so, since it is the popular creed and more respectable than to be a heretic. With an Infidel it is quite different; he doubts much that to him appears mythical and improbable; much that strikes him as unreasonable and absurd; he brings his reason to bear and tests the creeds presented to him by this excellent guide; he requires proof before he can give his assent to any code of dogmas and whether he is popular or unpopular he does not pretend to believe that which to his reason is unfounded and absurd. He does not seek popularity, nor join a Church to get into good society or to gain the approbation of Mrs. Grundy or Mrs. Upper-Crust. He is emphatically an independent and an honest man. He reveres truth and uprightness for their own sake, not because he is told of an cloven-footed Devil with pitchfork who is after him to pitch him into a fiery lake of burning brimstone. As a rule, he is a man of veracity and his simple word is quite as good in a court of justice or any where else, as the oath of Elder Shelton or any Christian in the land. When a man is willing to stem the popular current of thought, and estimates truth and reason higher than he does popularity; when he is willing to class himself with those despised and traduced, for opinion's sake; when he hesitates not to incur obloquy and hatred that he may give utterance to his honest convictions, depend upon it, he is a reliable, honest man, and his word may be taken in every place and condition. This is not true of the sycophantic, the priestly dupe who believes or pretends to believe whatever the dignitaries of the Church tell him he must believe, and that by so doing he will not only lay up treasures in heaven, but be ranked with the most respected and fashionable classes in this world.

The Elder spurns the idea of voting for an Infidel for office, but many better men have thought differently from him. Among the Presidents this country has had, George Washington, John Adams, Thomas Jefferson, James Madison and Abraham Lincoln may be classed as Infidels. They were unbelievers in the fundamental doctrines of Christianity, and several of them were decided in their infidelity. Were they not honorable, worthy men? Was not their word and oath good enough to be taken in a court of justice, and was it not an honor for honest, upright men to vote for them?

In the claim Elder Shelton sets up, that the Bible and the words of Christ have done so much towards civilizing the world, he exclaims, “Look at China, look at Africa!” Well, what of them? China, it is true, is an Infidel nation, but barring her over-population, she is doing very well. They are probably not equal in all respects to the Anglo-Saxon race, but they are peaceful, intelligent, industrious and law-abiding. There is not half the crime among them, no scarcely ten per cent. the crime there that exists in the same amount of population in Christian nations—400,000,000. Their religion is as good as the Christian religion, and the morals which Confucius handed down to them are equally as pure as those taught later by Jesus, and they have not taken one life in war and bloodshed where Christians have taken thousands. So much for China.

Africa, of course, is a country of gross ignorance, and the people suffer greatly from a lack of enterprise and general intelligence, but they are full of superstition and religion. In fact ignorance and religion seem to go hand in hand. Where one exists, there will you always find the other. The grosser the ignorance, the greater the mental darkness that submerges a people, the more they abound in superstition, baseless myths and absurd beliefs. Africa is a country which shows what an excess of religion, founded on mythical superstition, will do for a people. The only hope for her is the diffusion of intelligence, education, enterprise and consequently infidelity by other more advanced nations. In short, this is the great need of the world—more knowledge, more science, more reason and common sense; less belief in myths and miracles, less superstition, less faith in a supernatural religion, less priestcraft and less yielding up to priests the intelligence and reason the God of the Universe imparted to man, to guide and govern him. The world needs more a rule of reason, more infidelity and less supernaturalism and mysticism.

We have cheering hopes for the future of our race. In the next few centuries we expect much greater gains will be made in the domain of reason, science and truth than in the last thousand years. The power of priestcraft will be terribly shaken, if not wholly overthrown; revealed religion will be at a great discount and certain knowledge will supplant mysticism and superstitious vagaries. Christianity is not to be the religion of the future. It is one of the religions of the past; it has not come up to the necessities of the race, and is destined to pass away. The religion of the future will be the Religion of Humanity, and will embrace all that benefits mankind morally, physically and intellectually. How to teach the race what is needful for them, how to beget healthy, well-developed children, how to live healthfully and in accordance with physiological laws, how to lessen disease, how to increase longevity, how to select and perfect the wisest and best social conditions, how to live the most amicably and happily, how to control the baser passions, how to acquire the most intelligence, how to gain the most scientific information will be the labor of coming generations. Pagodas, mosques, synagogues, cathedrals, churches and chapels will not be recognized as much as now, but more schools of science and more institutions of learning freed from sectarianism. The world will need fewer oracles, dervishes, priests, monks, pastors and elders, but more teachers of science and the manifold laws of the Universe. The attention of the race will be devoted to making this life and this world as useful and as happy as possible, rather than in frantic efforts to evade the punishments of a future existence. Men will then learn to know and comprehend God as he is—the inherent power and force which governs the Universe, and the monstrosities which men in dark ages have devised will pass away, and no longer frighten children or grown people. When this rule is inaugurated, the true millenium will have arrived—the rule of reason and of love of the human race.

We must now take our final leave of Elder Shelton; we have our part to perform in the direction just indicated, and cannot spend too much time with him. He may naturally be a good sort of person, but he has so much superstition, so much blind faith, and so much ignorance that they nearly ruin him. If he had more intelligence and less religion, he doubtless would do very well. We would gladly have him embrace the truth as it is in nature and reason, if he had the capacity and honesty to comprehend it, but we are not very hopeful of him. We fear he is too far gone to be cured; but while the lamp holds out to burn, the simplest dupe may return. The Elder is certainly entitled to some credit; he is not unwilling to discuss the pro and con of what he believes, however absurd it may be. It is seldom we find a Christian preacher willing to fairly discuss with a Free-thinker. They either lack confidence in their own arguments or have too much fear of the Infidel's logic. The Elder having full confidence in his own abilities and equally as much in his creed steps boldly forward. We wish his cause was worthy of his zeal.

The Elder dropped a word about our vulgar kind of ridicule, etc. He wrongs us. We have not been vulgar; but had he assumed more the conduct of a gentleman, and shown more of good manners, we should have treated him more respectfully. If he thinks we have said aught amiss in this direction, he has himself only to blame. Dear Elder Shelton, good bye.

THE TRUTH SEEKER TRACTS are going off well. Many are sending for assortments to read and hand to their friends. They are furnished very low and every Liberal should send for them. See list.

TO CONTRIBUTORS. We find ourselves unable to publish very many communications which our friends are kind enough to send us. We have a large number on hand we deem very good and are anxious to lay before our readers as soon as we can; but cannot possibly do so as promptly as our friends and ourselves would desire. We bespeak patience and forbearance. We will do the best we can. We may not always exercise the best judgment as to which articles shall have precedence; but probably most anybody would make some mistakes.

FRIEND B. F. UNDERWOOD called upon us briefly on his return from Aylmer, Ont., where he recently held a four days discussion with the Rev. Prof. O. A. Burgess, Prest. of the N. W. Christian University at Indianapolis. He informs us the debate was largely attended and passed off very pleasantly. The discussion is to be published, and possibly we may decide to issue it in pamphlet form, so our readers can have the benefit of it. As Liberals, we have nothing to fear for our cause in the hands of our brave Champion—B. F. Underwood.

On the 20th inst. he is to hold another debate of three days with the Rev. John Marples, Presbyterian, at Napanee, Ont. It will be a fine opportunity for those of our friends who wish to spend a few days during the hot weather at a pleasant village on the north shore of Lake Ontario, near the lower end, to go over and listen to the debate.

An Oration on Thomas Paine.

[Delivered at Fairbury, Ill., by COL. ROBT. G. INGERSOLL.]

To speak the praises of the brave and thoughtful dead, is to me a labor of gratitude and love.

Through all the centuries gone, the mind of man has been beleaguered by the mailed hosts of superstition. Slowly and painfully has advanced the army of deliverance. Hated by those they wished to rescue, despised by those they were dying to save, these grand soldiers, these immortal deliverers, have fought without thanks, labored without applause, suffered without pity, and they have died execrated and abhorred. For the good of mankind they accepted isolation, poverty and calumny. They gave up all, sacrificed all, lost all but truth and self-respect.

One of the bravest soldiers in this army was Thos. Paine; and for one, I feel indebted to him for the liberty we are enjoying this day. Born among the poor, where children are burdens; in a country where real liberty was unknown; where the privileges of class were guarded with infinite jealousy, and the rights of the individual trampled beneath the feet of priests and nobles; where to advocate justice was treason; where intellectual freedom was infidelity, it is wonderful that the idea of true liberty ever entered his brain.

Poverty was his mother—necessity his master.

He had more brains than books; more sense than education; more courage than politeness; more strength than polish. He had no veneration for old mistakes—no admiration for ancient lies. He loved the truth for the truth's sake, and for man's sake. He saw oppression on every hand; injustice everywhere—hypocrisy at the altar, venality on the bench, tyranny on the throne; and with a splendid courage he espoused the cause of the weak against the strong—of the enslaved many against the titled few.

In England he was nothing. He belonged to the lower classes. There was no avenue open for him. The people hugged their chains, and the whole power of the government was ready to crush any man who endeavored to strike a blow for the right.

At the age of thirty-seven, Thomas Paine left England for America with the high hope of being instrumental in the establishment of a free government. In his own country he could accomplish nothing. Those two vultures—Church and State—were ready to tear in pieces and devour the heart of any one who might deny their divine right to enslave the world.

Upon his arrival in this country, he found himself possessed of a letter of introduction, signed by another Infidel, the illustrious Franklin. This, and his native genius, constituted his entire capital; and he needed no more. He found the colonies clamoring for justice; whining about their grievances; upon their knees at the foot of the throne, imploring that mixture of idiocy and insanity, George the III. by the grace of God, for a restoration of their ancient privileges. They were not endeavoring to become free men, but were trying to soften the heart of their master. They were perfectly willing to make brick if Pharaoh would furnish the straw. The colonists wished for, hoped for, and prayed for reconciliation. They did not dream of independence.

Paine gave to the world his "Common Sense." It was the first argument for separation, the first assault upon the British form of government, the first blow for a republic, and it aroused our fathers like a trumpet's blast.

He was the first to perceive the destiny of the New World.

No other pamphlet ever accomplished such wonderful results. It was filled with argument, reason, persuasion and unanswerable logic. It opened a new world. It filled the present with hope and the future with honor. Everywhere the people responded, and in a few months the Continental Congress declared the colonies free and independent States.

A new nation was born.

It is simple justice to say that Paine did more to cause the Declaration of Independence than any other man. Neither should it be forgotten that his attacks upon Great Britain were also attacks upon monarchy; and while he convinced the people that the colonies ought to separate from the mother country, he also proved to them that a free government is the best that can be instituted among men.

In my judgment, Thomas Paine was the best political writer that ever lived. "What he wrote was pure nature, and his soul and his pen ever went together." Ceremony, pageantry and all the paraphernalia of power, had no effect upon him. He examined into the why and wherefore of things. He was perfectly radical in his mode of thought. Nothing short of the bed-rock satisfied him. His enthusiasm for what he believed to be right knew no bounds. During all the dark scenes of the Revolution, never for one moment did he despair. Year after year his brave words were ringing through the land, and by the bivouac fires the weary soldiers read the inspiring words of "Common Sense," filled with ideas sharper than their swords, and consecrated themselves anew to the cause of freedom.

Paine was not content with having aroused the spirit of independence, but he gave every energy of his soul to keep that spirit alive. He was with the army. He shared its defeats, its dangers, and its glory. When the situation became desperate, when gloom settled upon all, he gave them the "Crisis." It was a cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night, leading the way to freedom, honor and glory. He shouted to them, "These are the times that try men's souls. The Summer soldier, and the sunshine patriot, will, in this crisis, shrink from the service of his country; but he that stands it now deserves the love and thanks of man and woman."

To those who wished to put the war off to some future day, with a lofty and touching spirit of self-sacrifice he said: "Every generous parent should say, 'If there must be war, let it be in my day, that my child may have peace.'" To the cry that Americans were rebels, he replied: "He that rebels against reason is a real rebel; but he that, in defence of reason, rebels against tyranny, has a better title to 'Defender of the Faith' than George the Third."

Some said it was not to the interest of the colonies to be free. Paine answered this by saying: "To know whether it be the interest of the continent to be independent, we need ask only this simple, easy question: 'Is it the interest of a man to be a boy all his life?'" He found many who would listen to nothing, and to them he said, "That to argue with a man who has renounced his reason is like giving medicine to the dead." This sentiment ought to adorn the walls of every orthodox church.

There is a world of political wisdom in this: "England lost her liberty in a long chain of right reasoning from wrong principles;" and there is real discrimination in saying, "The Greeks and Romans were strongly possessed of the spirit of liberty, but not the principles, for at the time that they were determined not to be slaves themselves, they employed their power to enslave the rest of mankind."

In his letter to the British people, in which he tried to convince them that war was not to their interest, occurs the following passage brimful of common sense: "War never can be the interest of a trading nation any more than quarreling can be profitable to a man in business. But to make war with those who trade with us, is like setting a bull-dog upon a customer at the shop door."

The writings of Paine fairly glitter with simple, compact, logical statements, that carry conviction to the dullest and most prejudiced. He had the happiest possible way of putting the case; in asking questions in such a way that they answer themselves, and in stating his premises so clearly that the deduction could not be avoided.

Day and night he labored for America; month after month, year after year he gave himself to the great cause, until there was "a government of the people and for the people," and until the banner of the stars floated over a continent redeemed and consecrated to the happiness of mankind.

At the close of the Revolution, no one stood higher in America than Thomas Paine. The best, the wisest, the most patriotic were his friends and admirers; and had he been thinking only of his own good, he might have rested from his toils and spent the remainder of his life in comfort and in ease. He could have been what the world is pleased to call "respectable." He could have died surrounded by clergymen, warriors and statesmen. At his death there would have been an imposing funeral, miles of carriages, civic societies, salvos of artillery, a nation in mourning, and above all, a splendid monument covered with lies.

He chose rather to benefit mankind.

At that time the seeds sown by the great Infidels were beginning to bear fruit in France. The people were beginning to think.

The Eighteenth Century was crowning its gray hairs with the wreath of progress.

On every hand Science was bearing testimony against the Church. Voltaire had filled Europe with light; D'Holbach was giving to the elite of Paris the principles contained in his "System of Nature." The Encyclopædists had attacked superstition with information for the masses. The foundation of things began to be examined. A few had the courage to keep their shoes on and let the bush burn. Miracles began to get scarce. Everywhere the people began to inquire. America had set an example to the world. The word liberty began to be in the mouths of men, and they began to wipe the dust from their knees.

The dawn of a new day had appeared.

Thomas Paine went to France. Into the new movement he threw all his energies. His fame had gone before him, and he was welcomed as a friend of the human race, and as a champion of free government.

He had never relinquished his intention of pointing out to his countrymen the defects, absurdities and abuses of the English government. For this purpose he composed and published his greatest political work, "The Rights of Man." This work should be read by every man and woman. It is concise, accurate, natural, convincing and unanswerable. It shows great thought; an intimate knowledge of the various forms of government; deep insight into the very springs of human action, and a courage that compels respect and admiration. The most difficult political problems are solved in a few sentences. The venerable arguments in favor of wrong are refuted with a question—answered with a word. For forcible illustration, apt comparison, accuracy and clearness of statement, and absolute thoroughness, it has never been excelled.

The fears of the administration were aroused, and Paine was prosecuted for libel and found guilty; and yet there is not a sentiment in the entire work that will not challenge the admiration of every civilized man. It is a magazine of political wisdom, an arsenal of ideas, and an honor, not only to Thomas Paine, but to human nature itself. It could have been written only by the man who had the generosity, the exalted patriotism, the goodness to say, "The world is my country, and to do good my religion."

There is in all the utterances of the world no grander, no sublimer sentiment. There is no creed that can be compared with it for a moment. It should be wrought in gold, adorned with jewels, and impressed upon every human heart: "The world is my country, and to do good my religion."

In 1792 Paine was elected by the department of Calais as their representative in the National Assembly. So great was his popularity in France, that he was selected about the same time by the people of no less than four departments.

Upon taking his place in the Assembly he was appointed as one of a committee to draft a constitution for France. Had the French people taken the advice of Thomas Paine, there would have been no "Reign of Terror." The streets of Paris would not have been filled with blood. The revolution would have been the grandest success of the world. The truth is that Paine was too conservative to suit the leaders of the French Revolution. They, to a great extent, were carried away by hatred, and a desire to destroy. They had suffered so long, they had borne so much, that it was impossible for them to be moderate in the hour of victory.

Besides all this, the French people had been so robbed by the government, so degraded by the Church, that they were not fit material with which to construct a republic. Many of the leaders longed to establish a beneficent and just government, but the people asked for revenge.

Paine was filled with a real love for mankind. His philanthropy was boundless. He wished to destroy monarchy—not the monarch. He voted for the destruction of tyranny, and against the death of the king. He wished to establish a government on a new basis; one that would forget the past; one that would give privileges to none, and protection to all.

In the Assembly, where nearly all were demanding the execution of the king—where to differ from the majority was to be suspected, and where to be suspected was almost certain death, Thomas Paine had the courage, the goodness and the justice to vote against death. To vote against the execution of the king was a vote against his own life. This was the sublimity of devotion to principle. For this he was arrested, imprisoned and doomed to death.

Search the records of the world, and you will find but few sublimer acts than that of Thomas Paine voting against the king's death. He, the hater of despotism, the abhorrer of monarchy, the champion of the rights of man, the republican, accepting death to save the life of a deposed tyrant—of a throneless king. This was the last grand act of his political life—the sublime conclusion of his political career.

All his life he had been the disinterested friend of man. He had labored—not for money, not for fame, but for the general good. He had aspired to no office; had asked no recognition of his services, but had ever been content to labor as a common soldier in the army of progress. Confining his efforts to no country, looking upon the world as his field of action, filled with a genuine love for the right, he found himself imprisoned by the very people he had striven to save.

Had his enemies succeeded in bringing him to the block, he would have escaped the calumnies and the hatred of the Christian world. In this country, at least, he would have ranked with the proudest names. On the anniversary of the Declaration his name would have been upon the lips of all the orators, and his memory in the hearts of all of the people.

Thomas Paine had not finished his career.

He had spent his life thus far in destroying the power of kings, and now he turned his attention to the priests. He knew that every abuse had been embalmed in Scripture—that every outrage was in partnership with some holy text. He knew that the throne skulked behind the altar, and both behind a pretended revelation from God. By this time he had found that it was of little use to free the body and leave the mind in chains. He had explored the foundations of despotism, and had found them infinitely rotten. He had dug under the throne, and it occurred to him that he would take a look behind the altar.

The result of his investigations was given to the world in the "Age of Reason." From the moment of its publication he became infamous. He was calumniated beyond measure. To slander him was to secure the thanks of the Church. All his services were instantly forgotten, disparaged or denied. He was shunned as though he had been a pestilence. Most of his old friends forsook him. He was regarded as a moral plague, and at the bare mention of his name the bloody hands of the Church were raised in horror. He was denounced as the most despicable of men.

Not content with following him to the grave, they pursued him with redoubled fury, and recounted with infinite gusto and satisfaction the supposed horrors of his death-bed; gloried in the fact that he was forlorn and friendless, and gloated like fiends over what they supposed to be the agonizing remorse of his lonely death.

It is wonderful that all his services were thus forgotten. It is amazing that one kind word did not fall from some pulpit; that some one did not accord to him, at least—honesty. Strange, that in the general denunciation some one did not remember his labor for liberty, his devotion to principle, his zeal for the rights of his fellow-men. He had, by brave and splendid effort, associated his name with the cause of progress. He had made it impossible to write the history of political freedom with his name left out. He was one of the creators of light; one of the heralds of the dawn. He hated tyranny in the name of kings, and in the name of God with every drop of his noble blood. He believed in liberty and justice, and in the sacred doctrine of human equality. Under these divine banners he fought the battle of his life. In both worlds he offered his blood for the good of man. In the wilderness of America, in the French Assembly, in the sombre cell waiting for death, he was the same unflinching, unwavering friend of his race; the same undaunted champion of universal freedom. And for this he has been hated; for this the Church has violated even his grave.

This is enough to make one believe that nothing is more natural than for men to devour their benefactors. The people in all ages have crucified and glorified. Whoever lifts his voice against abuses, whoever arraigns the past at the bar of the present, whoever asks the king to show his commission, or questions the authority of the priest, will be denounced as the enemy of man and God. In all ages reason has been regarded as the enemy of religion. Nothing has been considered so pleasing to the Deity as a total denial of the authority of your own mind. Self-reliance has been thought a deadly sin; and the idea of living and dying without the aid and consolation of superstition has always horrified the Church. By some unaccountable infatuation belief has been, and still is considered of immense importance. All religions have been based upon the idea that God will forever reward the true believer, and eternally damn the man who doubts or denies. Belief is regarded as the one essential thing. To practice justice, to love mercy, is not enough. You must believe in some incomprehensible creed. You must say, "Once one is three, and three times one is one." The man who practiced every virtue, but failed to believe, was execrated. Nothing so outrages the feelings of the Church as a moral unbeliever—nothing so horrible as a charitable Atheist.

When Paine was born, the world was religious. The pulpit was the real throne, and the churches were making every effort to crush out of the brain the idea that it had the right to think.

The splendid saying of Lord Bacon, that "the inquiry of truth, which is the love-making or wooing of it, the knowledge of truth, which is the presence of it, and the belief of truth, which is the enjoying of it, are the sovereign good of human nature," has been, and ever will be, rejected by religionists. Intellectual liberty, as a matter of necessity, forever destroys the idea that belief is either praise or blame-worthy, and is wholly inconsistent with every creed in Christendom. Paine recognized this truth. He also saw that as long as the Bible was considered inspired, this infamous doctrine of the virtue of belief would be believed and preached. He examined the Scriptures for himself, and found them filled with cruelty, absurdity and immorality.

He again made up his mind to sacrifice himself for the good of his fellow-men.

He commenced with the assertion, "That any system of religion that has anything in it that shocks the mind of a child cannot be a true system." What a beautiful, what a tender sentiment! No wonder that the Church began to hate him. He believed in one God, and no more. After this life he hoped for happiness. He believed that true religion consisted in doing justice, loving mercy, in endeavoring to make our fellow-creatures happy, and in offering to God the fruit of the heart. He denied the inspiration of the Scriptures. This was his crime.

He contended that it is a contradiction in terms to call anything a revelation that comes to us at second-hand, either verbally or in writing. He asserted that revelation is necessarily limited to the first communication, and that after that it is only an account of something which another person says was a revelation to him. We have only his word for it, as it was never made to us. This argument never has been, and probably never will be answered. He denied the divine origin of Christ, and showed conclusively that the pretended prophecies of the Old Testament had no reference to him whatever; and yet he believed that Christ was a virtuous and amiable man; that the morality he taught and practiced was of the most benevolent and elevated character, and that it had not been exceeded by any. Upon this point he entertained the same sentiments now held by the Unitarians, and in fact by the most enlightened Christians.

In his time the Church believed and taught that every word in the Bible was absolutely true. Since his day it has been proven false in its cosmogony, false in its astronomy, false in its chronology, false in its history, and, so far as the Old Testament is concerned, false in almost everything. There are but few, if any, scientific men who apprehend that the Bible is literally true. Who on earth at this day would pretend to settle any scientific question by a text from the Bible? The old belief is confined to the ignorant and zealous. The Church itself will before long be driven to occupy the position of Thomas Paine. The best minds of the orthodox world, to-day, are endeavoring to prove the existence of a personal Deity. All other questions occupy a minor place. You are no longer asked to swallow the Bible whole, whale, Jonah and all. You are simply required to believe in God and pay your pew-rent. There is not now an enlightened minister in the world who will seriously contend that Samson's strength was in his hair, nor that the necromancers of Egypt could turn water into blood, and pieces of wood into serpents. These follies have passed away, and the only reason that the religious world can now have for disliking Paine is that they have been forced to adopt so many of his opinions.

Paine thought the barbarities of the Old Testament inconsistent with what he deemed the real character of God. He believed that murder, massacre and indiscriminate slaughter had never been commanded by the Deity. He regarded much of the Bible as childish, unimportant, and foolish. The scientific world entertains the same opinion. Paine attacked the Bible precisely in the same spirit in which he had attacked the pretensions of kings. He used the same weapons. All the pomp in the world could not make him cower. His reason knew no "holy of holies," except the abode of truth. The sciences were then in their infancy. The attention of the really learned had not been directed to an impartial examination of our pretended revelation. It was accepted by most as a matter of course. The Church was all-powerful; and no one, unless thoroughly imbued with the spirit of self-sacrifice, thought for a moment of disputing the fundamental doctrines of Christianity. The infamous doctrine that salvation depends upon belief—upon a mere intellectual conviction—was then believed and preached. To doubt was to secure the damnation of your soul. This absurd and devilish doctrine shocked the common sense of Thomas Paine, and he denounced it with the fervor of honest indignation. This doctrine, although infinitely ridiculous, has been nearly universal, and has been as hurtful as senseless. For the overthrow of the infamous tenet, Paine exerted all his strength. He left few arguments to be used by those who should come after him, and he used none that have been refuted. The combined wisdom and genius of all mankind cannot possibly conceive of an argument against liberty of thought. Neither can they show why any one should be punished, either in this world or another, for acting honestly in accordance with reason; and yet, a doctrine with every possible argument against it has been, and still is, believed and defended by the entire orthodox world. Can it be possible that we have been endowed with reason simply that our souls may be caught in its toils and snares, that we may be led by its false and delusive glare out of the narrow path that leads to joy into the broad way of everlasting death? Is it possible that we have been given reason simply that we may through faith ignore its deductions, and avoid its conclusions? Ought the sailor to throw away his compass and depend entirely upon the fog? If reason is not to be depended upon in matters of religion, that is to say, in respect to our duties to the Deity, why should it be relied upon in matters respecting the rights of our fellows? Why should we throw away the laws given to Moses by God himself, and have the audacity to make some of our own? How dare we drown the thunders of Sinai by calling the ayes and noes in a petty legislature? If reason can determine what is merciful, what is just, the duties of man to man, what more do we want either in time or eternity?

Down, forever down, with any religion that requires upon its ignorant altar the sacrifice of the goddess Reason; that compels her to abdicate forever the shining throne of the soul, strips from her form the imperial purple, snatches from her hand the sceptre of thought and makes her the bond-woman of a senseless faith!

If a man should tell you that he had the most beautiful painting in the world, and after taking you where it was, should insist upon having your eyes shut, you would likely suspect, either that he had no painting or that it was some pitiable daub. Should he tell you that he was a most excellent performer on the violin, and yet refuse to play unless your ears were stopped, you would think, to say the least of it, that he had an odd way of convincing you of his musical ability. But would his conduct be any more wonderful than that of a religionist who asks that, before examining his creed, you will have the kindness to throw away your reason? The first gentleman says, "Keep your eyes shut, my picture will bear everything but being seen;" "keep your ears stopped, my music objects to nothing but being heard." The last says, "Away with your reason, my religion dreads nothing but being understood."

So far as I am concerned, I most cheerfully admit that most Christians are honest, and most ministers sincere. We do not attack them; we attack their creed. We accord to them the same rights that we ask for ourselves. We believe that their doctrines are hurtful. We believe that the frightful text, "He that believes shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned," has covered the earth with blood. It has filled the world with arrogance, cruelty and murder. It has caused the religious wars; bound hundreds of thousands to the stake; founded inquisitions; filled dungeons; invented instruments of torture; taught the mother to hate her child; imprisoned the mind; filled the earth with ignorance; persecuted the lovers of wisdom; built the monasteries and convents; made happiness a crime, investigation a sin, and self-reliance a blasphemy. It has poisoned the springs of learning; misdirected the energies of the world; filled all countries with want; housed the people in hovels; fed them with famine; and, but for the efforts of a few brave Infidels, it would have taken the world back to the midnight of barbarism, and left the heavens without a star.

The maligners of Paine say that he had no right to attack this doctrine because he was unacquainted with the dead languages; and for this reason, it was a piece of pure impudence in him to investigate the Scriptures.

Is it necessary to understand Hebrew in order to know that cruelty is not a virtue, and that murder is inconsistent with infinite goodness, and that eternal punishment can be inflicted upon man only by an eternal fiend? Is it really essential to conjugate the Greek verbs before you can make up your mind as to the probability of dead people getting out of their graves? Must one be versed in Latin before he is entitled to express his opinion as to the genuineness of a pretended revelation from God? Common sense belongs exclusively to no tongue. Logic is not confined to, nor has it been buried with the dead languages. Paine attacked the Bible as it is translated. If the translation is wrong, let its defenders correct it.

The Christianity of Paine's day is not the Christianity of our time. There has been a great improvement since then. One hundred and fifty years ago the foremost preachers of our time would have perished at the stake. A Universalist would have been torn in pieces in England, Scotland and America, Unitarians would have found themselves in the stocks, pelted by the rabble with dead cats, after which their ears would have been cut off, their tongues bored and their foreheads branded. Less than one hundred and fifty years ago the following law was in force in Maryland:

"Be it enacted by the Right Honorable, the Lord Proprietor, by and with the advice and consent of his lordship's governor, and the upper and lower houses of the Assembly, and the authority of the same:

"That if any person shall hereafter, within this province, wittingly, maliciously, and advisedly, by writing or speaking, blaspheme or curse God, or deny our Saviour, Jesus Christ to be the son of God, or shall deny the Holy Trinity, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, or the God-head of any of the three persons, or the unity of the God-head, or shall utter any profane words concerning the Holy Trinity, or any of the persons thereof, and shall thereof be convicted by verdict, shall, for the first offence be bored through the tongue, and be fined twenty pounds to be levied off his body. And for the second offence, the offender shall be stigmatized by burning in the forehead with the letter B, and fined forty pounds. And that for the third offence, the offender shall suffer death without the benefit of clergy."

The strange thing about the law is, that it has never been repealed, and is still in force in the District of Columbia. Laws like this were in force in most of the colonies, and in all countries where the Church had power.

In the Old Testament, the death penalty was attached to hundreds of offenses. It has been the same in all Christian countries. To-day, in civilized governments, the death penalty is attached only to murder and treason; and in some, it has been entirely abolished. What a commentary upon the divine humbugs of the world!

In the day of Thomas Paine the Church was ignorant, bloody and relentless. In Scotland the "Kirk" was at the summit of its power. It was a full sister of the Spanish Inquisition. It waged war upon human nature. It was the enemy of happiness, the hater of joy, and the despiser of religious liberty. It taught parents to murder their children rather than to allow them to propagate error. If the mother held opinions of which the infamous "Kirk" disapproved, her children were taken from her arms, her babe from her very bosom, and she was not allowed to see them, or to write them a word. It would not allow shipwrecked sailors to be rescued on Sunday. If sought to annihilate pleasure, to pollute the heart by filling it with religious cruelty and gloom, and to change mankind into a vast horde of pious, heartless fiends. One of the most famous Scotch divines said: "The Kirk holds that religious toleration is not far from blasphemy." And this same Scotch Kirk denounced; beyond measure, the man who had the moral grandeur to say, "The world is my country, and to do good my religion." And this same Kirk abhorred the man who said, "Any system of religion that shocks the mind of a child cannot be a true system."

At that time nothing so delighted the Church as the beauties of endless torment, and listening to the weak wailings of infants struggling in the slimy coils and poisonous folds of the worm that never dies.

About the beginning of the nineteenth century, a boy by the name of Thomas Aikenhead, was indicted

Editor's Notes.

THE PRO AND CON OF SUPERNATURAL RELIGION. We present our readers in this issue a full instalment of the work on this subject. We trust every one will give it a careful reading. The arguments used are sound, clear and cogent.

OUR BOOK LIST is presented in this number. We wish our friends to bear us in mind and send to us when they want books. We are prepared to furnish at publisher's prices any books to be had in the city as well those in our list.

NEW BOOKS. Darwin's Descent of Man, formerly published in two volumes at $2 each is now issued entire in one volume with some additions and all the original cuts at $2, postage 25 cts. We will cheerfully send it to any party desiring it.

THE BETTER WAY. An appeal to men in behalf of human culture through a wiser parentage, by A. E. Newton, and published by Wood & Holbrook. A very valuable little work, giving information upon the subject of parentage and transmission of offspring. This subject has too long been avoided, while its importance demands the clearest investigation. The future condition of our race depends very largely upon the proper understanding of this subject, and this work supplies a want long felt. 48 pp., price 50 cts. by mail. For sale at this office.

BOTH SIDES. No. 1, Vol. I. of a new paper by this title, published by J. C. Pankhurst, Aylmer, Ontario, is before us. As its name indicates, it purports to give theological subjects on either side a full, fair and free discussion, and admits contributions from writers on both sides of the main questions. The idea is a good one. It appears to be ably conducted, and we wish it much success. Terms, $1.50 per year.

Christian Supervision.

Some two months ago John A. Lant moved his paper, The Toledo Sun, to this city, believing it would be a more commanding point from which to issue it. He has published three numbers. The first was destroyed by the printer who got it up for him, and the other two numbers have been denied passport through the United States mails. The noted Anthony Comstock, who has in times past made himself conspicuous in suppressing papers, and in imprisoning G. F. Train for publishing extracts from the Bible, is now a United States official in the mail service in the Post Office of this city. In deciding which papers shall pass through the mail, and which not, he seems to possess a power superior to the Postmaster. If he says a paper cannot go through the public mails, why, it cannot go, and that is all there is about it!

Mr. Lant had an interview with the gentleman, but found him positive and unyielding. Besides being Special U. S. Agent of the Post Office Department, he is a prominent member of the "New York Society for the Suppression of Vice," and claimed as such to be empowered by the State laws to arrest and prosecute for blasphemy any paper or publisher he deemed blasphemous. He said his society was now large and strong enough and had money enough to extend their operations, and that a good many things were going to be looked after which had heretofore been allowed to pass. He was understood to mean "Radical" and other publications which attack the current theologies of the day, and of course THE TRUTH SEEKER will come in for a share of his attentions.

This may be the issue that is now upon us—whether this man and his society, or the Young Men's Christian Association, have the power to exercise a censorship over the public press, suppressing such papers and books as in their view do not teach the prescribed and accepted theology. It is, perhaps, yet to be tested whether the great American nation is really a free country, where all can think and speak their honest convictions, or whether all schools of thought must be compelled to come under the tutelage and control of a certain society, a certain creed, or a certain theology, and be allowed to say nothing and publish nothing of which these censors do not approve.

It has been thought that in this free country, where the government neither prescribes nor proscribes any creed or theology, that a Jew, a Christian, a Mahometan, a Mormon, a Buddhist, a Parsee, or an opposer of all these, have an equal right to their views, and to freely express them, if they violate no laws of the land. This, however, may all be a mistake. The supposition that the time has gone by for trials for blasphemy to be held may prove to be a delusive one. This society alluded to may be strong enough and rich enough to take the power into their hands, and decide what views may be promulgated and what may not.

If this state of things is to be inaugurated, a lively time may be looked for. If this Christian society assume the right and power to seize, expurgate, and suppress all publications that do not agree with their antiquated theology, they will undertake a herculean task indeed. The writings of Humboldt, Stuart Mill, Darwin, Huxley, Spencer, Helmholtz, Schmidt, Draper, Fiske, and many others, will have to be seized and condemned, for they all contain the rankest heresy. True, rich and powerful Christian firms are engaged in publishing these works, but that should make no difference with our valorous Christian society if it undertakes the holy work of suppression. These works all pass through the mails, and cannot be overlooked, if anti-theological publications are to be suppressed.

That there exists, in the direction indicated, a disposition to do something of this kind, is tolerably evident, and our friends need not be surprised if the assault is made soon. It is not likely, however, that powerful publishing houses or papers will be attacked. The Appletons, Lippincotts, The New York Herald, The New York Sun, and The Graphic will probably not be molested, but some weaker and more obscure affair will likely be the "bright and shining mark." This fate may be reserved for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Time reveals much.

We apprehend, however, there are thousands upon thousands in our fair country who will vigorously oppose an attack upon free speech, free thought, a free press, and the freedom to adopt and promulgate such theological doctrines as may be honestly deemed true and right.

Clergymen's Holidays.

About these days the persecuted Pastor of Plymouth church and many others of our fashionable, aristocratic ministers, who, at salaries ranging from $5,000 to $20,000 per year, for two or three hour's labor per week, in enunciating the doctrines their howly Master is said to have taught without any salary at all, are hiding themselves away to the mountains, the forests, the lakes, the seaside and country retreats to have their annual hunting, fishing, yachting and rural sports for two or three months. This is, probably, well enough if their congregations are willing to pay those large salaries for this kind of service. It is said their labors are so onerous and exhaustive they need the recuperation. We must, at all events, believe it is all for the good of Christ's cause.

Let them, by all means, have their rest or their sports as their tastes dictate. But how do they suppose we sinners are going to fare in their absence? What will prevent the wolves breaking in upon the Lambs if the Shepherds leave them to their fate for three sweltering months? Who will prevent the Devil himself from prowling around and seizing the most promising of the little ones while the good men of God are away enjoying themselves, and not here to prevent by their prayers and efficient labors such a catastrophe? If we can get along without them three months in the year, could we not, with a little extra effort on our part, dispense with them the other nine months? And as the world advances in knowledge and intelligence, and cultivates individuality and self-reliance—in short, learns to do its own praying and thinking, will it not find far less use for priests and clergymen than heretofore? We think so decidedly. But so long as they can induce mankind to believe God requires the world to accept and support a priesthood at high salaries; so long as they can make the masses believe that God has revealed himself privately to one or two, or at most, to a very small number, and they can make the rest of mankind believe themselves obligated to take their say so as to this matter, and that it is a secret which clergymen have a monopoly of, and they are the only ones to impart it to the confiding, approving multitudes, so long will the clergy maintain their power and rule. And so long as it continues fashionable to have grand churches costing half a million dollars, and many of them more; grand organs, costing from $5,000 to $20,000; expensive choirs, costing half as much more per year, and a clergyman to act as figure-head, costing $10,000 more, so long will these expensive and senseless luxuries be maintained. But we trust some day the world will grow wiser and see the folly of this useless expenditure of treasure and will adopt a very different line of tactics and find better uses for their money.

In the meantime let the pulpit magnates enjoy themselves. A coarse adage says, "Let every dog have his day," and so of these clergymen; it is their day now. They are on the high tide of prosperity and popularity. The public are willing to support them in opulence, fashion and style. Let them enjoy it while they may. The time may come when their clerical services can be dispensed with, when intelligent men will discover that, like a fifth wheel to a coach, the clergy are both expensive and useless.

It is, perhaps, to be regretted in this time of vacations and Summer sports, that the poorer portion of the clergy all over the country, who work for $500 and $1,000 per year, cannot also have their play-spell of two or three months; but like editors, bakers and grocers, they are on the treadmill of duty, and there is no play-spell for them.

MORAL.—If you decide upon the avocation of a clergyman, aim to become attached to a rich, fashionable congregation, and then, in the language of Mark Twain, you will have "a soft thing of it."

Cape Cod Camp Meeting.

The Spiritualists of Barnstable County will hold their seventh annual camp meeting at Nickerson's Grove, Norwich, commencing Saturday, July 24th, and continue until August 2d. It is expected that two days of the session will be devoted to picnicing, in which all will be expected to participate. No pains will be spared by the committee in preparing the grounds and furnishing for pleasure, comfort and intellectual enjoyment. First-class speakers will be engaged for the occasion, and as usual, an arrangement made with the railroad company to carry passengers at reduced rates. There will also be a boarding tent at which visitors will be furnished with refreshments at reasonable rates; for the committee have souls.

Great efforts will be made to have this meeting excel all previous ones, both in numbers and interest, and to this end it will be necessary that all who are friendly to the cause shall interest themselves in the matter and co-operate with each other, and labor earnestly to show the world that we prize the truth and are determined to maintain it. Then come one come all, and let us meet in a fraternal spirit, earnestly asking for more light on this all-important subject. For the triumph of the cause, let us meet and mutually work together.

Yours in the work, HEMAN SNOW.

Liberal Debate.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: A Debate will take place in the town of Napanee, Ont., between Rev. John Marples, Presbyterian minister, and Mr. B. F. Underwood, commencing July 20th, and terminating 23d, inclusive. The first two nights Mr. Marples will affirm, "That Atheism, Materialism, and modern scepticism are illogical and contrary to reason." Mr. Underwood, of course, will reasonably and logically dispute that. The last two nights Mr. Marples will affirm, and Mr. Underwood negative, the proposition, "That the Bible, consisting of the Old and New Testaments, contains evidence beyond all other books of its divine origin." We hope as many of your readers as can make it convenient to come will do so.

Respectfully yours,
ALLEN PRINGLE.

CREATION.—Matter and Force are eternal, filling all space, and occupying all time. Ideas and forms are created. Thus, Science leaves the term "creation" for the use of Christians, who assure us that "God created all Matter and Force out of nothing." But, curiously enough, the New Testament informs us, on the contrary, that "God" is an idea, created by the human mind, in the exercise of Christian "faith." When it declares that "faith is the evidence of things unseen," the meaning is, that the idea of God is a voluntary creation of credulity. And the usus loquendi of the Bible means this by the term "faith," or nothing; so that God is a creation of human thought. Thus the idea of God or the Devil is, certainly, created, and this, and nothing but this, is meant by what Christians call "saving faith," "by which the worlds were framed" (Heb. xi. 3). We shall find the truth by and by.

Christians at Work.

Mr. EDITOR:—I like the TRUTH SEEKER for its fearless independence in meeting the pretensions of Christian piety in the moral influence of its teaching upon its own professors. If an ordinary human being makes a false step in his moral work, the sanctimonious "followers of the Lamb" will point to the event as resulting from a lack of Christian piety, and the guiding influence of religion and all that. Had he listened to the voice of God and "got religion" he would have escaped his downfall or false step etc. Here is the language and pretension of the "regenerate, of the born again;" and hence I am glad to see the TRUTH SEEKER making a record of the life of these pretenders to show how false their religion is, or what a transparent show it is, in guiding men in the path of life. The great number of cases reported in whole files of papers I take, especially of ministers of the gospel convinces me that, as a class, in proportion to their numbers they are about the most licentious class of people that live. As a matter of curiosity in the fall of 1873 I undertook to note down the cases that I saw mentioned in the political papers I was taking, and here follows my record.

Some few of the cases were not of ministers, but they were either ministers or prominent members of some church. I noted the nature of the public charges made: in a very few cases they may not have been sustained by public investigations, if any were had. I wrote the month in which I saw the charges mentioned in the papers.

November, 1873 Rev. A. W. Eastman, West Cornwall, Ohio, (Methodist) joined the Baptist church, and was expelled for immorality.

Rev. (name not given) Baptist preacher, Saline, Mich. ran away after being detected in too much familiarity (Beecherism) with the sisters.

Wm. Bigg, Y. M. C. A. Columbus, Ohio, Forgery.

Rev. Porshall, Baptist, Oakland Co., Mich., dismissed for licentious conduct.

Jerome G. Poles. Sent to the Penitentiary for murdering his two children with a hatchet. two miles from Columbiana Station Ohio. Was a pew holder in the United Brethren church.

Rev. John Hutchinson (Episcopal) Boston—sent to the house of correction eighteen months for swindling Geo. Allen out of a thousand dollars.

Rev. Wm. Rice (Methodist) Mason, Mich.—Subsequently convicted of adultery.

Geo. A. Cristian, of Y. M. C. A. Washington, D. C. robbed fifty graves in less than a year, and sold the contents to the doctors.

A. H. Waldron, Adrian, Mich. of doing what was recommended in Deuteronomy, 14 chap. 51 verse

W. R. Caum, Hamilton, Ohio, charged by Dr. McChristie with grubbing his shade trees—Methodist.

Rev. — a pious teacher at Warren, McComb Co., Mich., violating a dozen young school girls and swearing them to secrecy on the crucifix of the church. He ran away to escape being mobbed.

Rev. D. M. White, Presbyterian, Pittsburgh, Pa., sent to State Prison two years for stealing money.

Rev. D. S. K. Pine, Pittsburgh, Pa., under serious charges by a young woman.

Rev. Sam'l McBurney, Methodist, on trial at Columbus, Ohio, for immorality and falsehood—Mansfield, Ohio.

Rev. Dr. Wm. G. Murray, rector of Central church, Baltimore, got drunk and was intensely profane.

Lady members of the church at Chelsea, Mass., stealing jewelry to supply a table at a fair given by the Y. M. C. A.

Jordan, Marsh & Co., defrauding the government of several millions of revenue—Boston.

Gen. O. O. Howard, in trouble about money of the Freedmen.

Rev. A. Stilson, Clinton, Mich., confessed too much intimacy with the sisters—"nest hiding."

W. S. Brecknell, Cummingsville, Ohio, delegate of Y. M. C. A. to Cincinnati, and vestryman of St. Philip's church, deserted wife and three children and eloped with a frail sister.

Rev. James E. Reedsolph, Methodist, Adrian, Mich., getting money under false pretenses and getting drunk. Sent to the Detroit House of Correction for 60 days.

Mrs. Harriet S. Griffin, Methodist, Ypsilanti, Mich., suicide.

Rev. — Reynolds, Muhlenburg Co., Ky., brutally and repeatedly whipped his daughter, aged 18, to force her to marry a man she did not want.

Rev. Hiram Meeker, Granville, Washington Co., N. Y., fornication and adultery.

Rev. H. Foster, Circleville, O., was compelled to marry his servant girl whom he had seduced.

Rev. John Sully Watson, aged 65, Kansas, murdered his own wife.

Rev. — Johnson, seduced a child, 14 years old—Williamson Co., Tenn.

Rev. E. S. Whipple, Baptist, of Hillsdale College,

Mich., seduced a deacon's wife and confessed it, and then went and prayed with the deacon and wife (style, Beecher).

Rev. Richard Dunlop, Baptist, arrested for adultery with Mrs. Burnett—Midland, Mich.

Rev. — Davis, Baptist, Napoleon, Jackson Co., Mich.—adultery with sister Brunk.

Rev. Kirby, Chambersburgh, Ohio, fined two hundred dollars for seduction.

Rev. Dr. Houston, Baltimore, seduced several Sunday-school girls.

Rev. Isaac B. Smith drowned his wife.

Rev. Kendrick, Methodist, Brooklyn, N. Y.—intoxication and dancing. (On trial.)

Rev. Malcomb Clark, superintendent of Methodist Sunday-school, Howell, Mich., ran away with four hundred dollars belonging to his mother-in-law, and forged her name and others, for more money.

A. H. Howard, Jr., Bonker, Omro Co., Wis., Presbyterian—decamped, after borrowing all the money he could, with forty thousand dollars.

My regular record closes Apr. 6th. 1874. Since then, I have seen perhaps as many more cases, but have only clipped a few, which I append:

Washington, Pa., Oct. 24.—The Presbyterian Synod adjourned last night. A vote was taken on the case of Rev. White, charged with abduction, etc., and stood seventy to forty-one, to sustain the action of the Presbytery, convicting Mr. White.

Galion, O., November 20th.—Last night Mrs. Gottlieb Shultz, living four miles east of that town, committed suicide, by hanging herself in the cow shed. Religious excitement and hypochondria led her to commit the deed.

Toronto, December 2.—In the Provincial Lunatic Asylum, a female patient named Mrs. Newell, an English emigrant, afflicted with the notion that her five children's souls could not be saved unless she herself died some terrible death, set fire to her clothing, and then knelt in devotion while enveloped in the flames. The fire was extinguished, but the patient died next morning after great agony.

The Rev. J. A. Davidson, recently State Lecturer for the Grand Lodge of Good Templars, of Pennsylvania, was arrested at Erie, Pa., Wednesday evening, for drunkenness and disorderly conduct, and spent the night at the police station. He was released on payment of a fine. He has probably assisted in organizing more Lodges of the Order than any other man in the State.

Willard P. Hazen, Litchfield, Mich., Methodist exhorter and lawyer, forgery and sale of second mortgage. Decamped, 1875.

Rev. J. H. Ross, Baptist, Hartford, Van Buren Co., Mich., forgery.

From the above I should judge that a complete record of the whole country would show at least four hundred among the saints, who "slip up" in one way or another each month in the year. It is recorded that sinners "stand in slippery places," but the saints' legs seem to get badly "tangled" and they fall—religion and all.

Letters to a Preacher.

NO. X.

"There is, I think, an awful mistake in your philosophy, which is, that everything intangible is also uncertain. Our consciousness is a much higher grade of knowledge than any received through the senses. I do not claim for every person the spiritual sense, but there are those who know in whom they have believed, others not knowing, no more disproves the knowledge of those who have it, than the absence of the sense of smell in a few unfortunates disproves the existence of odors. You believe in nothing that is not material; do you not believe in a thought, in a mental conception, in a logical conclusion? There is as much material in a dead as in a living body. What then is volition?"—Rev. C. B.

Friend B., I do not profess to have any consciousness aside from that which comes through the medium of the senses, and know nothing of any such intangible thing, or no-thing, being in the possession of any one, and consequently am unable to discern wherein lies that "awful mistake in my Philosophy." It is very true that "not every person has the spiritual sense," but is it equally true that any have it? Many believe in ghosts, spirits, fairies, demons, angels, gods, etc., but mere belief never created tangibles out of intangibilities, real or unreal! The absence of the sense of smell in some does not disprove the existence of odors, because odors are material substances, real particles floating in the air, molecules whose size, force and velocity have in many instances been measured, computed and defined—compared with one another; but who can measure or define a "spiritual sense?" As to a thought or a mental conception I know nothing of these apart from matter. They are the results or manifestations of living, organized matter which is comprised within the limits of individual identities. If there be as much material in a dead as in a living body, this does not prove that the life of that body was immaterial, any more than is that of a dog or a cat or a tree. What life really is, has never yet been satisfactorily explained. To say that it is soul, mind or spirit, is to give utterance to words that have no real meaning, for what does any one know of these things separate from living organism? Trees and plants have life, but have they mind or soul? As long as men are content to think "God breathed into man the breath of life," just so long will the "shadow of the cross" keep the world in ignorance, by hindering the search for the real cause and origin of life, soul and mind. It is absolutely necessary that all belief in gods, christs, heavens and hells shall be totally eradicated from the minds of the people, before we can expect them to become receptive to all the real facts of nature. The more actual knowledge we obtain the less use we have for these gods and christs. The greater the development of humanity itself into all that is great and good, the less use and need we perceive of these intangibilities. Our first duty is to make of ourselves all that we possibly can, to become wise and learned in real facts, and live out in our daily lives so much of goodness, that the poor blind bigots will no longer cry "The cross, the cross alone can make us wise."

"Has not this cross, this emblem of salvation.

Rendered this life a temporal damnation?

Is not the crucifix a horrid sight?

Yet Christian Yahoos view it with delight.

The Cabinet.

"Ever since the great flood, and perhaps long before, All men have had Hobbies—some one and some more— But whether we ride upon one, two, or three, Hobby-horse riding has always been free."

Our modern Spiritualists, especially of the materializing type, distress, if not offend us with their cabinet—their hobby. They can't get us up saint nor sinner, Indian, squaw, pappoose, nor Witch of the mountain, without a cabinet—some little sly nook.

And there is our excellent His Excellency, of the Empire State. He, too, has his Cabinet—his private abode—his sanctum-sanctorum—where he materializes the Executive wisdom of the State, in approvals and *veto*es of the herculean labors of the ostensible representatives of the Sovereign People.

Should we go up to Uncle Samuel's House, on the banks of the Potomac, will we see Uncle Samuel? Not this year. We might find a Cabinet.

Three score and ten years ago, when Bible reading was part and parcel of Christian duty—the punishment of children—my tender piety was horrified at the idea of the Lord God of Israel's shutting himself up in an ark—cabinet—coop—45x27x27 inches. If you don't like my measure please measure for yourself—see Exodus xxv. 10.

I, too, have my cabinet—my sanctum—where I enjoy and endure the sweets of solitude. For amusement and sociability I get the germs of interesting plants. To materialize the germs to tangible, seeable, smellable, enjoyable actuality, I find the cabinet indispensable. A pot of dirt! Largely would I prefer something more ethereal.

Why is it that all the good and pretty things vouchsafed by heaven to us materialized immortals, must come through earthy media? (See 2 Cor. iv. 7.)

Were I under the disagreeable necessity of answering the question so unwittingly asked, may I would do it something thusly, to wit: In the process of materialization—taking on the earthly—we get our spiritual perceptions blunted—get mixed up—muddled—with earthy elements—earthly appetites and propensities—out of which shoots forth, not exactly a Canada thistle—not a tobacco plant nor skunk cabbage—a something, very much like nothing, that nobody can endure in other folks, however much they may hug it up in themselves. Some call it Ego.

In deep consideration of all and singular the facts and premises aforesaid, I fail to discover a better way than to be reconciled to the Divine overruling.

Many a time, in early childhood days, I sacrificed my little great Ego on the altar of obedience, just to please my earthly mamma.

Why not, now, make sacrifices to please my heavenly mamma?

What nonsense to talk about a papa in heaven and never a mamma! Who wants a monstrosity heaven?

There are now—may be, in all the "worlds without end"—times when a mamma to sing the lullaby would be decidedly refreshing.

Unclothed mental vision—clear views of mamma as well as of papa—in all the heavens above us, reconciles me even to the chastening rod—to any, and all, ordeals needful to make me as Holy Eternal Mamma and Papa would have me to be—to enable the Heavens to be pleased with me—and me with them. Amen.

PRENTISS.

How VERY ODD!—Christianity is based upon an imaginary failure in the Infinite! It assures us that God failed about six thousand years since, when he "repented" having formed a human being (Gen. vi. 6). Moreover, it calls on us to believe that the Infinite comes off second best in the fight between himself and the Devil. Nay, Jesus himself (Matt. vii. 13) accords the greater proportion of human souls (for whose salvation he shed his blood,) as having at the last day been victimized by his great enemy, the Devil. And what an idea! The Devil outwitting the Infinite God! However, for myself, I must say that I do not see why the one that proves, in a fair fight, the most successful should not sustain the highest rank, and stand confessed, by all his competitors, as the head of the heap.

and tried at Edinburgh for having denied the inspiration of the Scriptures, and for having, on several occasions, when cold, wished himself in hell that he might get warm. Notwithstanding the poor boy recanted and begged for mercy, he was found guilty and hanged. His body was thrown in a hole at the foot of the scaffold and covered with stones.

Prosecutions and executions like this were common in every Christian country, and all of them were based upon the belief that an intellectual conviction is a crime.

No wonder the Church hated and traduced the author of the "Age of Reason."

England was filled with Puritan gloom and Episcopal ceremony. All religious conceptions were of the grossest nature. The ideas of crazy fanatics and extravagant poets were taken as sober facts. Milton had clothed Christianity in the soiled and faded finery of the gods—had added to the story of Christ the fables of Mythology. He gave to the Protestant Church the most outrageously material ideas of the Deity. He turned all the angels into soldiers—made Heaven a battlefield, put Christ in uniform, and described God as a militia general. His works were considered by the Protestants nearly as sacred as the Bible itself, and the imagination of the people was thoroughly polluted by the horrible imagery, the sublime absurdity of the blind Milton.

Heaven and hell were realities—the judgment-day was expected—books of account would be opened. Every man would hear the charges against him read. God was supposed to sit on a golden throne, surrounded by the tallest angels, with harps in their hands and crowns on their heads. The goats would be thrust into eternal fire on the left, while the orthodox sheep on the right were to gambol on sunny slopes forever and forever.

The nation was profoundly ignorant, and consequently extremely religious, so far as belief was concerned.

In Europe, Liberty was lying chained in the Inquisition—her white bosom stained with blood. In the new world the Puritans had been hanging and burning in the name of God, and selling white Quaker children into slavery in the name of Christ, who said, "Suffer little children to come unto me."

Under such conditions progress was impossible. Some one had to lead the way. The Church is, and always has been, incapable of a forward movement. Religion always looks back. The Church has already reduced Spain to a guitar, Italy to a hand-organ, and Ireland to exile.

Some one not connected with the Church had to attack the monster that was eating out the heart of the world. Some one had to sacrifice himself for the good of all. The people were in the most abject slavery; their manhood had been taken from them by pomp, by pageantry and power. Progress is born of doubt and inquiry. The Church never doubts—never inquires. To doubt is heresy—to inquire is to admit that you do not know—the Church does neither.

More than a century ago Catholicism, wrapped in robes red with the innocent blood of millions, holding in her frantic clutch crowns and sceptres, honors and gold, the keys of heaven and hell, trampling beneath her feet the liberties of nations, in the proud moment of almost universal dominion, felt within her heartless breast the deadly dagger of Voltaire. From that blow the Church never can recover. Livid with hatred she launched her eternal anathema at the great destroyer, and ignorant Protestants have echoed the curse of Rome.

In our country the Church was all-powerful, and although divided into many sects, would instantly unite to repel a common foe.

Paine struck the first grand blow.

The "Age of Reason" did more to undermine the power of the Protestant Church than all other books then known. It furnished an immense amount of food for thought. It was written for the average mind, and is a straight-forward, honest investigation of the Bible, and of the Christian system.

Paine did not falter from the first page to the last. He gives you his candid thought, and candid thoughts are always valuable.

The "Age of Reason" has liberalized us all. It put arguments in the mouths of the people; it put the Church on the defensive; it enabled somebody in every village to corner the parson; it made the world wiser, and the Church better; it took power from the pulpit and divided it among the pews.

Just in proportion that the human race has advanced, the Church has lost power. There is no exception to this rule.

No nation ever materially advanced that held strictly to the religion of its founders.

No nation ever gave itself wholly to the control of the Church without losing its power, its honor and existence.

Every Church pretends to have found the exact truth. This is the end of progress. Why pursue that which you have? Why investigate when you know?

Every creed is a rock in running water; humanity sweeps by it. Every creed cries to the Universe, "Halt!" A creed is the ignorant past, bullying the enlightened present.

The ignorant are not satisfied with what can be demonstrated. Science is too slow for them, and so they invent creeds. They demand completeness. A sublime segment, a grand fragment, are of no value to them. The demand they complete circle—the entire structure.

In music they want a melody with a recurring accent at measured periods. In religion they insist upon immediate answers to the questions of creation and destiny. The alpha and omega of all things must be in the alphabet of their superstition. A religion that cannot answer every question, and guess every conundrum is, in their estimation, worse than worthless. They desire a kind of theological dictionary—a religious ready reckoner, together with guideboards at all crossings and turns. They mistake impudence for authority, solemnity for wisdom, and pathos for inspiration. The beginning and the end are what they demand. The grand flight of the eagle is nothing to them. They want the nest in which he was hatched, and especially the dry limb upon which he roosts. Anything that can be learned is hardly worth knowing. The present is considered of no value in itself. Happiness must not be expected this side of the clouds, and can only be attained by self-denial and faith; not self-denial for the good of others, but for the salvation of your own sweet self.

Paine denied the authority of bibles and creeds—this was his crime—and for this the world shut the door in his face, and emptied its slops upon him from the windows.

I challenge the world to show that Thomas Paine ever wrote one line, one word in favor of tyranny—in favor of immorality; one line, one word against what he believed to be for the highest and best interests of mankind; one line, one word against justice, charity, or liberty, and yet he has been pursued as though he had been a fiend from hell. His memory has been execrated as though he had murdered some Urah for his wife; driven some Hagar into the desert to starve with his child upon her bosom; defiled his own daughters; ripped open with the sword the sweet bodies of loving and innocent women; advised one brother to assassinate another; kept a harem with seven hundred wives, and three hundred concubines, or had persecuted Christians even unto strange cities.

The Church has pursued Paine to deter others. No effort has been in any age of the world spared to crush out opposition. The Church used painting, music and architecture, simply to degrade mankind. But there are men that nothing can awe. There have been at all times brave spirits that dared even the gods. Some proud head has always been above the waves. In every age some Diogenes has sacrificed to all the gods. True genius never cowers, and there is always some Samson feeling for the pillars of authority.

Cathedrals and domes, and chimes and chants—temples frescoed and groined and carved, and gilded with gold—altars and tapers, and paintings of virgin and babe—censer and chalice, chasuble, paten and alb—organs and anthems and incense rising to the winged and blest—maniple, amice and stole—crosses and crosiers, tiaras and crowns—mitres and missals and masses—rosaries, relics and robes—martyrs and saints, and windows stained as with the blood of Christ, never for one moment awed the brave, proud spirit of the Infidel. He knew that all the pomp and glitter had been purchased with liberty—that priceless jewel of the soul. In looking at the cathedral he remembered the dungeon. The music of the organ was not loud enough to drown the clank of fetters. He could not forget that the taper had lighted the fagot. He knew that the cross adorned the hilt of the sword, and so where others worshiped, he wept and scorned.

The doubter, the investigator, the Infidel, have been the saviors of liberty. This truth is beginning to be realized, and the intellectual are beginning to honor the brave thinkers of the past.

But the Church is as unforgiving as ever, and still wonders why any Infidel should be wicked enough to endeavor to destroy her power.

I will tell the Church why.

You have imprisoned the human mind; you have been the enemy of liberty; you have burned us at the stake—wasted us upon slow fires—torn our flesh with iron; you have covered us with chains—treated us as outcasts; you have filled the world with fear; you have taken our wives and children from our arms; you have confiscated our property; you have denied us the right to testify in courts of justice; you have branded us with infamy; you have torn out our tongues; you have refused us burial. In the name of your religion, you have robbed us of every right; and after having inflicted upon us every evil that can be inflicted in this world, you have fallen upon your knees, and with clasped hands, implored your God to torment us forever.

Can you wonder that we hate your doctrines—that we despise your creeds—that we feel proud to know that we are beyond your power—that we are free in spite of you—that we can express our honest thought, and that the whole world is grandly rising into the blessed light?

Can you wonder that we point with pride to the fact, that Infidelity has ever been found battling for the rights of man, for the liberty of conscience, and for the happiness of all?

Can you wonder that we are proud to know, that we have always been disciples of Reason, and soldiers of Freedom; that we have denounced tyranny and superstition, and have kept our hands unstained with human blood?

We deny that religion is the end or object of this life. When it is so considered it becomes destructive of happiness—the real end of life. It becomes a hydra-headed monster, reaching in terrible coils from the heavens, and thrusting its thousand fangs into the bleeding, quivering hearts of men. It devours their substance, builds palaces for God (who dwells not in temples made with hands), and allows his children to die in huts and hovels. It fills the earth with mourning, heaven with hatred, the present with fear, and all the future with despair.

Virtue is a subordination of the passions to the intellect. It is to act in accordance with your highest convictions. It does not consist in believing, but in doing.

This is the sublime truth that the Infidels in all ages have uttered. They have handed the torch from one to the other through all the years that have fled. Upon the altar of Reason they have kept the sacred fire, and through the long midnight of faith, they fed the divine flame.

Infidelity is liberty; all religion is slavery. In every creed, man is the slave of God—woman is the slave of man, and the sweet children are the slaves of all.

We do not want creeds; we want knowledge—we want happiness.

And yet we are told by the Church that we have accomplished nothing; that we are simply destroyers; that we tear down without building again.

Is it nothing to free the mind? Is it nothing to civilize mankind? Is it nothing to fill the world with light, with discovery, with science? Is it nothing to dignify man and exalt the intellect? Is it nothing to grope your way into the dreary prisons, the damp and dropping dungeons, the dark and silent cells, where the souls of men are chained to the floors of stone, to greet them like a ray of light, like the song of a bird, the murmur of a stream, to see the dull eyes open and grow slowly bright, to feel yourself grasped by the shrunken and unused hands, and hear yourself thanked by a strange and hollow voice?

Is it nothing to conduct these souls gradually into the blessed light of day—to let them see again the happy fields, the sweet, green earth, and hear the everlasting music of the waves? Is it nothing to make men wipe the dust from their swollen knees, the tears from their blanched and furrowed cheeks? Is it a small thing to reave the heavens of an insatiate monster and write upon the eternal dome, glittering with stars, the grand word—FREEDOM?

Is it a small thing to quench the flames of hell with the holy tears of pity—to unbind the martyr from the stake—break all the chains—put out the fires of civil war—stay the sword of the fanatic; and tear the bloody hands of the Church from the white throat of Science?

Is it a small thing to make men truly free—to destroy the dogmas of ignorance, prejudice and power—the poisoned fables of superstition, and drive from the beautiful face of the earth the fiend of Fear?

It does seem as though the most zealous Christian must at times entertain some doubt as to the divine origin of his religion. For eighteen hundred years the doctrine has been preached. For more than a thousand years the Church had, to a great extent, control of the civilized world, and what has been the result? Are the Christian nations patterns of charity and forbearance?

On the contrary, their principal business is to destroy each other. More than five millions of Christians are trained, educated, and drilled to murder their fellow-Christians. Every nation is groaning under a vast debt incurred in carrying on war against other Christians, or defending themselves from Christian assault. The world is covered with forts to protect Christians from Christians; and every sea is covered with iron monsters ready to blow Christian brains into eternal froth. Millions upon millions are annually expended in the effort to construct still more deadly and terrible engines of death. Industry is crippled, honest toil is robbed, and even beggary is taxed to defray the expenses of Christian warfare. There must be some other way to reform this world. We have tried creed, and dogma and fable, and they have failed; and they have failed in all the nations dead.

The people perish for the lack of knowledge. Nothing but education—scientific education—can benefit mankind. We must find out the laws of nature and conform to them.

We need free bodies and free minds—free labor and free thought—chainless hands, and fetterless brains. Free labor will give us wealth. Free thought will give us truth.

We need men with moral courage to speak and write their real thoughts, and to stand by their convictions, even to the very death. We need have no fear of being too radical. The future will verify all grand and brave predictions. Paine was splendidly in advance of his time; but he was orthodox compared with the Infidels of to-day.

Science, the great Iconoclast, has been busy since 1809, and by the highway of Progress are the broken images of the past.

On every hand the people advance. The Vicar of God has been pushed from the throne of the Caesars, and upon the roofs of the Eternal City falls once more the shadow of the Eagle.

All has been accomplished by the heroic few. The men of science have explored heaven and earth, and with infinite patience have furnished the facts. The brave thinkers have used them. The gloomy caverns of superstition have been transformed into temples of thought, and the demons of the past are the angels of to-day.

Science took a handful of sand, constructed a telescope, and with it explored the starry depths of heaven. Science wrested from the gods their thunderbolts; and now the electric spark freighted with thought and love, flashes under all the waves of the sea. Science took a tear from the cheek of unpaid labor, converted it into steam, created a giant that turns with tireless arm, the countless wheels of toil.

Thomas Paine was one of the intellectual heroes—one of the men to whom we are indebted. His name is associated forever with the Great Republic. As long as free government exists he will be remembered, admired and honored.

He lived a long, laborious and useful life. The world is better for his having lived. For the sake of truth he accepted hatred and reproach for his portion. He ate the bitter bread of sorrow. His friends were untrue to him because he was true to himself, and true to them. He lost the respect of what is called society, but kept his own. His life is what the world calls failure, and what history calls success.

If to love your fellow men more than self is goodness, Thomas Paine was good.

If to be in advance of your time, to be a pioneer in the direction of light, is greatness, Thomas Paine was great.

If to avow your principles and discharge your duty in the presence of death is heroic, Thomas Paine was a hero.

At the age of seventy-three death touched his tired heart. He died in the land his genius defended—under the flag he gave to the skies. Slander cannot touch him now—hatred cannot reach him more. He sleeps in the sanctuary of the tomb, beneath the quiet of the stars.

A few more years—a few more brave men—a few more rays of light, and mankind will venerate the memory of him who said:

"Any system of religion that shocks the mind of a child cannot be a true system;"

"The world is my country, and to do good my religion."

"Farewell Poetry."

I confess to reading with great pleasure, in the last number of THE TRUTH SEEKER, Dr. Marvin's most poetic elaboration of the idea that poetry, like pearls, is the product of disease, and if in positive conclusions he did not get much beyond Pope's well-known couplet,

"Great wits to madness nearly are allied,
And thin partitions do the bounds divide," still there was a suggestiveness in his thought, as well as a beauty in its presentation that won upon us far beyond the usual productions of the Liberal Club.

But what about the "farewell poetry"? To supersede Poetry by Science is like superseding a flower garden by a cornfield, or the graces of life by its utilities—this truth, however, remains, that just so far as any domain is thoroughly explored by the intellect, just so far it becomes untenable to the imagination. We see this in both poetry and fiction. No one now but a Spiritualist would write a Hamlet with a ghost in it, and it is certain that our enjoyment of that play is very much diminished by our entire disbelief in the reality of the apparition. We are only preserved from a feeling of incongruity by placing ourselves in imagination in the position of our forefathers, and looking at the play through their eyes. Writers of romances in our day have been driven from gods and heroes, and even from lovers, to characters which are really psychological studies, as we see in the works of George Elliot, George Sand, Spielhagen etc.

But we may ask, is it probable that the realm of the unknown, which is also that of the imagination, will ever be fully explored? When a human being becomes to us like a type-writing machine, and we can not only produce a certain effect by touching a certain key, but trace with entire freedom and certainty the chain of causation through all the levers of the machine, then, no doubt, the domain of poetry will be greatly reduced; but meanwhile to say that Dr. Marvin, or Dr. Draper, is insane because he possesses a nature so tremblingly alive to the harmony of thought and expression that he gives us a medical lecture which is at the same time a poem, is evidently a misuse of language.

It is well to note also that, whatever merit the class of literature to which Lizzie Doten's poems belong may possess, it has always a false ring, the disease crops out, it smacks strongly of imitation, and does not, among judges, pass for the true metal. The only exception to this remark, so far as I know, is both the prose and poetry of T. L. Harris. There is real genius, but is there real disease? All fanatical movements contain a proportion of hypocrites, who are, as often as otherwise, the leaders themselves. It is, however, only fair to say, that there is a type of mind which seems to be a connecting link between genius and disease. I have in my mind a great preacher who walks among men with introverted eye, whose most successful sermons cost him no effort (many of them are printed and enjoy a wide circulation), and who, if not a very profound man, possesses a keen insight into human nature, and is, moreover, one of the finest rhetoricians in the country.

There is a tendency of the mind, when it acts intently to exclude from itself all memory of other domains of thought and feeling, and to act and speak as if they did not exist. For instance, when we are at a comedy, we can form no idea whatever of a funeral, and vice versa; when we are charging the enemy on horseback, with a revolver in each hand, we can form but little idea of how we would feel when addressing a peace society. To men like Bentham and Elder Mill, absorbed in the pursuit of truth, poetry and puerility seem synonymous terms, just as to a poet, the man who spends a fine morning bagging insects seems like a fool, so that while it is certain that advancing discovery will trench still further on the domain where the imagination yet rules supreme; yet those who have the best right to speak assure us that what we know, in proportion to our ignorance, is illustrated by the space occupied by the stars in proportion to the surrounding darkness, and that it always must be so. If this is true, imagination will always possess her field in which to weave with our emotions the flowers of poetry.

Since the above was written Dr. Marvin has explained that, in his view, poetry has lost its place as a controlling power over human thought, although it would still be retained as a companion for lighter hours, and mentioned Paradise Lost as the last poem that seriously influenced the minds of men.

Let us not disregard that which is before our eyes because it seems common. Whittier's anti-slavery songs chanted by the plaintive voices of the Hutchinsons from the Atlantic to the Pacific, were not without their influence in arousing the North to one of the most heroic struggles the world ever saw. Mrs. Stowe's "Uncle Tom," which is really a poem, had its share also in the great awakening. The John Brown song echoing through every gorge from the Atlantic to the Gulf, cheered in hundreds of dreary marches the tired legions of the North. Is this an unpoetic age? The first flash of the wire under the Atlantic thrilled through more hearts with a deeper sense of triumph than the news of the battle of Waterloo. Have we no great epics? Draper's "Intellectual Development of Europe," every line of which is sonorous with a rhythm that reminds you of an organ, is perhaps the greatest epic ever written. It is nothing less than the great sad story of the human race, and to turn from it to the Iliad is like returning to the toys of childhood.

So full is all science, literature and art of wonders almost achieved, as triumph succeeds triumph, and vista opens upon vista, and we see everywhere the first of those morning beams which we fondly hope will dispel the night of ignorance and suffering, and usher in the broad daylight of knowledge and the warmth of love.

If a statement of the poetic elements of the present seems to border on exaggeration, we must remember that once only in the whole history of literature has an effort to clothe the present in the robe of poetry succeeded: viz, in "Byron's Battle of Waterloo." Every age has said to itself, "This is the age of prose." Never until the sharp lines of the intellectual demarcations of the present have been mellowed by the distance of time, has the picture assumed the softened outline of an Indian summer landscape. Here is felt to be one of the deepest antagonisms of life. The intellect is ever active with its never ending subdivisions (all knowledge is classification), while the whole effort of art, and its twin sister religion, is to impart to life a unity. That passion for religion, that instinct for unity burned the martyrs and led Comte to wish to burn the libraries, and in the possible reconciliation of these diverse elements lies one of the great problems of the future.

Dr. Marvin Sustained.

MR. EDITOR: I have read with much interest Dr. Marvin's lecture in your last number. A study of mental pathology led me to the conclusion that insanity in some of those forms which I class as emotional, the milder epilepsy, catalepsy and erethistic mania, was the basis of the phenomena attributed in all ages to supernatural inspiration. In an article on Prof. Tyndall, I stated, "The discoveries of mental pathologists cannot readily be laid before the public. I will simply state, however, that they explain all the phenomena covered by the vague term inspiration by natural causes, and destroy the doctrine of revelation through inspired men or writings as effectually as physiology does the doctrine of immortality." In illustration, I condensed Maudsley's essay on Swedenborg, and published it as a newspaper article, bringing out a series of replies from "New Jerusalem," to which I retorted, quoting the diary of Swedenborg as evidence of his insanity.

In an article headed "Clerical Criticism," called forth by attacks from the local clergy and a vagabond lecturer from Brooklyn, I stated: "The Rev. R. Whittingham, when he intimated that Prof. Huxley was suffering from delirium tremens when he wrote, 'Extinguished theologians lie about the cradle of every science as the strangled snakes beside that of Hercules,' in deducing all the phenomena of that fearful malady from the single word snakes, suggested the idea of testing men's physical and mental condition by an examination of their writings. The 'Emissary of the Devil's Pulpit' reflecting on this, instituted the de lunatico inquirendo of the dead, and Swedenborg leads a melancholy and inspired train to the asylums of the blest."

So few are acquainted with even the rudiments of the pathology of the mind, and such incorrect ideas of insanity prevail, that the subject is one difficult to handle in newspaper articles, yet it is important that knowledge on this subject should be disseminated. I have known most clear cases of insanity terminating in suicide and incurable mania and death, where the friends of the parties resented any intimation that the mind was affected, and could not be induced to use such measures as would have prevented a tragical conclusion. In fact, the worst cases of insanity that I have ever observed, have not been recognized, perhaps not suspected, by the families or friends of the subject. As Maudsley remarks, "It is a vulgar and mischievous error to suppose that a person who speaks rationally and behaves with propriety cannot be mad."

In an article on insanity, printed in a local paper, speaking of inspired authors, I say: "Ancient times furnished many examples of such writings, of which the Book of Enoch, giving the names of the Angels, the Watchers of Heaven, describing the Son of Man, the Ancient of Days, and the Throne of God, in language that cannot be surpassed, is a splendid and striking example. Nor is there any reason why such books should not be read and admired, now that their origin is explained and understood. As the diseased oyster produces the pearl, so gems of thought and pearls of wisdom may be distilled from brains whose inspiration is derived from erethistic mania or cataleptic ecstasy."

Dr. Marvin is on the right track. I am glad that he exempted Homer, though I am a little uncertain as regards Shakspeare and Goethe. Could he not give us an explanation of the phenomena of materialized spirits?

Christian Intolerance.

MR. EDITOR: I have heard much said about the bigotry and intolerance of Roman Catholic priests, in lands where they control both Church and State; but such an incident as the following has never before fallen under my immediate notice.

A few weeks since, a friend of mine, a gentleman of liberal views, wooed and won the hand of an estimable young lady, also of my acquaintance, and the wedding day was set (April 18th, 1875). My friend, Mr. E. V. Robinson (of Dowagiac, Mich.), being a Freethinker, preferred to be married by a Justice; but his betrothed, a member of the M. E. Church in the village of Osseo, Hillsdale Co., Mich., desired that the ceremony should be performed by an Elder of the same Church, named Rev. Ebenezer Hunt, with whom she and her family had been intimately acquainted for many years, and whom she regarded as an old and true friend. To satisfy both parties a double ceremony was proposed, and it was agreed that Mr. Hunt should first marry them, and then that the ceremony should be repeated by the Justice. Accordingly this man of God was interviewed by Mr. R. and informed of Miss Bradley's wish, with their long acquaintance and friendship as a reason. Mr. H. made no objections and the matter was considered settled. The appointed time approaches, the arrangements are nearly completed and all is well. The wedding day arrives, brighter and more cheerful than for several days previous, but as it advances the wind shifts to a colder quarter and threatening clouds arise.

We may now fancy the happy groom once more wending his way to the abode of this clerical friend of his bride, and congratulating himself on the concert of favorable auspices, the approval of friends and acquaintances, the intellectual character, high moral worth, and undoubted affection of the woman he loved, which seemed to augur prosperity and happiness along their future path. But pause! He stands in the shadow of that preacher's roof, and there, without previous intimation, this Stone of Help; this Ebenezer Hunt flatly informed my friend that he could not marry a "Christian lady to a disbeliever"—he did not say to a disbelieving gentleman.

And now as this condemned heretic seeks the happy home where his fair lady is waiting, what are those anxious thoughts and questions which thus darken his countenance? But prejudice and bigotry formed no part of Miss P.'s mental make-up. Love's dictates were, and ever should be, more potent than priest or parsons. Accordingly they were joined in matrimony by Mr. Hiram Decker, a justice of the peace in Osseo. The clergy and the laity of both Romish and Protestant churches in this country, (or at least a large majority of them), are glad of any and every opportunity to bully, bribe and persecute the Freethinkers of this land into cowardly, if not tame, submission to their unrighteous and ungodly rule. And then these same priests have the consummate impudence to get up in their pulpits and preach to the people about religious liberty. Every person who harbors the idea of religious freedom as a present reality in America, is either one who knows nothing on the subject—one who never thinks—or an inexcusable idiot, made such by his religion.

In my opinion, the day is not far distant when Freethinkers must either shed blood or lose the last semblance of their freedom. It seems to me that any one of common sense cannot fail to perceive this truth. I know of but one remedy namely: for the Freethinkers to rally in their own defense, and organize on a common basis, and that speedily.

New-York Liberal Club.

[It has been inconvenient for us to be present at the two recent meetings of the LIBERAL CLUB, and having quite imperfect notes, and the subjects treated and discussed not being especially interesting, and as we have an abundance of other matter we are anxious to place before our readers, we will omit our usual Liberal Club report in this issue.—Ed. T. S.]

Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton.

About the middle of May, the National Woman's Suffrage Association held their annual convention in the new Masonic Hall, twenty-third st. and sixth ave., in this city. I was only present at the afternoon meeting. Among the speakers to whom I listened, was the lady whose name heads this article. What a vision of matronly beauty she is to be sure! I only wonder that any masculine remains unconverted who comes within hearing of her voice. She is a complete mistress of her subject, and her clear, concise, yet pointed ways of expressing herself make her a most effective speaker. Her speech was a rehash of the old arguments, well seasoned with new and original illustrations. I do not know how others were affected, but for the first time I found occasion to differ from Mrs. Stanton. In naming the different objections made to giving woman the ballot, the one she said upon which most stress was laid, is that politics would contaminate women—and just here let me say, my experience has been the same in this matter. One would certainly think from the argument, that men turned fiends on election day, and became too terrible for contact with other creatures. Now really they are the same men who jostle and crowd us in the street cars, and allow us to stand invariably. I protest against this shabby excuse. A woman who has been compelled to ride daily on an eighth or third ave. car has served an apprenticeship which renders her fully competent to vote. If their are any worse specimens at the polls, let us treat them in the way Holmes would treat a constitutional liar "chloroform him gently out of existence." But to return to Mrs. Stanton—and it was really a great breach of etiquette to interrupt her—I ask her pardon—admitting the low tone, of ward rooms, she suggested a substitute for them. "The act of voting" said she "is one of the most important acts of life, I would suggest, that on election days, the churches be thrown open, and in the house of God, with the organ sounding forth sacred music, the act should be performed in the most solemn and reverential manner." How do our orthodox friends relish this? Next thing we shall hear of stock-gamblers and gold-brokers, playing their tricks at the very foot of the altar. They do, now, only I mean their every-day tricks, not their Sunday ones. Holy voting! Of course, everything done inside the church is holy, no matter if it's adultery. What a ridiculous proposition this was on Mrs. Stanton's part. It is the old idea, the old heaven still working—in the precincts of the church everything must be more pure and honest than without—as if the man or woman in whose soul there exists no sense of truth and honor, could suddenly be changed into such. I don't object to using churches for any purpose of public meetings, but not with the idea of instilling by such use, higher and purer ideas of duty and honesty. Look how each daily paper swells the list of tricky and dishonest clergymen, until soon they will be so numerous that they may join hands and span the earth. As an example of church voting let me cite a recent occurrence in this city in one of the largest and wealthiest congregations, to wit, Dr. Chapin's. Some years ago a society was formed among the ladies of this church; a subscription raised and a home built for the aged and infirm, called "the Chapin Home." A President and other officers were duly elected, and matters went on well until recently, at an election of officers for the present year, some objection was made to the matron of the home, and the wrangle grew so fierce that two fifth ave. millionaires, husbands of two ladies in one of the contesting factions were ejected from the meeting, and the result is a falling off of many wealthy families from the church. Here was reverential holy voting in church and on church matters. I am afraid if our saintly church people make such failures, the effect on the common multitude won't be of a very elevating character when churches are turned into ward-rooms—and what is there of a reverential character in the churches of to-day? The Catholic Church contains most that is consistent. The Virgin Mary is worshiped, and surely, as the sparkling little lecturer Laura Cuppy Smith says, "She ought to be held in high esteem, since she brought forth the Savior of the world without the assistance of any man." We have no objection to women clinging to the church, but let them no longer be blinded to the fact that honesty and truth are inherent in men's souls, and not the product of creed or church. Men's acts are not affected by the place, but by the inner sense of right and justice which prompts them.

The idea that women will sweep in as a grand disinfectant, to purify the political atmosphere is a great mistake. But whether for better or for worse, her right to the ballot is undoubted. If men were as ready to hang for us, and suffer the penalty of our crimes, as they are to vote for us, we should be better satisfied.

When political corruption and fraud have gone their full length, then comes a reaction. "When things are at their worst, they are sure to mend" said Dolly Varden. I am convinced if women ever get the ballot, they will very easily adjust themselves to circumstances, and whether it be to the inspiring notes of hand-organs playing "Mulligan Guards," or a church choir peeling forth "Nearer my God to thee," we shall be equal to the occasion, and do our duty or neglect it, just as men do, according to our several capacities.

DR. VENON.

God in the Constitution.

The following notice of a speech made by Ex-Gov. CHARLES ROBINSON, of Kansas, delivered at Leavenworth, in that State, June 20th, was sent us by a friend. It has the right ring, and possesses argument and truth:

Taking the resolutions of the amendment convention as his text, he thought it pertinent to enquire what sort of a God it is that is desired in the National Constitution. He began at the beginning and elaborated the picture of the God of Genesis—a being that was so uncertain of his purpose and power that he he did things that he was very sorry for afterwards, and vented the evil results of his mistakes upon the innocent creatures he had created. He traced the God-notion of the ancient Jews through all their history, and marked with keen analysis the weakness of his character and the insufficiency of his power. It was a rare presentation of the God-thought of the historical religions of christendom. Coming down to the modern times, he showed the great diversity of men's notions about God, and outlined the peculiar distinctions of the many sects in their interpretations of the God-idea. Then he held up the difficulty of making any particular notion, or the idea of any particular sect, the idea of the nation. This much done, it was easy to show the trials that must ensue when any general thought of God should become the national expression. Each one must give to the expression his own interpretation, and the war of the sects would then be fairly inaugurated. The Governor called attention to the fact that the world had been in existence a long time, and many nations had lived—flourished, and worshiped God devoutly, and pious people had sacrificed thousands of human lives to their own God, yet it was only after a nation came that is now called Godless, a nation that makes no national expression of belief in God, that the freedom of man and the horror of slavery was well established and the worth of the human soul fully declared by the national law and practice. If the terrors of the past, and the inhumanities of the ancient nations were done under the supervision of the Deity they were so constant in acknowledging, and the grandest truths of life have been established in the world by a nation that has no Divine King, what claim can be urged in favor of such an acknowledgment now? The point was well put, and the attention of all our anti-slavery friends is called to it. Altogether it was a very fine exposure of the want of intelligence in this direction of the Constitution makers. We hope the lecture will not be filed away in some drawer, for it ought to be given a wide circulation. In this effort the Governor only followed the logical course of his whole life—the defense of liberty and the bursting of all foolish bubbles. We hope the Governor will preach often.

THE "HOLY TRINITY."—And why do you say "trinity," when your Bible describes four "persons," real or imaginary? Yes, four invisibles are named, but of whose personal identity nothing is known. And these four, it is said, perform all the Bible miracles; and, according to modern Christianity as it appears in Methodist and other "revival" sects, the Christian Devil or "the fourth person" in the Bible coterie, performs all the miracles in modern Spiritualism. But which of them it may have been that "inspired" the writers of the Bible we do not know, nor what invisible, if any, that this book represents as having also "inspired" snakes, locusts, frogs, flies, camels, oxen, asses, sheep, and doves, including one calf, and nondescript monsters, with "ten horns and seven heads," having "eyes before and behind."

Bible Contradictions.

READER: Is the Bible Divine or Human? Is it the word of God or the work of man? If the first, it must be perfect, true and uncontradictory; if the last, it may be imperfect, untrue and contradictory. If it is found to be the latter, it cannot be of God. Have you searched the Scriptures? Have you attentively read the Bible? What do you think of its truthfulness? We commend a few passages to your consideration.

I have seen God face to face. . . . No man hath seen God at any time.

With God all things are possible. . . . And the Lord was with Judah, and he drave out the inhabitants of the mountain; but could not drive out the inhabitants of the valley, because they had chariots of iron.

I am the Lord, I change not. I will not go back, neither will I repent. . . . And God repented of the evil that he said he would do unto them, and he did it not.

There is no respect of persons with God. . . . Jacob have I loved, and Esau have I hated.

Is not my way equal? . . . For whosoever hath, to him shall be given; but whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken away even that he hath.

I am a jealous God, visiting the iniquities of the fathers upon the children. . . . The son shall not bear the iniquity of the father.

It is impossible for God to lie. . . . If the Prophet be deceived when he hath spoken a thing, I the Lord have deceived that prophet.

Take no thought for the morrow. . . . But if any provide not for his own, and especially for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith and is worse than an infidel.

All they that take the sword shall perish with the sword. . . . He that hath no sword, let him sell his sword and buy one.

Provide neither gold nor silver nor scrip for your journey, neither shoes nor yet staves. . . . Take nothing save a staff only; no scrip, no bread, no money, but be shod with sandals.

Be not afraid of them that kill the body. . . . And after these things Jesus would not walk in Jewry, because the Jews sought to kill him.

Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy. . . . The new moons and sabbaths I cannot away with; it is iniquity.

Thou shalt not commit adultery. . . . All the women children keep alive for yourselves.

Whore-mongers and adulterers God will judge. . . . Then said the Lord unto me, Go yet, love a woman, an adulteress.

If brethren dwell together and one of them die, the wife of the dead shall not marry without; her husband's brother shall take her to wife. . . . If a man shall take his brother's wife, it is an unclean thing.

I counsel thee to keep the king's commandment. . . . But the midwives feared God, and did not as the king commanded.

Let every soul be subject to the higher powers. . . . Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, answered and said: Be it known unto thee, O king, that we will not serve thy gods nor worship the golden image which thou hast set up.

For rulers are not a terror to good works but to evil. . . . And the rulers were gathered together against the Lord and against his Christ.

The powers that be are ordained of God. . . . Both Herod and Pontius Pilate.

And it was the third hour, and they crucified him. . . . It was about the sixth hour, and he saith, Shall I crucify your king?

The first day of the week cometh Mary Magdalene unto the sepulchre. . . . The first day of the week came Mary Magdalene and the other Mary.

Mary Magdalene and Mary, the mother of James, and Salome brought sweet spices. . . . It was Mary Magdalene and Mary, the mother of James, and other women, that were with them.

And the men which journeyed with him [Paul] stood speechless, hearing a voice, but seeing no man. . . . And when we were all fallen to the earth, I heard a voice. And they that were with me heard not the voice.

Therefore Michal, the daughter of Saul, had no child until the day of her death. . . . The five sons of Michal, the daughter of Saul.

And the anger of the Lord was kindled against Israel, and he moved David against them to say, Go, number Israel. . . . And Satan provoked David to number Israel.

And David's heart smote him after he had numbered the people. And David said unto the Lord, I have sinned greatly in that I have done. . . . David did that which was right in the eyes of the Lord all the days of his life, save only in the matter of Uriah the Hittite.

I bear witness of myself, yet my record is true. . . . If I bear witness of myself my witness is not true.

By the deeds of the law shall no flesh be justified. . . . The doers of the law shall be justified.

A man is not justified by the works of the law. . . . Ye see, then, how that by works a man is justified.

The trumpet shall sound and the dead shall be raised. . . . He that goeth down to the grave shall come up no more.

My yoke is easy and my burden is light. . . . All that will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution. There shall no evil happen to the just. . . . Ye shall be hated of all men for my name's sake.

Wisdom's ways are ways of pleasantness and all her paths are peace. . . . In much wisdom is much grief, and he that increaseth knowledge increaseth sorrow.

It shall not be well with the wicked, neither shall he prolong his days. . . . Wherefore do the wicked live, become old, yea, are mighty in power.

Foolishness is bound up in the heart of a child, but the rod of correction will drive it far from him. . . . Thou shouldst bray a fool in mortar, yet will not his foolishness depart from him.

The rich man's wealth is his strong tower. . . . Woe unto you that are rich. . . . The destruction of the poor is his poverty.

Blessed be ye poor. . . . Give me neither poverty nor riches, lest I deny thee, or lest I be poor and steal.

The above quotations are correctly given; though, for brevity's sake, chapter and verse are omitted. They are but a small part of the contradictions the Bible contains. They may, indeed, be recorded by hundreds and thousands, to say nothing of other fallacies and absurdities.

Those who wish a larger collection of Bible contradictions, are referred to a pamphlet called Self-Contradictions of the Bible, containing forty-eight pages. Price, 25 cents. Sold at the office of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Underwood's Prayer.

In March, 1872, B. F. Underwood held a debate two evenings with the Rev. Mr. Taylor at Westfield, Pa. On the first evening Mr. Taylor opened the exercises with a regular orthodox prayer, and on the second evening Mr. Underwood opened with the following, and his friends thought it a decided improvement upon the prayer of the Reverend gentleman of the previous evening:

Thou incomprehensible Being, Power, or Essence, said to exist and to be the Author of Nature, called by different names—Brahma, Jehovah, Lord, Jupiter, Allah—worshiped as a Negro in Africa, as an Indian by the untutored savage of America, and by the mass of Christians as a Caucasian seated on a throne, with a crown on thy head and a scepter in thy hand, and angels all around chanting thy praises and ministering to thy wants—believed among the more thoughtful of thy worshipers to be something of which no correct conception can be formed, and recognized by us unregenerate Infidels only as the aggregate of the forces of Nature inherent in and inseparable from matter, constituting the soul of the universe—that which

"Warms in the sun, refreshes in the breeze, Glows in the stars and blossoms in the trees"— whatever thou art, we make no attempt to extol thy name, for if but half as great and good as many of thy worshipers profess to believe, thou canst not be pleased with the flatteries or praises of men. We make no attempt to give thee information, for they who claim to be in special communication with thee declare that thou knowest all things, even the innermost secrets of the heart of man.

We do not ask for any special favors for our opponent, for he has already told thee what he wants, and he is supposed to know his own needs better than we can set them forth. We ask no special favors for ourselves, because, in the first place it does not comport with our notions of fair play to invoke thine aid in an intellectual contest with a gentleman who has come here to discuss with us and not with thee; in the second place, we think we can sustain our position in this debate with no other assistance than that afforded by the silent but powerful aids which lie on the table before us; and in the third place, however much either of us might desire special help from thee, we do not believe thou wouldst interfere to give one the slightest advantage over the other.

But a few years ago our beloved country (this is not said for thy information) was suffering all the horrors of civil war, our hearts were saddened by the sight of "States discovered, discordant, belligerent and drenched in fraternal blood." Millions of prayers went up from pulpit, fireside and tented field, both North and South, entreating thee to interpose—stop the terrible strife between brothers, and stay the effusion of blood. But the sanguinary contest continued without any intervention by thee, and was brought to a close only when the South had been exhausted in resources, and was no longer able to offer resistance to the armies of the Union. How then can we expect thee to interfere in an insignificant contest like this between our friend and ourself?

We realize the fact that the intellectual work of the debate must be performed by the disputants, and we think it unwise for either of us to look to thee for victory. Whether "Providence is on the side of the strongest battalions" or not, we notice that they generally win, and without regard to the right and justice of the cause in defense of which they fight. We have not forgotten that the patriot army of Hungary was overwhelmed and defeated by the powerful and disciplined hosts of perjured Austria. "Trust in God, but keep your powder dry," said Cromwell to his soldiers. As we are satisfied that in physical warfare more depends upon the quality and condition of ammunition than upon mere "trust in God," so in an intellectual contest like this we believe that acquaintance with the subject, and power and skill in presenting arguments, are more important than "reliance on thee." Fred. Douglass said he prayed fifteen years, but the prayer most certainly answered in his case was the prayer that he made with his legs, when he ran away from bondage.

An amiable, but evidently visionary individual, frequently called thy son, and believed by many to be "God manifest in the flesh," is reported to have said that with faith to the amount of a grain of mustard seed men could remove mountains. Now we are satisfied from observation and experience that with a mountain of faith we should fail to remove even a grain of mustard seed, unless adequate physical force were applied.

We cannot help noticing that Christians have but little faith in thine interposition in practical affairs. Having built a church and dedicated it to thee, they are not content with asking thee to save it from the thunderbolt of heaven. Just like us "unconverted sinners" when we put up buildings for business purposes, they go to the expense of attaching lightning rods to their houses of worship.

Had we any faith in the efficacy of prayer, there are many favors we might solicit; but since we are certain that we can obtain nothing by addresses to thee which would not come just as surely without the prayers, we close these prayerful remarks to turn our attention to our opponent, and to the important subject under consideration. AMEN.

JAMES N. MOORE, Avoca, N. Y., writes: THE TRUTH SEEKER grows better every day. I would not do without it for twice its cost. Long may it wave.

W. P. KREMER, Wapello, Iowa, writes: I am well pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is just such a paper as every Liberal should feel it his duty to support. It fills a vacuum long felt in the Liberal ranks.

JOHN R. STRATTON, Leetonia, O., writes: I have been scattering a few TRUTH SEEKERS, and they are making their truthful marks wherever seen. They are opening the eyes of the blind, driving darkness away, and giving great light to free, receptive minds. Superstition, priestly bigotry, damning souls to an eternal burning must ultimately fall. Enclosed I send you the name of a new subscriber.

W. RICHARDSON, Del Norte, Col., writes: There is no paper I miss receiving so reluctantly as THE TRUTH SEEKER—the ventilator of old theology—through which so much pure air and clear light streams to refresh our miasmatic world. This appreciation is my excuse for again writing to tell you I do not get my paper at this office. Please let me again ask you to change it from Pueblo to this place. The trouble may be in the mails, I am getting so hungry for its feast of good things that I cannot refrain from writing you to see that it comes to this office, and thine shall be the praise, etc., etc.

MISS IDA BEDFORD, Bloomfield, Mo., writes: My mother has been taking your paper nearly two years, and we all like it more and more the longer we read it. I am nearly seventeen years of age, and until I began to read THE TRUTH SEEKER I never had an idea of advancement and progress, but it soon set me to thinking upon a good many subjects I had never thought upon before, and besides upheld me in convictions already entertained. I send a poor attempt at poetry, if you deem it worth publishing give it a place in your columns. I hope THE TRUTH SEEKER may be successful in its search after light, truth and liberty.

NEWTON MURPHY, Pharisburg, O., writes: I have the pleasure to acknowledge the receipt of your papers. The populace here are very fanatic, and if any person should enunciate the slightest disbelief in any part of their "sacred cow"—the Bible—they would ridicule them. Their thoughts seldom range beyond the gratification of foolish vanities and mere selfishness. They have never reflected on life, men, nor manners; their minds have not turned to the contemplation of the works and wonders of Nature. I heartily endorse the objects and aims of your paper, and congratulate you upon the efforts you are making to spread the truth and advocate the right. I hope THE TRUTH SEEKER may become a household word. It is certainly worthy of being kept in every household, and of being cherished by the people at large. It contains the best literary matter I find, and reading is the nourishment of the mind. I wish you great success.

ANTHONY JONES, Dekoven, sending in the names of four new subscribers, writes: I am sorry to say my friend Leoboefer has missed receiving two numbers of his paper, and I am sorry for John because he values them so highly and is extremely anxious to get them. He tells me he cannot afford to miss a single article, however small, because they all contain so much that is good and true and reasonable. But praise is hardly necessary from John or myself: your paper speaks for itself to any reasonable person free from theological and priestly influence. I wish you a long and happy life.

JOSEPH BOLTON, Atlanta, Kan., writes: Enclosed find $5, for which credit me with Vol. III. of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and send Mr. Darwin's "Origin of the Species" and one dollar's worth of TRUTH SEEKER Tracts. I want them to do missionary work with. Prospects are good here, and after harvest I shall make an effort to extend your circulation here. The times have been so hard papers have been patronized to a very limited extent, especially those like yours, directed to a special object. But I have spread mine far and wide, and believe they have made some strong impressions—perhaps some subscribers. I intend, however, to double my efforts in that direction.

WILBURN ALLEN, Powhattan, Ark., writes: Enclosed find one dollar, for which send me THE TRUTH SEEKER six months. I would be glad to subscribe for a longer time, but money is very scarce at present. I must have THE TRUTH SEEKER as long as it is to be had. I consider it the best Liberal paper published in the country; it gets better and better every number. I am only a boy nineteen years old, yet I take a great interest in the cause of Free Thought. Nearly everybody in this county belongs to one corner of the Church, and they think I and my folks are "powerfully wicked." Ignorance and superstition are in the ascendancy here, and probably will be so long as free schools are kept out. The people swallow everything the preachers tell them. I wish your paper continued success.

JAMES H. LINDSAY, Scott Bar, Cal., writes: Find enclosed seven dollars for subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER: one year for Charles Eisher, and three years for myself, if it and I live that long, and I hope it will. If I do not, I want when I die a copy buried with me to have to read on the other side. I have been waiting to send you more names, but have not been successful in that respect. Your reply to Elder Shelton's last blast is in itself worth a year's subscription. I fear he will blow himself up. If he will come out here to Siskiyou County and look at these mountains I guess he will conclude there have been some upheavals.

[We are grateful to our friend for his liberality. If such kindness was more common it would be well for our cause.—Ed. T. S.]

EDITH MONTROSE, Paris, Texas, writes: For the enclosed please send me THE TRUTH SEEKER TRACTS herein named. I obtained a list from a borrowed paper. I am not yet ready to bear my own cross up the hill of crucifixion, so I borrow a paper from a friend, and ask you to so wrap the tracts that the contents cannot easily be discovered at this office. It is bad, I know, to live such an enslaved life, but I cannot help it at present; my circumstances are very peculiar, but I live in hopes that I may be permitted to come out on the side of Reason and Free Thought yet before I go hence. I glory in our papers, THE TRUTH SEEKER, THE INVESTIGATOR and COMMON SENSE, published away out here in the "Lone Star State." It certainly sheds a beautiful light amidst the darkness of Christian mythology, and its bold Editor, Col. R. Peterson, richly deserves an oration of gratitude from every broad-minded man and woman in our State. Thanking you for the comforting truths you are sending out broadcast over the land, I am with you in the true faith.

ORRIS BARNES, P. M., Clay, N. Y., writes: I think THE TRUTH SEEKER the most bold and outspoken paper in the world, and I hope it is placed on a firm basis, and that it may continue to flourish. Well may it be proud of its title. It is significant and comprehensive. I am a Spiritualist, and love the good old Banner of Light—long may it wave! I think sometimes it witholds many things that ought to come before the people, for fear of offending somebody. I find THE TRUTH SEEKER not so; as I said, it is bold and outspoken, let it hit whomsoever it will. "Truth is mighty and will prevail." I append an acrostic I wrote upon the name of a niece of mine in Flushing, Mich. I will be pleased if you will publish it.

ACROSTIC.

Aspire, dear niece to succeed in your school,
Give heed to your teacher, and obey every rule;
Never be discouraged, though your labors be hard,
Every moment improve, and be on your guard,
So that your teacher may hear you recite
Long lessons, well committed by night.
"Onward and upward," let this motto be thine,
Until you have passed the portals of time.
Inspired by all that is noble and good,
Sure as you're alive you'll be nearer to God.
Every good act, and all your good deeds,
Can bring you more pleasure than orthodox creeds;
Remember this thing, they help only to bind
Our liberty of conscience, and dwarf the young mind.
Never, dear niece, subscribe to a creed,
Knowledge and liberty are all that we need.

MRS. E. D. SLENKER, Snowville, Va., writes: We were more than pleased with thy reply to Elder Shelton. It was "splendid." I have received another letter from the Rev. Mr. Bullard (to whom I have addressed several letters in THE TRUTH SEEKER) but he objects to my publishing any part of it without having it all published. Speaking of THE TRUTH SEEKER which I sent him some time ago, containing my reply to some of his observations, he says: "You doubt whether such persons as Christ and his apostles ever existed. Had you enjoyed the culture, the reading and research of such men as Hume, Voltaire, Gibbon, Spencer, Renan, Strauss, Mill, Tyndall, etc., you would no more doubt it than the existence of Isaac Slenker. Not one of the above men would read the little paper you sent here the other day. The questions discussed in it, the bears eating the children, etc., has nothing to do with the truth of the Bible." Now just think of it, the greatest preacher in the county, the oldest and best educated, and one too, who reads freely of Liberal works, to make such a heedless, headlong assertion. I have read many of those authors, but not one has yet given me any real proof of the existence of Christ and his apostles, and even if they would not read THE TRUTH SEEKER, which I think contains much that would interest even such men as they, would they read the Christian Examiner and thousands of other weak and trashy pious papers and the great mass of Sunday school literature with which our land has been deluged?

THE CLOCK STRUCK ONE

AND

THE REV. SAMUEL WATSON,

Of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Being a synopsis of the investigations of spirit-intercourse by an Episcopal Bishop, three ministers, five doctors and others at Memphis, Tenn., in 1855; also, the opinion of many eminent divines, living and dead, on the subject, and communications received from a number of persons recently.

"TRUTH IS MIGHTY AND WILL PREVAIL."

The "Clock Struck One" is an intensely interesting work in itself, and derives great additional interest from the high standing of its author in the Methodist Episcopal Church in which he has been a bright and shining light for a quarter of a century. A man who is personally known to nearly all the clergy of the South and to a wide circle in the North and wherever known is held in the highest esteem. These circumstances cause the book to be eagerly sought for. This anxiety is heightened by the action of the Methodist Conference of which the author is a member in disciplining him for publishing the book, thus attracting the attention of thousands of all sects who are anxious to read and judge for themselves the "Clock Struck One."

JESUS OF NAZARETH,

Or A TRUE HISTORY OF THE MAN CALLED JESUS CHRIST

EMBRACING

His parentage, his youth, his original doctrines and works, his career as a public teacher and physician of the people. Also, the nature of the great conspiracy against him; with all the incidents of his tragical death, given on spiritual authority, from spirits who were contemporary mortals with Jesus while on the earth.

By PAUL and JUDAS, through ALEXANDER SMYTH, Medium, of Philadelphia, by the spirits taking possession of him about one hour in every twenty-four, usurping all his powers, giving a continued series of well connected scenes, presenting scenery, characters and personages, dialogues and actions in their regular order and succession, embracing all the most important personages and the incidents which occurred during the sojourn of Jesus upon earth. There was probably no book ever written in which such perfect life-pictures occur; every city and country village, every river, brook and mountain, and scenery in general, is so vividly portrayed that an actual journey through the country could hardly be more interesting. The characters in this unexampled drama are so faithfully portrayed that, as you are introduced to each in turn, you seem well acquainted and delighted with your company, and the many points of interest you are called to visit. The book is replete with interest from beginning to end and had already passed through several editions when the plates were entirely destroyed in the great fire, since then we have had a very great demand for the work from our subscribers and the trade. The edition about to be issued will be far superior in mechanical appearance to any of its predecessors, and we shall print a large edition to enable us to supply standing orders and all new demands. 12mo., 356 pages, cloth bound.

Price, $1 50.

The Lyceum Publications.

I.
STORIES FOR OUR CHILDREN: By Hudson and Emma Tuttle. Price 25 cents. These stories are unsectarian by liberal in character, and should have a large circulation.

II.
THE LYCEUM: A Liberal Paper for the Young. Monthly, illustrated, 75 cents per year, with premium "stories for our children," and an elegant chromo 12x15 inches in size. THE LYCEUM will be sent three months, and the "Stories for our Children," on receipt of 25 cts., and one three-cent stamp for postage.

III.
THE CROSS AND STEEPLE: Their origin and signification. Price 10 cents.

IV.
THE LYCEUM MISCELLANY: Part I. Price 3 cts.; 30 cts. per dozen. This part contains "The Three Bears," an illustrated story for children; "The Five Commandments of Buddha;" "Obtaining Pardon for Sin;" and "Two Hundred Questions without Answers." The price of the Miscellany is placed at the bare cost of printing and postage, for the purpose of securing for it an extensive circulation by Liberals as a missionary document. The questions embrace almost every dogma of Christianity and are so drawn as to make their absurdity apparent to any one who attempts to answer them. No better publication has ever been issued for distribution amongst Christians.

We want a canvasser in every neighborhood to solicit subscriptions for THE LYCEUM, and to sell the Lyceum publications. We are giving the Weed sewing machines as premiums, on such liberal terms that any one can obtain a machine. Odd and Ends.

"No shooten aloud here," is the warning which confronts the sportsman at a suburban park.

"Have you heard my last speech?" asked a political haranguer of a wit. "I hope so," was the reply.

"A MAN in Cincinnati, advertising for a situation, says; 'Work is not so much an object as good wages.'"

A MUSIC teacher has been cautioned not to teach her pupil any low notes, lest they might affect her character.

At this season of the year country boys may often be seen under apple trees looking for "that ball they lost."

A LADY asked a veteran which rifle carried the maximum distance. The old chap answered, "The Minnie. mum."

A DARKEY's instructions to put on a coat were, "First de right arm, den de left, and den give one general convulsion."

It is right enough for young people to use a license when they get married, but they should not use too much afterwards.

Those who tell us how much they despise riches and preferment doubtless mean the riches and preferment of others.

A BOARDING house keeper advertises to furnish gentlemen with pleasant and comfortable rooms; also one or two gentlemen with wives.

"I'm afraid you'll come to want," said an old lady to a young man, "I have come to want already," was the reply; I want your daughter."

A HUMOROUS druggist in Boston exposes a case of soap in his shop window with the pertinent inscription, "cheaper than dirt." We should think so.

A LITTLE four years old puzzled his mother the other day by asking this question: "Mother, if a man is a mister, is not a woman a mystery?"

THE following obituary notice appeared in an Ohio paper: Peter Ink, an old citizen of Knox County was blotted out the other day; aged seventy-five.

If men were to hate themselves as they do their neighbors, it would doubtless be a good step towards loving their neighbors as they do themselves.

THE most tender-hearted man we ever heard of was a shoemaker who always shut his eyes and whistled whenever he drove his awl into a sole.

THIS advertisement recently appeared: "Two sisters want washing." We fear there are large numbers of brothers also in the same predicament.

THE immortal Raphael painted his own face, and it is said made an excellent likeness. Many a lady paints her own face and makes a very poor likeness.

A TROY clergyman went a fishing the other day, but had no luck. On his return he stood his pole and line up against a house, and in a short time caught a hen.

"WHAT you been doing?" asked a boy of his playmate who came out of a house with tears running down his face. "I've been chasing a horse whip round my father," was the snarling reply.

A COLORADO tombstone remarks:
He was young,
He was fair,
But the Injuns
Raised his hair.

THE mosquito is an insect that has no blood, except when he steals. As an agency for seeking artesian wells he is unsurpassed. Confidence in his powers is the reason he always sings at his work.

A SOLDIER of a cavalry regiment was brought up for stealing his comrade's liquor ration. He was an Irishman, and his defense was unique: "I'd be sorry in daade sur, to be called a thafel! I put the liquor in the same bottle, and mine was at the bottom; and sure I was obliged to drink his to get out my own!"

A POLITICIAN, wishing to compliment a well-to-do farmer, said: "You must have begun life early to accumulate such an estate as this." "Yes," replied the farmer, "I began life when I was a mere baby."

KNAPP once described the terrible heat of hell by saying that it was so hot that if a man were taken out of it, and plunged into the hottest fire of an earthly furnace, he would freeze to death from the transition.

"I SAY, landlord," said a yankee. "that's a dirty towel for a man to wipe on." Landlord, with a look of amazement, replied: "Well, sir, you're mighty particular. Sixty or seventy of my boarders have wiped on that towel this morning, and you are the first one to find fault."

"You wring my bosom," said a despairing Baltimore lover to a coquettish girl whom he had long sought in marriage. His burst of grief decided her, and putting out her hand, she softly murmured, "Well! ring my finger, if you will be happier for it, I will vex you no longer."

A PAPER tells about a girl who hated her suitor to such an extent that, when he called to see her Sunday evening, she threw both her arms about his neck and squeezed him almost to death. The youth was so alarmed that he didn't call again until the next evening.

THE celebrated portrait painter, Stuart, once met a lady in the street in Boston, who saluted him with, "Oh Mr. Stuart, I have just seen your miniature, and I kissed it, because it was so much like you." "And did it kiss you in return?" "Why, no." "Then," said Stuart. "'twas not like me."

"GENTLEMEN," said an Irish orator, "I am a self made man. When I came into this country first I had only one coat on my back." His rival jumped on the stand and declared that when he came to this country first he hadn't even a coat or anything else. He neglected to state that he was born here.

"Stay," he said, his right arm around her waist, and her face expectantly turned to him, "shall it be the kiss pathetic, sympathetic, graphic, oriental, intellectual, paroxysmal, quick and blisful, slow and unctious, long and tedious, devotional, or what?" She said perhaps that would be the better way.

"MOTHER," said a little shaver the other day, "I know what I would do if I was at sea and the men were all starving, and they should draw lots to see who should be killed and eaten, and it should be me—I'd jump into the water." "But," said the mother, "they would fish you up." "Ah! but I wouldn't bite!"

THE Norwegian young woman is not permitted to receive attentions from the Norwegian young man until she is thoroughly acquainted with the mysteries of bread making and can knit stockings. As a rather natural result, the Norwegian fair ones are all accomplished bakers and skillful knitters at an early age—even before they learn to read and write.

THE Detroit Free Press tells about an urchin who was seated on the post-office steps of that city, going through a watermelon, when a man halted and asked: "This is a great town for hogs, isn't it, bub?" "Wall, no," drawled out the lad, as he filled his mouth again, and kept his eyes on the man, "you'll be awful lonesome here!"

A GEORGIA officer talking to a soldier, asked, "Where was you during the war?" The other replied, "I was twenty-four months in the army, sir." "Yes, well where were you during that time?" "I was twenty-three months in the hospital." "And where were you the other month?" "I was looking for the hospital," replied the fellow.

GONE TO JERICHO. A man about two-thirds drunk and his back covered with mud, stopped a policeman in the street and asked to be locked up. "Why, you are able to walk home, aren't you?" asked the officer. "Yes, I could get home all right, but I don't want to, and you wouldn't if you had my wife. Run me in old fellow, and if she comes enquiring about me, just say I've gone to Jericho on 'portant business."

THE TRUTH SEEKER TRACTS.

Let Liberals exercise liberality enough to give away thousands and tens of thousands of these tracts. They are well designed to do missionary work and in spreading the glad tidings of truth. If a proper enthusiasm is enkindled in the breasts of the lovers of Free Thought and Mental Liberty, much good can be accomplished. Prices range from one cent to ten. From one to one hundred may be ordered of any of the various numbers, and a heavy discount made to those who buy by the quantity.

Friends, invest $5 or $10 in this way, and see how much good it will do. We certainly ought to be as zealous in promulgating truths as our adversaries are in disseminating error.

Notes and Clippings.

IN Nebraska more than 12,000,000 forest trees were planted last year.

It seems our notorious fellow-countrymen, Moody and Sankey, are about to return to us. This we regret. We were in hopes they would pass the balance of their days on the other side of the ocean.

BEECHER A GREAT MAN.—"Great man, that Beecher," said a stranger to a Fulton street green apple woman one day, vainly endeavoring to get ten cents' worth of cholera fuel for five cents: "Great man that. Ingy rubber ain't nothin' to him."

AN elderly lady named Cannon of Massachusetts, was standing by an iron sink during a thunder storm, when she was prostrated by lightning. She was entirely senseless, and was so charged and battered by the electric current that the gold beads about her neck were melted, but she lives and ascribes her escape to the silken cap she wore.

THE GOLDEN AGE advises clergymen who wish their salary raised, to notice the conduct of Plymouth church, and to govern themselves accordingly. The advice may be good, but is hardly needed. They are only too ready to pursue the course marked out by Mr. Beecher. They require no urging in that direction.

Or in valley or on mountain,
With horizon scant or wide,
Each is by his nature tied;
Scoop handfuls from sea or fountain,
Be thou poorer, be thou richer,
Thou canst only fill thy pitcher.

PETRIFIED BODIES.—The graves of Mr. and Mrs. Kidder at Eddington Pond, Maine, have recently been opened, and the bodies exhumed. The former had been buried forty-three years, and the latter eighteen. The grave clothes and coffins had nearly disappeared, and the bodies had turned into stone, retaining their natural shape and appearance, and becoming very heavy. The ground was saturated with water.

THE experiment of destroying the body of a dead horse by cremation has been made at Milan in the presence of several doctors and scientists. The carcass was placed in a huge oven, through the lateral openings of which four hundred jets of lighted gas were directed upon it, and three jets of gas and air applied to the three most difficult points of combustion. The operation lasted a little over two hours. There was no residue from the combustion, and it was unattended by bad odors.

IT IS SAID the Rev. John S. Glendenning, Presbyterian clergyman, against whom such damning proof of crime and seduction was produced last season, in view of Plymouth Church tactics, begins to entertain hopes of being reinstated with an increase of salary. The Presbytery is said to look smilingly upon him and to encourage his hopes. He may be as good as they. Where's the Rev. Lecher Huston? He ought to be called back to the pulpit and have big pay.

THE Conewango Swamp, containing some 25,000 acres of wet farming land, in Chautauqua and Cattaraugus counties, New York, is about to be reclaimed by drainage. It is estimated that by this means over $1,000,000 worth of land will be got under cultivation.

Those souls, who firm on truth rely,
Whose mental shafts through error fly,
Can well afford to work and wait,
While battling crime in Church and State.

Wake, brilliant hope, begone, despair,
Heaven's vengeance lingers in the air;
And those who fight life's battle well,
Hurl pious frauds and shams to hell.

TIT FOR TAT: A PAIR OF EPIGRAMS NEVER TO BE SEPARATED.

"In digging up your bones, Tom Paine, Will Cobbett did well;

You visited him on earth, he will visit you in hell."

—Lord Byron.

"In digging up your crimes, Lord B., H. Beecher Stowe did well;

She showed you such a wretch on earth, they kicked you out of hell."

—Forrest.

WHATEVER may be the diversity or conflict of opinion as to the essential merits of the question in the suit of Tilton against Beecher, there can be but one opinion as to the temper and wisdom of Judge Neilson in presiding over the trial. On the question of fact to be settled by the jury, no one from the charge can tell what the Judge thinks.—Independent.

There is no impropriety, now that the trial is over, in telling what is Judge Neilson's personal opinion. His Honor believes that Henry W. rd Beecher is guilty of adultery.—Sun.

A MURDER FROM PRAYER.—A base murder recently occurred at Fort Wayne, Ind. Wall, a colored man, and Cronk, a German, lived in the same house. Cronk came home, having had a little too much beer, and hearing Wall praying in a loud voice, made threats he would kill Wall. Wall's little girl hearing the threat, reported it to her father, when he at once grasped a revolver and repaired to Cronk's room. Cronk tried to eject the praying man, but Wall drew his knife and plunged it repeatedly into the body of Cronk and he soon died. The praying and murderous Wall is in jail awaiting his trial. He belongs to the church and is noted for his loud prayers.

THEN a matron made for kisses, in the liveliest of dresses, and with eyes that shone more brightly than the diamonds that she wore, spoke in tones of lute-like sweetness, words of such exceeding fitness, phrases of such happy neatness, that we clapped our hands for more, as with grace she left the floor.—St. Louis Times.

She was fitted for a preacher in the church of truthful Beecher, where the text is spoke in kisses, and the sermon is of blisses, that the saintly, fervid teacher never, never knew before: where true inwardness suspected, when finally detected, is paid a hundred thousand not to do so any more; only this and nothing more.—Sun.

SLIGHTLY MIXED.—A few days ago the lawyers of Tulpehocken were engaged in trying a case of peculiar intricacy. The action was brought by the heirs of a man begotten of a woman to whom he was not legally married, against the assignee of a woman to whom he was legally married, but who deserted him before his second marriage. His first wife cohabited with and had children by a man who had left his wife, who also lived in open adultery with another "grasswidower." Tulpehocken is, in this respect, laying the groundwork to become a fashionable summer resort, and the question is now asked, "Who is the beloved and respected pastor of that flock?"

A LECHEROUS PRIEST.—The Cincinnati Enquirer has the following special: "Considerable excitement prevails at Montgomery City, Mo., a town eighty-three miles west of St. Louis, on the St. Louis, Kansas City and Northern Railway, on account of the seduction of a young girl named Lizzie O'Donnell, by Father John Dally, the Catholic priest of that place. The girl is nineteen years of age, and her mother has been the housekeeper for Father Dally for a long time. About three weeks ago an abortion was produced upon the girl by her seducer, and she is now in this city. The congregation of the derelict priest are greatly excited over the disgraceful event, and the church authorities are endeavoring to smother the reports." This is undoubtedly a case of true inwardness. Is it not the proper way to treat it to make a Bishop of the good Father and quadruple his pay? Of course he is too good a man to do any thing wrong. Somebody has been getting up a conspiracy against him.

A PHILADELPHIA BEECHER CASE.—The trial of the Rev. Thomas Botts, of the Twelfth street Baptist church, on charges preferred by five members of the board of trustees, including two deacons, as well as a number of lady members, "of unministerial conduct, undue familiarity with certain ladies, want of truthfulness and other matters by which the cause of Christ and our denomination are injured," has been in progress, sitting with closed doors. Rev. Wm. Cathcart acting as moderator. Nearly twenty witnesses for the prosecution, mostly ladies, have already been examined, and both the prosecution and defense hope to get through in a few days. Now if this court will only look at this case right, regarding it as a clear case of conspiracy, and take the pastor's word in opposition to all that may be brought against him, his innocence will be triumphantly established, and then it will be in order to increase his pay and send him off on a trip for pleasure.

CATHOLIC CENSORSHIP OF THE PRESS.—The Montreal Daily Witness has been placed under a ban by the Roman Catholic Bishop of Montreal and the Archbishop of Quebec. Faithful Catholics are now forbidden, under penalty of excommunication, to read, buy or sell that paper, to advertise in it, or even to read the advertisements in it. One enthusiastic Catholic post-office clerk conceived it to be his Christian duty to tear up all the copies that passed through his hands, and would doubtless have continued to do so indefinitely had he not been admonished by his superior that there were certain duties he owed to the Government as well as the Church. The offense of the Witness is that it has published speeches by Father Chiniquy, a seceding priest, who preaches the truth, as he now sees it, often at the peril of his life, by reason of Catholic mobs, led on by fanatical priests. This is truly taking a step backward to the "good old times" of the Inquisition, when men were torn on the rack, disemboweled, burnt or buried alive merely for dissenting from the "Holy Office." The same spirit now animates the Reverend Bishop and Archbishop of Canada, and, had they the power, we should doubtless witness as horrible atrocities as when the pious Philip II. and God's vicegerent, the Pope, ruled the greater part of Europe.

ANOTHER CASE OF TRUE INWARDNESS.—In the township of Cheltenham, Montgomery county, recently boarded a Methodist minister and his wife, with one of the deacons of his charge. The family have a blooming daughter of fifteen summers, of whom the pastor became so much enamored that even in his slumbers the fair vision formed fancy's dream. A few months ago the mother of the young lady was shocked to find the clerical fraud in bed with her daughter in her room. The pastor endeavored to explain matters by stating that he had been reading Bessie Turner's version of how Tilton carried her to his room while asleep, the night previous, and that in his sleep he must have strayed from his own premises. The explanation was unsatisfactory, however, and he was given twenty-four hours to leave the neighborhood. The affair has created quite a sensation in Cheltenham.—Easton Sentinel. What right minded person can doubt this good man's innocence? True, if a man of the world was found in bed with a young girl it would be very wrong; we could truly decide him to be guilty; but this man was a pastor and too good to do anything wrong. No, no; increase his pay, and send him three months to the White Mountains to rest from his labors and to enjoy himself. We must learn to have more faith and confidence in these "men of God," and we ought to try to treat them as nearly alike as possible.

The Pro and Con of Supernatural Religion; or,

An Answer to the Question: Have We a Supernaturally Revealed, Infallibly Inspired and Miraculously Attested Religion in the World?

BY E. E. GUILD.

But "how about theological doctrines?" it may be asked. Ah! we have now introduced the great bone of contention which for ages has agitated the religious world, producing confusion, strife and contention, and almost, if not quite, neutralizing the beneficial influence of religion among men. In regard to theological dogmas, each man must be his own judge. In so far as men form their own opinions, each man's opinion will be a bantling of his own—a child of his own creation. He will manifest toward it parental affection, he will defend it when attacked, and assert, as many do about their children, that it is the biggest, handsomest, brightest and best that the human mind ever gave birth to. It has been well said that "it is with our opinions as with our watches, those of others go too fast or too slow, ours only, keeps the true hour of the day." It is only men of refinement and culture that can rise superior to this narrow and selfish prejudice. Men's judgments differ, and, therefore, there will be differences of opinions among them. We have nothing to do with the opinions of others except to tolerate them, and correct them if we can, if we deem them to be erroneous, by argument and persuasion. Until we practice on this principle, there can be no peace. The good man practices religion irrespective of creed, sect or party, and hence it is, that we have good men of every faith. If any creed beneath the heavens could be supposed to have power to drive out the last vestige of goodness from the human heart, it is that of St. Augustine and John Calvin. It asserts, in the most plain and unqualified terms, the utter vileness of human nature, and that the manner of life and ultimate destiny of each individual of the human race is fixed and determined by the absolute, unalterable, unchangeable and irreversible decree of the Almighty, without regard to the goodness or badness of the persons. And yet, among the believers in this creed have been found many as good men as ever lived on earth. Men, then, are sometimes good in spite of their creeds. But however at variance men may be in respect to their creeds, goodness is recognized everywhere. God has set his seal upon it, and it passes current all over the world, in all ranks, classes and conditions of men, without one solitary exception. Even the vilest of the vile respect, honor and applaud the good man.

But I am often asked, "how without supernatural revelation are we to know anything about God and immortality?" Long before the Bible existed men believed in God. No man can believe in God unless he feels God within. This, in a different form of words, was one of the maxims of the great teacher Christ, and is a profound truth. The pure in heart see God. None others can see him. Bad men may believe in a God, but it is not the true God. Like the devils spoken of in the Bible, they "believe and tremble." Their God is only a reflex image of themselves. The man who believes in God may not be able to define him even to his own satisfaction. He may not be able to comprehend his mode of existence, or to conceive him as having form, shape, size or locality. But whoever believes in the existence of omnipotent power, directed by infinite wisdom and goodness, and that this power has established the government of the Universe on the basis of exact and equal justice to all his dependent creatures, thereby securing absolute recompense to all exactly according to their deserts; and, furthermore, that although he shows no special favor to any, he takes infinite pains to secure the interest of the race, and that whatever benefits he confers on the race will be ultimately participated in by every individual of the race; whoever, I say, believes this, believes in God.

The doctrine of immortality was not first announced in the Bible, nor is it proved by it. Some of the Scripture writers express strong doubts on the subject. Only one attempted to prove it, viz: Paul, and he rests it on a very precarious foundation—the alleged fact vouched for by himself, on hearsay testimony, of the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead. This alleged fact is quite as difficult to prove as the doctrine which is made to depend on it. The only other argument for it in the Bible is that attributed to Christ in his reported conversation with the Sadducees. When we examine it, we find it to be a mere play upon words, a verbal quibble, which attributes to the Old Testament writers thoughts which they did not intend to express, a proceeding quite unworthy of Christ, if, indeed, he was guilty of it, which is more than can be known.

The doctrines of God and immortality are true if true at all irrespective of the Bible. They are true not because they are taught there, but they are taught there because they are true. These doctrines are to be believed, if believed at all, not because they can be proved by logical argument, but because they meet with a response from the inmost depths of the human soul. No man of independent thought can believe in immortality who does not feel himself to be immortal. And he will feel himself to be so in proportion as he becomes "pure in heart." At all events, he will be resigned to his lot, and accept as the best good whatever destiny the God of purity, justice and goodness may please to assign him.

The truly good man, who is enlightened, as well as good, will practice goodness because he loves it, and for its own sake. He is not moved to action by considerations of reward in another state of being, nor deterred from vice by fear of punishment. He claims no merit, however meritorious; no reward, however deserving. He has faith in God, in human nature, in truth and goodness, and truth and goodness are to him all in all. He does not fear to have his principles examined, investigated and scrutinized. He does not deprecate fair manly discussion and controversy, for he knows that God is on the side of truth, and that the more it is examined the brighter it will appear. He puts his trust in God, and has no fear of what devils or men can do unto him. Goodness is his comfort in life; his consolation and support in that great event in the history of us all which we call death. GREAT IS GOODNESS. May it ultimately pervade the heart and mind of every human being. "Let every thing that hath breath praise the Lord," and may all the people say, AMEN.

"'Twas thus the Royal mandate ran,
When first the human race began;
The social, friendly, honest man,
'Tis he;
Fulfills great nature's law,
And none but he."

Gods and God-Houses.

BY JOHN SYMPHERS.

These great houses, which men have built on the earth, and in which they say God dwells, are a fraud. He dwells no more in a church than he does in a barn! He no more inhabits the great God-house or Cathedral at Rome, than he does a hotel, a steamboat, a penitentiary, a jail or a stable. Indeed, they say that his only begotten son was born in a stable and cradled in a manger! One would naturally think that he would have provided better things for his only boy, the child Jesus—especially so, as God-houses were plenty. He should have dedicated some one of them to the especial use of Mary, his handmaid, and had his son brought forth amid, at least a few of the surroundings of kingly dignity. But no! He so abandoned her that his only begotten was born and cradled amid the dirt and filth of a dirty stable, filled with braying asses and kicking mules. His heavenly father, who it is said, owns the riches of a Universe, should have had at least one suit of fine robes prepared for the immediate use of his illustrious son, and not have allowed him to be wrapt in dirty swaddling clothes, which had been used for weeks in rubbing down dirty mules and braying asses. This gross neglect on the part of God to look after the comfort of his infant child, has proved to the minds of the people, that God knew nothing about this child, and that the story that palms him off upon the world as the son of a God, is nothing more nor less than a stupendous humbug and fraud.

God dwells not in houses made with hands. I do not believe that he ever entered one of these church temples in all his life. If he did, I am sure he would not protract his stay amid the display of fashion, pride and deceit therein only to be found, for a longer time than five minutes! "Lip" has now played out with God, and there he would find no other service. If he has the good sense that he is supposed to have, he could not remain contented throughout the performance of either the Catholic or Protestant churches, falsely called the worship of God. How could he listen to the prayers of the blind and ignorant devotees therein assembled, in which they proceed to make a regular stump-speech to the Almighty, telling him how good he is, how wise he is, how powerful a being he is, and what a merciful and fine fellow he is generally! I suppose they think this is great news to the Almighty. They presume to know more about him than he does about himself. Men upon religious subjects are generally ignorant of their own ignorance, hence they conclude that God likes them better, if they will praise him up, and run themselves down. Hence in their sermons and prayers, they exhaust the entire vocabulary of the English language, of its entire stock of high sounding adjectives, to eulogize and describe God unto himself.

They also wreck their imaginations, to invent or hunt up low and vulgar images with which to describe man. They seem to think God loves them much better after they tell him that they are totally depraved and full of wounds and bruises and putrefying sores, even from the crown of the head to the soles of the feet! Do they suppose that God can love such a loathsome, putrid, mortifying carcass, better than he does a pure, clean and healthy being? Oh! how completely does a false religion put out the eyes of reason. "Crawling worms of the dust" is an old and stereotyped piece of church imagery, which has done more to break down the manhood of our race and destroy that self-respect which we should ever cultivate, than every other evil influence beside.

Preach hell, Devil and total depravity to the people in the name of God, and by the eternal laws of psychology, they will soon act both hellish and devilish; but keep those dark ideas and images out of the human mind, and it will of its own accord develop all that native goodness, beauty, purity and love which we see in children while yet in a natural and innocent state. Men and women are nothing but grown up children, and they would always retain that innocence and purity, if they never came in contact with the corrupt, unnatural hypocrisy of society and the doctrines and teachings of an ignorant church upon the subject of evil, sin, hell, the Devil, etc. All the evil in the world can be traced directly to those God-houses, heathen temples, and to the doctrines taught therein.

All swearing came originally from the church, every word or form of oath found in a swearer's vocabulary is of pulpit origin. Take an example: "God damn your soul," "Go to hell," etc., etc., are some of the most popular forms of expression used by the modern swearer. Now men would never have thought of using such profanity, if the preachers had not coined the expressions and put them into their mouths, by preaching that the great God was constantly in the habit of damning men's souls in hell, etc.

Again all the drunkenness which now curses and blights this world, can be easily traced to the same source. As long as the church, professing to be God's peculiar people, will continue to drink wine on Sunday in the name of the Lord and for God's sake, and as long as an old man-made book, called the Bible is believed to be the infallible word of the very God himself (and yet it teaches men to drink no longer water but to "take a little,") so long will drunkenness and debauchery continue to blight the fair face of our beautiful earth. Even Jesus, the hero of the New Testament story, and supposed Savior of men, made a large quantity of wine out of water at a certain wedding at Cana of Galilee—enough, I should think, to make every guest at that one-horse wedding drunk for a month!

How much more God-like it would have been in him to have passed around the pure cold water before he turned it into wine, and enjoined all to drink of it. There is no calculating the amount of evil that this story of his (supposed) turning water into wine has done the great temperance movement in the world.

Sin generally has a premium laid upon it by the black-coated Doctors of Divinity (I should think divinity must be very sick) who build these God-houses out of substance filched from the people, and then entrench themselves behind their wooden fortifications (pulpits) and from there shoot off their mouths at humanity, and tell them that there is a great vicar, who will by his atonement, carry the consequences of all their sins, if they will only believe in him. The biggest sinner in the land cries out, "Bully, I wish I had known that before, I might have had even a better time than I have had."

But men have now discovered in spite of the church, that there is no forgiveness for sin, but that they must all be atoned for with great severity, and that by the men who, commit them, and by no one else. But the great God of the Universe does not confine himself to the narrow limits of temples made with human hands; and those hypocrites who pretend to dedicate them to him, know very well that he never takes them off their hands, else why do they erect lightning rods upon them? Do they think God would be so foolish with his own lightning as to strike down his own houses, and thus destroy his own property? And, then, concerning his son—if God was so immensely rich, why did he not provide something better for him than to let him work at the carpenter's trade, and build houses and barns for a living? That was not very God-like. He did not do it to show how very God and very man he was, as some pretend, though a jack-plane is no proof of a God or of the son of a God. Christ never claimed to be a God. Such a silly thought never entered his head. When a young man in his ignorance, once presumed to call him good-master, he soon silenced him by stamping his foot, and pointing with his finger to heaven saying: "There is none good but God up yonder." Christ worked at his trade because he was a poor young man and needed money. He was born poor and remained poor all his life. He never dreamed of being the Savior of the world, and does not claim to be such in the spirit world to-day. But men when creating their God and their Devil in their own image, made some great mistakes. They imagine them both to be of the masculine gender, as they always use pronouns of that gender when speaking of them. He and him are the pronouns generally used. Now where are their wives? There never was a masculine without a feminine. Why don't men correct this mistake, and get God a wife—a Goddess? Then they could have had his son born of her instead of a little black-eyed curly-headed Jewish girl, and outside of wedlock at that, thus setting a bad example before the world which, alas, they have too closely followed ever since. Then there is that other imaginary being, the Devil, made by man to represent his lower and baser faculties as God did the higher—where is his wife? This "old Nick" of the churches should have a wife, and as we listen to so much about him, we should at least hear a word or two occasionally spoken about "Mrs. Nick!"

"I pause for a reply."

Thomas Paine.

BY S. H. PRESTON.

"The man is thought a knave or fool,
Or bigot plotting crime,
Who for the advancement of his kind
Is wiser than his time.
For him the hemlock shall distill,
For him the axe be bared;
For him the gibbet shall be built;
For him the stake prepared;
Him shall the scorn and wrath of men
Pursue with deadly aim,
And malice, envy, spite and lies
Shall desecrate his name.
But truth shall conquer at the last,
For round and round we run,
And ever the right comes uppermost,
And ever its justice done."

The grandest men that ever trod this planet were Infidels. Their names are imperishably inscribed upon the starry scroll of liberty; theirs the whitest among earth's few immortals that shall grow glorious upon the tablets of history through all the milleniums to come. Many of the once execrated names of Infidels are to-day the most illustrious in the great republic of letters; and Voltaire and Hume, and Paine and Gibbon, shall be honored in the world's remembrance, when bibles and creeds shall have been forgotten. Humboldt, Buffon, Cuvier, La Place, Spinoza, Shelley, Volney and Descartes, Infidels, theirs are the brightest names in the constellation of genius. And amongst this glorious galaxy of names, none is more deserving of respect and everlasting admiration than that of Thomas Paine; the champion of reason and the rights of man; the enemy of slavery and superstition; the grand, heroic Infidel whose country was the world, whose religion was doing good—earth's noblest advocate of goodness, of reason and human rights—no wonder that the Church abhorred him. No wonder that a Church, the very life of which depended upon perpetuating the old theological fraud of a God-Sire and a God-Son, and a God-Ghost, should anathematize the man who declared to all the world in his splendid simplicity of style: "I believe in one God and no more, and I hope for happiness beyond this life."

Trine deities, virgin-born saviors, and ghost-begotten gods, have been ever the basis of all earth's religions. Through all the dreary dark years of fear and force and fraud from its establishment by the crimson-handed Constantine, the Christian Church has never tolerated a man who believed in one God only, and that God a good one. Inquisitions were founded to torture and burn and destroy every theological pauper who had not a plurality of gods; and for fifteen hundred years the robes of the Church were red and dripping with the gore of accursed heretics who could not be forced to accept of council-manufactured gods. No wonder the Church pursued with malice, envy, spite and lies, the Infidel who avowed his belief in "one God and no more." It was for this ecclesiastical crime that James Gruet was beheaded, and Michael Servetus was roasted alive for hours over a slow fire made of green wood, by that Protestant Inquisitor, John Calvin, a man who was, says Ingersoll, "as near like the God of the Old Testament as his health permitted." This was a crime which Protestant England continued to punish in this nineteenth century with imprisonment and legal disabilities. In Maryland, Virginia, and other states, men, women, and even children were once scourged, confined, banished, or put to death for this crime. And to-day, for this crime, Hon. J. W. Thorne is driven from the North Carolina Legislature. The Church can never forgive a man who believes in Almighty God to the exclusion of the trinitarian firm of little he-gods. No wonder that a Church which has ever been the great bulwark of despotism, which holds that the powers that be are ordained of God, and that all tyrants have obtained their power from him; which in all ages, while dispensing blessings upon priests and popes and potentates, has denounced curses upon general humanity in this world and left it for God to damn in the next. No wonder it pursued with holy hate the bold Infidel who dared to write, "I believe the equality of man;" aye, and who had the outrageous audacity to add: "And I believe that religious duties consist in doing justice, loving mercy, and endeavoring to make our fellow creatures happy."

How shockingly blasphemous to a Church which made religious duties consist in mumbling prayers and paying tithes. "Endeavoring to make our fellow creatures happy." Abominable to a Church that for centuries, in the name of Jesus Christ, had been exterminating their fellow creatures for mere differences of opinion concerning some incomprehensible creed. The Church made a hell here on earth for men that a few heartless hypocrites might hope for a hereafter heaven. Thomas Paine had the courage to still further declare that, "any system of religion that shocks the mind of a child cannot be a true system."

Ah, who but an Infidel, whose unsanctified heart had never entertained the beautiful and glorious doctrines of original sin and total depravity, would have had the hardihood to give expression to such an unorthodox sentiment as this? And how such a sentiment must grate upon the sensibilities of pious parents used to waffling up in praise to the God who said: "Suffer little children to come unto me," such songs as this from good old Watts:

There is a never-dying hell,
And never-dying pains,
Where children must with demons dwell
In darkness, fire and chains.
Have faith the same in endless shame,
In all the human race,
For hell is crammed with infants damned,
Without a day of grace."

It was more orthodox to believe with Jonathan Edwards—albeit the sentiment might be less beautiful and tender than Paine's—that "reprobate infants are vipers of vengeance which Jehovah will hold over hell in the tongs of his wrath until they turn and spit venom in his face."

But the climax of his blasphemy consisted in disbelieving either that a whale swallowed Jonah, or that Jonah swallowed a whale; in refusing to believe that a false, foolish, filthy, and self-contradictory medley of old Jewish writings were revelations from the creator of the Universe. Instead of man-made, paper books, he believed in the great volume of nature. He believed that God made worlds, but did not believe that he printed books. He believed that

"All matter is God's tongue,
Out from its motion God's thoughts are sung;
And the realms of space are the octave bars.
And the music notes are the suns and stars."

And because he was in advance of his time; because he could not be a hypocrite and bow down in worship of old lies; for this the Church, unable to torture and slay his body as it had the bodies of hundreds of thousands of thinkers and discoverers in all the centuries gone, sought by every possible means to assassinate his reputation. And he, the inspiring genius of the American cause; he, to whom historians award credit for achieving more for independence with his pen than Washington did with his sword; he who will live forever in the history of this Republic as the author-hero of the revolution; he who consecrated a long laborious life in both hemispheres to the sacred cause of humanity; he who, in his sublime patriotism, adopted the world for his country, and who, in his boundless philanthropy embraced all mankind for his brethren; this man to whom America is more indebted than to any other man that ever trod this continent; to whom the world is more indebted than to all its sixteen crucified saviors; this man, this great, and grand, and good, and heroic man, has been robbed of honor and reputation, and blackened and hunted by the sleuth hounds of superstition as though he had been the embodied curse of earth. And wherefore? Because, forsooth, he had too much brain to believe, and too much manhood to say he believed the silly, sickening, whale-swallowing stories of an old Jew book. And nothing in the whole career of the Christian Church, not even the rivers of innocent blood with which it has inundated the fair fields of earth, will reflect upon itself such deep and dark and destructive damnation as its treatment of Thomas Paine.

"But the right shall ever come uppermost,
And justice shall be done."

And to-day the old blackened, age-cursed structure of Christianity is seamed and swaying to its full. Time will be the avenger of Thomas Paine. And he who dared to hazard the highest power of the Church and all the upas stings of superstition for the duty of publishing unpopular sentiments, will yet be enshrined by mankind as one of the grandest guardians of that liberty of thought and speech which have won for us a freedom the world will cherish and protect. He lived in the "times that tried men's souls." He is now in the last great solemn sleep of man. The Church pursued him to the very sanctuary of the tomb, and with a deathless hatred has cursed his silent dust.

But the right, Thomas Paine, comes uppermost,

As round and round we we go;
The heel of a priest may tread thee down,
And a bigot work thee woe.

"But never a truth has been destroyed,
They may curse it and call it crime;
Pervert and betray, or slander and slay
Its teachers for a time,

But the sunshine, aye, shall light the sky,
As round and round we run;

And the truth shall ever come uppermost,
And justice shall be done."

And a few more years, a few more fearless friends of Freethought and reason, and justice shall be awarded Thomas Paine; the flowers of poesy will be woven in amaranthine wreaths above his last resting place, and the blackened name will whiten with purity through all the wasteless years to come. Aye, the name of Thomas Paine will occupy the brightest niches in the Pantheons of the future; and his memory, borne on the wings of the centuries, shall triumphantly outlast all the books and Bibles, the creeds and churches, and the governments and gods of the world to-day.

"For yet the world goes round and round,
And the genial seasons run;
And ever the right comes uppermost,
And ever is justice done."

West Winfield, N. Y.

Liberal Leagues.

Much is said in the Index for and against the organization of Liberal leagues on the basis of the constitution kept before the people on the first page of that paper.

In the number for April 15th of that paper, a communication from Andover, Mass., contains, it seems to me, some really sensible and wise remarks. Is it not best for the Index and all Liberal papers to keep their readers posted on all the encroachments of religious freedom, and to furnish them with the strongest logical arguments in favor of the Liberal spirit they advocate, and leave the organization of Liberal leagues to a growth as purely spontaneous as the growth of vegetation? When all the conditions are ripe for a further step, even if it be in closer union of organization, that step will be taken as naturally as we take the next breath.

Liberals are far from being liberal themselves under all circumstances. I know avowed Materialists and Spiritualists who are as intolerant and bigoted in their way as the fiercest orthodox in the land. It is time their illiberal spirit was lost out of them.

In a neighboring town there is an organization of independent Freethinkers, respectable in numbers and character. In the same village there is a dancing club composed of the most respectable and high-minded citizens; though, perhaps, embracing but few if any of the real orthodox. One member of this club, a lady, who was sincerely beloved by all who knew her, for her many amiable qualities and unblemished character, came to a sudden and unexpected death. A revivalist who happened to be holding a series of meetings at that time, is said to have uttered the expression that one of this club was now dancing in hell where the rest would also go. Of course this was a disgusting exhibition of bigotry. The Liberals and friends of the lady met in the city hall and passed a series of resolutions, amongst which was one giving the clerical bigot twenty-four hours to leave town. Now I ask in all candor if this was not as intolerant as the preacher? He, no doubt, thought that dancing was a great sin in the eyes of his God, and he took a very unbecoming way of expressing it. He could do her no harm, and had an undoubted right to make a fool of himself if he choose. But how clearly did they invade the right of free speech and freedom of conscience when they attempted to drive him from town for exercising that freedom they were contending for, when it was to be exercised by themselves? Would it not have been more wise to have published an article showing the bigotry and intolerance manifested by the preacher, than by using the same weapon, intolerance? Liberals have something to learn yet, or so it seems to a LIBERAL.

Living for Humanity.

It was a beautiful thought which Mr. Henderson expressed at the funeral of his daughter, that we are to live for humanity; that even our loves and friendships are to be consecrated to the universal good. We are not simply to seek our individual happiness, but the growth of all. We are parts of a mighty race, and to develop that, in all its manifold faculty, is our supreme work. This is a stirring thought in the midst of our toils, and sorrows and disappointments. Whatever we do, whatever we suffer goes into the great stream of life. It does not and cannot perish. We are not alone; we are intertwined with a wondrous Universe. We are links in a chain of which the stars in their courses are but a glittering segment. Our life and our death, therefore, are sacred; both are but processes in the great sweep of being; both alike are the fulfilment of the law. We yield not up our friendships and loves to darkness and nothingness, but to the ever-flowing life and power and beauty and perfection.

Have we not, then, mighty motives and glorious inspirations to sustain us? Is not the whole world alive with richest meanings? and can we not endure the strange changes of our human life with high hope? for if, as mere individuals, we perish, still the Universe and the race are unfolding, and the life that is at the root of all, is ever leaping into action and bursting into fruit.

S. P. PUTNAM.

ARROGANCE.—Upon the traditional authority of an old book threaten your equal brother, who differs from you in opinion, with eternal torments! That is Christian. Not one of the alleged "revelations" you call "divine" can be authenticated, as coming from one invisible more than another. And the scope and substance of "evangelical preaching" hath this extent and nothing more: Believe as I do or be damned. Jesus taught forgiveness, while in his own case he had his own enemies slain at his feet, and sent to an unending hell (Luke xix: 27). And, not now to speak of filial aspiration that is common to all, what is Christian "prayer" but the attempt to persuade the Infinite to do something he would not do without being first reminded of it, and put up to it by urging? This ceremony looks precisely as if the parties thought that the Infinite God felt himself very much flattered with the compliments thus lavished upon him.

LA ROY SUNDERLAND.

The Truth Seeker,

A JOURNAL OF REFORM AND FREE THOUGHT.

D. M. BENNETT, Editor and Prop'r.

No. 335 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Volume II.

One more number after this completes the second volume of THE TRUTH SEEKER, when the term of subscription with a large portion of our patrons expires, and when, we trust, they will promptly renew. We have decided to continue volume second to the end of the year, that hereafter the volumes can begin and end with the year, so an addition of four months, or eight numbers, will be added to the present volume.

In compliance with the expressed wish of many of our patrons, we have decided with Volume III.—which will commence with 1876—to issue THE TRUTH SEEKER weekly. This will, of course, add largely to the expenses of the paper, but we trust our friends will appreciate our efforts, and do all they reasonably can to extend our circulation. Our success, of course, rests with our friends and patrons. Our advertising patronage is limited, and our main dependence is upon the subscriptions that our friends are pleased to favor us with. We would be glad if our list could be largely increased. There are many thousands scattered over the country who ought to be patrons of THE TRUTH SEEKER who are not. If a portion of these, only, can be induced to contribute to the support of this sheet, it will be for the mutual benefit of all concerned.

We are fully assured from friends in many localities that THE TRUTH SEEKER is doing much good. Many have been induced to read its pages who have not before read Liberal publications, and many have had their eyes opened, and have been enabled to see the nature and rule of superstition and error with which the world has long been governed.

We trust Liberals and Spiritualists will realize the necessity of sustaining such publications as this. The need for them is urgent. The world is yet bound in chains of darkness and bigotry, and vast numbers need to have the better way of reason and truth pointed out to them. It would be well if Liberals as a class could feel that they have a work—a mission to perform in life, and that they would not flinch from their duty until the same is accomplished. The Church is rich and powerful, its ramifications are extensive, and its machinery runs with great precision; but, founded as it is in error and falsehood, it is our duty, as a class, to expose its deceptions, enormities, and delusions.

We propose at the commencement of Vol. III. to enlarge the size of our pages about thirty-three per cent, and to issue a sheet of eight pages, at the low price of TWO DOLLARS A YEAR, thus giving our readers some thirty-six per cent more of reading matter in a year than at present, and at an increase in price of only twenty-five cents. It will be the cheapest, and we hope one of the best, Liberal papers of the nineteenth century. Many write us that they have to wait too long now between the issues of the paper, and we believe all our readers will be better suited to hail its appearance every week.

A limited amount of space, only, will be allowed for advertisements, most of the columns being devoted to reading matter.

Many of our readers have complimented us upon the steady improvement of the paper since its advent, and we trust this feature will still be perceptible. We intend THE TRUTH SEEKER shall ever be worth all the money we ask for it, and we will be glad if all liberal and progressive people will feel inclined to encourage it.

The price for the addition to Vol. II., from September to January, is fifty cents. For $2.25, paid in advance, we will send the Semi-Monthly four months from September first, and the Weekly for one year. Those who can conveniently advance that moderate amount at the present time will confer a favor upon us by so doing, and they may feel assured they shall receive the full value of their money.

We will thank all our patrons whose time expires with the next number to renew promptly. During the long-continued hard times we have passed through, THE TRUTH SEEKER treasury has become well depleted and needs replenishing. The amounts are small to each subscriber, but in the aggregate they are of great importance to us. Prompt attention to this matter on the part of our friends will be duly appreciated.

Those who have not yet remitted for Vol. II. we once more request to do so without further delay. We have waited patiently upon them, the money has long been due us, we are needing it, and we trust they will not make us wait longer.

Since we are now printing on the tab of every paper to regular subscribers every one can easily tell when their time expires.

Those who do not wish to continue THE TRUTH SEEKER after the next number, will confer a favor upon us by notifying us of the fact by postal card, or through their postmaster, at the same time remitting the arrearages due. We hope the number of those who do not want it will be small, but we do not wish to send it to those who do not want it, and cannot afford to send it to those who do not intend to pay for it.

We wish to offer inducements to those who renew promptly. For seventy-five cents paid during the month of August we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER from Sept. first to the end of the year and forty cents worth of our Tracts. To those who send one dollar we will send the paper and seventy-five cents worth of Tracts. To those who send $2.50 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER for sixteen months from Sept. first, and forty cents worth of Tracts. To those who send us $3.00 we will send the paper the sixteen months and $1.25 in Tracts. Postage paid in all cases.

To those who are still in arrears for Vol. II. and will remit us the amount due before the close of August, we will send twenty-five cents in Tracts. If they add fifty cents more to pay till January, 1876, we will send them forty cents worth of Tracts. If they add still $2.00 more to pay for the Weekly for the year 1876, we will send them in all seventy-five cents worth of Tracts.

How many new subscribers can be obtained within the next thirty days? To those who will send us five new names with $2.50 for the paper from Sept. to the end of December we will send one dollar's worth of Tracts.

Those who send us five new names, with $11.25 for the paper sixteen months we will send two dollars' worth of Tracts and a copy of The Heathens of the Heath. To those who will send us eight new names and $18.00, we will add to the premium a bound copy of Vol. I of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Friends of THE TRUTH SEEKER, here is something to work for; who will do the most in this laudable enterprise? To the one who sends us the largest number of new subscribers we will, in addition to the tracts and books, send a copy each of "Draper's Conflict between Religion and Science," and a bound copy of Vol. II. of THE TRUTH SEEKER when completed.

Those friends who have acted in part as agents for our paper in their particular localities, we especially request to continue to do so. We will be glad to have them see those they know to be subscribers and induce them to renew, so far as possible, and to inform us who wish their papers stopped. To those who will do this for us we will send a liberal present of tracts, in proportion to what they do for us, and in keeping with the offers already made.

All sums over one or two dollars should be sent in money orders, or by draft on some New York Bank, or by Registered letter.

Patent Binders.

We still have on hand a limited number of this convenient article for THE TRUTH SEEKER. No arrangement can probably be better devised to hold the papers firmly, to keep them clean, and to prevent their being scattered and lost, than this invention. They are neatly and strongly made, and have the name TRUTH SEEKER in gold letters on the front. We will close out what we have of them at the reduced price of $1; sent, post-paid, by mail.

A Proposed Enterprise.

We desire within the next six months to bring out a large octavo book of eight hundred pages, entitled, THE LIVES AND DEATH-BED INCIDENTS OF NOTED INFIDELS.

It is proposed to commence as far back as Menu, Zoroaster, Buddha, and Confucius, coming down to the Grecian philosophers and sages—Socrates, Pythagoras, Plato, Epicurus, Zeno, Aristotle, and others; of the Roman philosophers, Antoninus, Seneca, Cicero and others; since the Christian era—all the most distinguished Infidels to that religion who have lived, and are now alive, embracing in all some one hundred and fifty characters. A biographical sketch of their lives, the principal events in their history, together with the peculiar philosophies, doctrines, and theories they each taught. It will be the biography of one hundred and fifty, or more, of the purest teachers, the profoundest thinkers, and the noblest men that the world has produced.

It is proposed to divide the work into four parts.

PART I. From Menu to Christ.

PART II. From the First to the Seventeenth century.

PART III. From the year 1700 to the death of John Stuart Mill.

PART IV. Distinguished Infidels now alive, including leading Scientists and Spiritualists.

A special feature of the work will be to refute the Christian calumny that Infidels recant upon their death-beds and renounce the honest convictions of their lives. This slander can be easily disproved, and facts in the death-bed incidents of the subjects treated will be carefully collected and embodied in the work.

It is believed the volume can hardly fail to be one of great value, and will fill a place in Liberal literature long unsupplied. It will surpass the family Bible in interest, reliability and value. It will afford a vast amount of information not accessible to the general reader.

It is designed to illustrate the work with fifty well executed portraits, and a steel-plate engraving of the author. It will be printed on fine paper, with Small Pica type of the newest and neatest style. It will be elegantly bound, and will doubtless be the finest book, so far, at least, as artistic merit is concerned, yet issued from the Liberal press.

A portion of the matter is prepared, and it is believed it can be ready for delivery by Jan. 1st, 1876.

We feel an excusable pride in bringing out this work, believing it a necessary contribution to the literature of Freethought. But as it will necessarily cost a good deal of money, we deem it prudent to lay the matter before our readers and see how the proposition will be received by them. If a certain number will write us that they will take a copy of the work when completed, we will decide to go ahead and bring it out with as little delay as possible, but if a few, only, want such a work we shall doubtless decline publishing it at present. Cannot almost every Liberal afford to have it in his library?

In the style we have indicated, the work will be sent, post-paid, for four or five dollars per copy, and we mean to make it worth double that amount at least.

The money is not asked now, but when the work is completed, when, we trust, the financial aspect of the country will be considerably improved.

Will each of our readers who wishes a copy of THE LIVES AND DEATH-BED INCIDENTS OF NOTED INFIDELS, please drop us a line soon and inform us of the fact? We shall keep a record of the names thus sent in, and those will be the first to be supplied.

WE have received a report of a quarterly meeting of the Northern Wisconsin Spiritualists, held at Omro, Wis., June 25th, at which Isaac Orvis was President, and Dr. J. C. Phillips was appointed Secretary. Some eight meetings were held in the course of three days. Addresses were delivered by Mrs. Olive Smith, Mrs. A. H. Colby, E. V. Wilson and others. Everything seemed to pass off pleasantly; but for want of room we will omit the detailed report.

Letter from a True Liberal.

We cheerfully lay the following letter before our readers; it speaks for itself:

PORT HOPE, ONT., July 8th, 1875.

D. M. BENNETT—Dear Sir: Enclosed please find ten dollars, a free gift offering in support of your spirited and lively TRUTH SEEKER. You are deserving of all praise for your indomitable perseverance in endeavoring to elevate mankind above superstition and priestcraft, and I hope every Liberal in the land will see to it that you have a generous and liberal support.

I have just returned from a pretty extensive tour through the nine States lying between Maryland and Maine, and from personal observation I am satisfied that the Liberal sentiment prevails now to an extent hitherto unknown. The Boston Investigator, THE TRUTH SEEKER, B. F. Underwood and the lady and other contributors to the above papers are doing a noble work for the cause of humanity. To these fearless workers I feel that we owe a large debt of gratitude. Truly yours, WILLIAM SISSON.

We extend our heartfelt thanks for the generosity our friend manifests. It is not the first time he has evinced kindness and sympathy to us and to our cause. Such marks of liberality are certainly in the right direction and lay us under obligations we can only discharge by struggling on in the good work in which we have engaged, using our life and strength in battling ignorance and superstition, the greatest enemies of mankind. May we ever be aided and encouraged by such friends as Brother Sisson.

Obituary.

DIED in this city, on the evening of July 9th, 1875, Agnes V. Henderson, of rapid consumption, aged fifteen years and seven months, the disease supervening on an attack of typhoid fever during the past winter. Thus our friends Mr. and Mrs. G. L. Henderson and family, in the short space of a month and a few days have been bereaved of two of their most interesting and beloved children. Agnes was a young lady of unusual intelligence and excellence of character. She endeared herself to all who formed her acquaintance in the few months she was a resident of this city; though the greater part of the time she has been combating with the fell disease which proved too powerful for her strength and vitality.

She was a young lady of great promise, and had she lived, would doubtless have distinguished herself in the line of mental talent and activity.

She clung to life with all the ardor of a young person just stepping upon the stage of usefulness; but as the disease under which she suffered progressed and she saw that she could not live, she met her fate with wonderful calmness and placidity. She met death without a fear or a struggle, regarding it as the inevitable termination of all organized life, and after affectionately bidding "good bye" to her companions and friends, giving most excellent advice to the brother and sisters she left behind her, touching the practical duties of life, she passed as calmly and sweetly into her final sleep as an infant in its evening slumber. She died firm in the convictions her father has many years entertained, and as she resigned herself again to mother Nature, from whence she came, she did so without a pang, terror or struggle. No one of opposite faith could have died more fearlessly, calmly or pleasantly.

On the 10th, the funeral was held. The services consisted of Mr. H. B. Brown's reading a beautiful funeral service he had written for similar occasions, and was more lengthy than the one he read a month ago at the funeral of a younger child. It was particularly appropriate and beautiful. Two suitable pieces or hymns were sung, and remarks were made by Mr. S. P. Putnam, who was present, Mr. Henderson and Mr. Andrews. A beautiful poem suited to the occasion was read, and upon the whole, the services were impressive and appropriate.

We would recommend to our friends every-where in cases of funerals, to aim to dispense with the services of the clergy of a faith obnoxious to us. It is ill fitted that Liberals should call upon the teachers of doctrines they cannot accede to, to officiate in the closing scenes of life. We can as easily dispense with them in death as at other times.

A suitable essay or poem may be read by some friend, and remarks made by sympathizing attendants, and it will answer all necessary purposes quite as well as the services of a priest. We will again remark that we hope ere long a small book will be presented to the Liberals of the country, containing suitable forms and ceremonies for the occasions of birth, marriage and death. It will be well for us in these respects, as well as all others, to be independent of the priesthood.

It has been announced that on Friday evening, July 23d, we are to read a paper before the New York Liberal Club, on "The Gods of superstition and the God of the Universe." Amid the duties and cares which claim our attention, and as we have not yet found time to write a word of the paper to be read, and as but two days intervene between this writing and the day of the reading, and as much else also requires our attention, we will not in this number inflict upon our readers quite our usual amount of remarks; but give them something better in place and perhaps more of our own at another time. We will probably give in our next, the paper to be read.

A Valuable New Book.

We have accepted a general agency of Dr. Andrew Stone's new medical work "THE GOSPEL OF HEALTH," an effort to teach people the principles of vital magnetism, or how to replenish the springs of life without drugs or stimulants."

In the knowledge we need to acquire, ranks foremost a proper knowledge of ourselves; our natures and characteristics, our needs and wants, the ability to remove obstructions to health and to avert the insidious diseases that shorten life and lessen happiness. Every person ought to know enough about themselves to be able to treat themselves when health becomes impaired. The world must learn as well to dispense with doctors of medicine as doctors of divinity, and doctors of law. We are supporting far too many doctors of all kinds. We must become our own doctors; treat ourselves when ill, do our own thinking and praying, and be able to act upon our scientific knowledge. This book of Dr. Stone is well calculated to give the needed information in the first department of knowledge, and we confidently recommend it to our readers.

It contains 519 pages. In cloth $2.50. Postage 25 cents. In paper, $1.52. Postage 15 cents. We are prepared to fill orders promptly.

We have received a supply of our friend J. W. Pike's "FALLACIES OF THE FREE LOVE THEORY," or love considered as a religion. A lecture delivered in Washington, D. C., April 25th, 1875. This able thinker is decidedly in favor of the monogamic system of matrimony, and exposes the sophistries of the advocates of the doctrine styled Free Love. His arguments are sound upon the social question, and are well worth reading.

We have the pamphlet for sale. Price 20 cents, sent postage paid by mail.

[We cheerfully give place to the following communication from a valued friend, because it treats upon a subject in which we feel a vital interest. While we think the quoted remarks of A. H. Darrow give unmerited credit to THE TRUTH SEEKER in point of ability, we trust his fears or predictions about its ultimate success are unfounded. We certainly hope THE TRUTH SEEKER is bound to live and flourish many years and do a great amount of good before its friends suffer it to die for want of support. We think friend Darrow, if he looks over the field of defunct journalism, will find quite as many Spiritualistic as Materialistic. We, nevertheless, accord to our Spiritual friends quite as much ardor in sustaining their organs as the other side can claim. There is room, probably, for all to improve somewhat; and let none of us be negligent of our duty. We are to be "the light of the earth," and let us not hold on to the dimes too closely.]

An Appeal.

BY S. H. PRESTON.

That Materialism is inadequate to satisfy the minds of those who turn from orthodoxy, is patent enough. Skepticism (utter skepticism I mean) is as old as Descartes, Voltaire and Paine; yet to-day it cannot sustain two periodicals devoted to its interests; the Boston Investigator has struggled against wind and wave, and barely escaped bankruptcy for many a year.

THE TRUTH SEEKER, although the ablest of newspapers of its class, is destined, unless succored by friendly capital, to meet its fate in either total destruction, or poverty-stricken invalidism. However worthy the doctrines they represent may be, and however earnest and honest may be their intentions to benefit the world, that world will reject them for the present at least, since it considers them soul-less and ill-adapted to meet its religious wants.—A. H. Darrow in Religio-Philosophical Journal, July 17th.

We believe that the facts would better sustain a statement right the reverse of the above. California Common Sense has already caved in, and there are many indications that Spiritualist newspaper stock is far from being what it once was. And this, while skeptical sheets are gradually growing in numbers and influence, the continued prosperity and power of some of the half dozen issued to-day being fully assured. First among these we put THE TRUTH SEEKER, which this writer truly calls "the ablest of newspapers of its class." Confident are we that the great free-thinking, reading masses of this country will keep afloat this fearless little cruiser in the stagnant seas of superstition.

More copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER are sold from some news stands to-day than of all the Spiritual papers together. The Liberal public will, because it feels it must, sustain this honest and earnest organ devoted to science and reform, free-thought and progression—opposed to creeds and dogmas, priestcraft and oppression. While ecclesiastical denagogues and inquisitors are threatening our grand constitutional guarantee of civil and religious rights; while political bigots and persecutors are plotting pious treason in this model government, left to us as a sacred legacy for the race by the heroic Infidels who lived in "the times that tried men's souls;" while representatives of the people are thrust out of legislative bodies, witnesses out of court, and would-be citizens are denied their legal rights because of belief, while true and honest and honorable men are every-where intimidated by bullying bigots into a suppression of their opinions; while all who refuse to have their free limbs bound by the musty bandages of an ancient creed, are set upon and hunted down by all the hiring sleuth-hounds of superstition; while the spirit of religious intolerance predominates, more or less, all over this great church-cursed country; so long as these continue, so long will the poor and struggling, but thinking and untrammelled Infidels recognize the necessity of liberally maintaining such an exponent of their cause as THE TRUTH SEEKER. Why, we have not entirely outlived "the times that tried men's souls," and no man deserving the name of Infidel will flinch to-day at having his pocket tried a little. Let the monied Gospel aristocracy luxuriate in their million dollar churches and high-domed cathedrals, and support their army of sixty-one thousand lazy, licentious, pampered priests, one Infidel printing press will overmatch them all.

Let the Christian congregations browse away upon their crimson cushions and drink down their costly gospel pap. One TRUTH SEEKER can give out a blast like a bugle horn, and should the exigency require, could call to their feet the great free people of this land. It is high time the Infidels of this country knew each other. They may yet have to stand shoulder to shoulder. And we say to our Spiritualist friends, that we deem the security and perpetuation of our privileges as citizens as of far more consequence than all the materializations at the Eddys, or communications from other spheres, even though they discovered the whereabouts of Charlie Ross; and that the common cause of civil and mental liberty, involving alike the interests of all Reformers and well wishers of man, would be the better promoted were they, for a time, to see fewer spirits and more Truth Seekers. All who would not have religious intolerance prevail in this new world as it does in the old, must join hands and work together in one grand, unselfish brotherhood. We trust in no gods. The heaviest artillery usually wins. The powder must be kept dry. Moreover, our praying must be with our purses. And such outspoken prints as THE TRUTH SEEKER must not be allowed to languish for want of means. It is through them that such flagrant outrages as were perpetrated against Julius Nicolai, and Hon. J. W. Thorne, are reported and circulated among the people. Through them the isolated victim of priestly persecution in some out of the way Christian, may whisper his grievances in the public ear. Through them all the fellow soldiers in the grand army of deliverance are to know and understand each other. We hear a great deal from priests about the laborer being worthy of his hire. Those who understand the cost of journalism are aware that Brother Bennett cannot realize much, if anything, from his tracts and publications, at the rate he offers them. Many of his friends know that he is overworking himself—his work being, as he expresses it in a private letter, "to help remove the scales of darkness, error and falsehood from the eyes of our fellow beings, and thus do our race some real and practical good."

Brother Infidels, let us each show our appreciation of THE TRUTH SEEKER office, and our determination to sustain it, by remitting at least one new subscription and the pay therefor before the next issue.

West Winfield, N. Y., July 20.

Oration on Humboldt.

BY COL. R. G. INGERSOLL.

The Universe is Governed by Law.

Great men seem to be part of the infinite brothers of the mountains and the seas. Humboldt was one of these. He was one of those serene men, in some respects like our own Franklin, whose names have all the lustre of a star. He was one of the few, great enough to rise above the superstition and prejudice of his time, and to know that experience, observation and reason are the only basis of knowledge.

He became one of the greatest of men in spite of having been born rich and noble—in spite of position. I say in spite of these things, because wealth and position are generally the enemies of genius, and the destroyers of talent.

It is often said of this or that man, that he is a self-made man—that he was born of the poorest and humblest of parents, and that with every obstacle to overcome he became great. This is a mistake. Poverty is generally an advantage. Most of the intellectual giants of the world have been nursed at the sad and loving breast of poverty. Most of those who have climbed highest on the shining ladder of fame commenced at the lowest round. They were reared in the straw-thatched cottages of Europe; in the log-houses of America; in the factories of the great cities; in the midst of toil; in the smoke and din of labor, and on the verge of want. They were rocked by the feet of mothers whose hands, at the same time, were busy with the needle or the wheel.

It is hard for the rich to resist the thousand allurements of pleasure, and so I say, that Humboldt in spite of having been born to wealth and high social position, became truly and grandly great.

In the antiquated and romantic castle of Tegel by the side of the pine forest on the shore of the charming lake near the beautiful city of Berlin, the great Humboldt, one hundred years ago, was born, and there he was educated after the method suggested by Rousseau—Campe, the philologist and critic, and the intellectual Kunth, being his tutors. There he received the impressions that determined his career; there the great idea that the Universe is governed by law took possession of his mind, and there he dedicated his life to the demonstration of this sublime truth.

He came to the conclusion that the source of man's unhappiness is his ignorance of nature.

After having received the most thorough education at that time possible, and having determined to what end he would devote the labors of his life, he turned his attention to the sciences of geology, mining, mineralogy, botany, the distribution of plants, the distribution of animals, and the effect of climate upon man. All grand physical phenomena were investigated and explained. From his youth he had felt a great desire for travel. He felt, as he says, a violent passion for the sea, and longed to look upon Nature in her wildest and most rugged forms. He longed to give a physical description of the Universe—a grand picture of Nature; to account for all phenomena; to discover the laws governing the world; to do away with that splendid delusion called special providence, and to establish the fact that the Universe is governed by law.

To establish this truth was, and is, of infinite importance to mankind. That fact is the death-knell of superstition; it gives liberty to every soul, annihilates fear, and ushers in the age of reason.

The object of this illustrious man was to comprehend the phenomena of physical objects in their general connection, and to represent Nature as one great whole, moved and animated by internal forces.

For this purpose he turned his attention to descriptive botany, traversing distant lands and mountain ranges to ascertain definitely the geographical distribution of plants. He investigated the laws regulating the differences of temperature and climate, and the changes of the atmosphere. He studied the formation of the earth's crust, explored the deepest mines, ascended the highest mountains, and wandered through the craters of extinct volcanoes.

He became thoroughly acquainted with chemistry, with astronomy, with terrestrial magnetism; and as the investigation of one subject leads to all others, for the reason that there is a mutual dependence and a necessary connection between all facts, so Humboldt became acquainted with all the known sciences.

His fame does not depend so much upon his discoveries (although he discovered enough to make hundreds of reputations), as upon his vast and splendid generalizations.

He was to science what Shakespeare was to the drama.

He found, so to speak, the world full of unconnected facts—all portions of a vast system—parts of a great machine. He discovered the connection which each bears to all, put them together, and demonstrated beyond all contradiction that the earth is governed by law.

He knew that to discover the connection of phenomena is the primary aim of all natural investigation. He was infinitely practical.

Origin and destiny were questions with which he had nothing to do.

His surroundings made him what he was.

In accordance with a law not fully comprehended he was a production of his time.

Great men do not live alone; they are surrounded by the great; they are the instruments used to accomplish the tendencies of their generation; they fulfil the prophecies of their age.

Nearly all of the scientific men of the eighteenth century had the same idea entertained by Humboldt, but most of them in a dim and confused way. There was, however, a general belief among the intelligent that the world is governed by law, and that there really exists a connection between all facts, or that all facts are simply the different aspects of a general fact, and that the task of science is to discover this connection to comprehend this general fact, or to announce the laws of things.

Germany was full of thought, and her universities swarmed with philosophers and grand thinkers in every department of knowledge.

Humboldt was the friend and companion of the greatest poets, historians, philologists, artists, statesmen, critics, and logicians of his time.

He was the companion of Schiller, who believed that man would be regenerated through the influence of the Beautiful; of Goethe, the grand patriarch of German literature; of Weiland, who has been called the Voltaire of Germany; of Herder, who wrote the outlines of a philosophical history of man; of Kotzebue, who lived in the world of romance; of Schleiermacher, the pantheist; of Schlegel, who gave to his countrymen the enchanted realm of Shakespeare; of the sublime Kant, author of the first work published in Germany on Pure Reason; of Fichte, the infinite idealist; of Schopenhauer, the European Buddhist, who followed the great Gautama to the painless and dreamless nirvana, and of hundreds of others, whose names are familiar to, and honored by, the scientific world.

The German mind had been grandly roused from the long lethargy of the dark ages of ignorance, fear, and faith. Guided by the holy light of reason, every department of knowledge was investigated, enriched and illustrated.

Humboldt breathed the atmosphere of investigation; old ideas were abandoned; old creeds, hallowed by centuries were thrown aside; thought became courageous; the athlete, Reason, challenged to mortal combat the monsters of superstition.

No wonder that, under these influences, Humboldt formed the great purpose of presenting to the world a picture of Nature, in order that men might, for the first time, behold the face of their mother.

Europe became too small for his genius; he visited the tropics in the New World, where, in the most circumscribed limits, he could find the greatest number of plants, of animals, and the greatest diversity of climate, that he might ascertain the laws governing the production and distribution of plants, animals and men, and the effects of climate upon them all. He sailed along the gigantic Amazon; the mysterious Oronoco; traversed the Pampas; climbed the Andes until he stood upon the crags of Chimborazo, more than eighteen thousand feet above the level of the sea, and climbed on until blood flowed from his eyes and lips. For nearly five years he pursued his investigations in the New World, accompanied by the intrepid Bonpland. Nothing escaped his attention. He was the best intellectual organ of these new revelations of science. He was calm, reflective and eloquent; filled with the sense of the beautiful and the love of truth. His collections were immense, and valued beyond calculation to every science. He endured innumerable hardships, braved countless dangers in unknown savage lands, and exhausted his fortune for the advancement of true learning.

Upon his return to Europe, he was hailed as the second Columbus; as the scientific discoverer of America; as the revealer of a New World; as the great demonstrator of the sublime truth, that the Universe is governed by law.

I have seen a picture of the old man, sitting upon the mountain side, above him the eternal snow, below the smiling valley of the tropics filled with vine and palm, his chin upon his breast, his eyes deep, thoughtful and calm, his forehead majestic—grander than the mountain upon which he sat—crowned with the snow of his whitened hair, he looked the intellectual autocrat of this world.

Not satisfied with his discoveries in America, he crossed the steppes of Asia, the wastes of Siberia, the great Ural range, adding to the knowledge of mankind at every step. His energy acknowledged no obstacle, his life knew no leisure; every day was filled with labor and with thought.

He was one of the apostles of Science, and he served his divine Master with a self-sacrificing zeal that knew no abatement; with an ardor that constantly increased, and with a devotion unwavering and constant as the polar star.

In order that the people at large might have the benefit of his numerous discoveries and his vast knowledge, he delivered, at Berlin, a course of lectures, consisting of sixty-one free addresses upon the following subjects:

Five, upon the nature and limits of physical geography.

Three, were devoted to a history of Science.

Two, to inducements to a study of natural science.

Sixteen, on the heavens.

Five, on the form, density, latent heat and magnetic power of the earth, and to the polar light.

Four, were on the nature of the crust of the earth, on hot springs, earthquakes and volcanoes.

Two, on mountains and the type of their formation.

Two, on the form of the earth's surface, on the connection of continent, and the elevation of soil over ravines.

Three, on the sea as a globular fluid surrounding the earth.

Ten, on the atmosphere as an elastic fluid surrounding the earth, and on the distribution of heat.

One, on the geographic distribution of organized matter in general.

Three, on the geography of plants.

Three, on the geography of animals, and

Two, on the races of men.

These lectures are what is known as the Cosmos, and present a scientific picture of the world, of infinite diversity and unity, of ceaseless motion in the eternal grasp of law.

These lectures contain the result of his investigation, observation and experience; they furnish the connection between phenomena; they disclose some of the changes through which the earth has passed in the countless ages; the history of vegetation, animals and men; the effects of climate upon individuals and nations, the relation we sustain to other worlds, and demonstrate that all phenomena, whether insignificant or grand, exist in accordance with inexorable law.

There are some truths, however, that we never should forget. Superstition has always been the relentless enemy of science; faith has been a hater of demonstration; hypocrisy has been sincere only in its dread of truth, and all religions are inconsistent with mental freedom.

Since the murder of Hypatia, in the fifth century, when the polished blade of Greek philosophy was broken by the club of ignorant Catholicism, until today, superstition has detested every effort of reason.

It is almost impossible to conceive of the completeness of the victory that the Church achieved over philosophy. For ages science was utterly ignored; thought was a poor slave; an ignorant priest was the master of the world; faith put out the eyes of the soul; the reason was a trembling coward; the imagination was set on fire of hell; every human feeling was sought to be suppressed; love was considered infinitely sinful, pleasure was the road to eternal fire, and God was supposed to be happy only when his children were miserable. The world was governed by an Almighty's whim; prayers could change the order of things, halt the grand procession of Nature, could produce rain, avert pestilence, famine and death in all its forms. There was no idea of the certain; all depended upon divine pleasure, or displeasure rather; heaven was full of inconsistent malevolence, and earth of ignorance. Everything was done to appease the divine wrath; every public calamity was caused by the sins of the people; by a failure to pay tithes, or for having, even in secret, felt a disrespect for a priest. To the poor multitude, the earth was a kind of enchanted forest, full of demons ready to devour, and theological serpents lurking with infinite power to fascinate and torture the unhappy and impotent soul. Life to them was a dim and mysterious labyrinth, in which they wandered weary and lost, guided by priests as bewildered as themselves, without knowing that at every step the Ariadne of reason offered them the long lost clue.

The very heavens were full of death; the lightning was regarded as the glittering vengeance of God, and the earth was thick with snares for the unwary feet of man. The soul was supposed to be crowded with the wild beasts of desire; the heart to be totally corrupt, prompting only to crime; virtues were regarded as only deadly sins in disguise; there was a continual warfare being waged between the Deity and the Devil, for the possession of every soul; the latter being generally considered victorious. The flood, the tornado, the volcano, were all evidences of the displeasure of heaven and the sinfulness of man. The blight that withered, the frost that blackened, the earthquake that devoured, were the messengers of the Creator.

The world was governed by fear.

Against all the evils of nature, there was known only the defense of prayer, of fasting, of credulity and devotion. Man in his helplessness endeavored to soften the heart of God. The faces of the multitude were blanched with fear and wet with tears; they were the prey of hypocrites, kings and priests.

My heart bleeds when I contemplate the sufferings endured by the millions now dead; of those who lived when the world appeared to be insane; when the heavens were filled with an infinite Horror who snatched babes with dimpled hands and rosy cheeks from the white breasts of mothers, and dashed them into an abyss of eternal flame.

Slowly, beautifully, like the coming of the dawn, came the grand truth that the Universe is governed by law; that disease fastens itself upon the good and upon the bad; that the tornado cannot be stopped by counting beads; that the rushing lava pauses not for bended knees; the lightning for clasped and uplifted hands; nor the cruel waves of the sea for prayer; that paying tithes causes, rather than prevents famine; that pleasure is not sin; that happiness is the only good; that demons and gods exist only in the imagination; that faith is a lullaby sung to put the soul to sleep; that devotion is a bribe that fear offers to supposed power; that offering rewards in another world for obedience in this, is simply buying a soul on credit; that knowledge consists in ascertaining the laws of nature, and that wisdom is the science of happiness. Slowly, grandly, beautifully, these truths are dawning upon mankind.

From Copernicus we learn that this earth is only a grain of sand on the infinite shore of the Universe; that everywhere we are surrounded by shining worlds, vastly greater than our own, all moving and existing in accordance with law. True, the earth began to grow small, but man began to grow great.

The moment the fact was established that other worlds are governed by law, it was only natural to conclude that our little world was also under its dominion. The old theological method of accounting for physical phenomena by the pleasure and displeasure of the Deity was, by the intellectual, abandoned. They found that disease, death, life, thought, heat, cold, the seasons, the winds, the dreams of man, the instinct of animals—in short, that all physical and mental phenomena are governed by law, absolute, eternal and inexorable.

Let it be understood, that by the term law, is meant the same invariable relations of succession and resemblance predicated of all facts springing from like conditions. Law is a fact—not a cause. It is a fact, that like conditions produce like results; this fact is Law. When we say that the Universe is governed by law, we mean that this fact, called law, is incapable of change—that it is, has been, and forever will be, the same inexorable, immutable FACT, inseparable from all phenomena. Law, in this sense, was not enacted or made. It could not have been otherwise than as it is. That which necessarily exists has no creator.

Only a few years ago this earth was considered the real centre of the Universe; all the stars were supposed to revolve around this insignificant atom. The German mind, more than any other, has done away with this piece of egotism. Purbach and Muller, in the fifteenth century, contributed most to the advancement of astronomy in their day. To the latter, the world is indebted for the introduction of decimal fractions, which completed our arithmetical notation and formed the second of the three steps, by which, in modern times, the science of numbers has been so greatly improved; and yet both of these men believed in the most childish absurdities, at least in enough of them, to die without their orthodoxy having ever been suspected.

Next came the great Copernicus, and he stands at the head of the heroic thinkers of his time who had the courage and the mental strength to break the chains of prejudice, custom and authority, and to establish truth on the basis of experience, observation and reason. He removed the earth, so to speak, from the centre of the Universe, and ascribed to it a two-fold motion, and demonstrated the true position which it occupies in the solar system.

At his bidding the earth began to revolve, at the command of his genius it commenced its grand flight mid the eternal constellations round the sun.

For fifty years his discoveries were disregarded. All at once, by the exertions of Galileo, they were kindled into so grand a conflagration as to consume the philosophy of Aristotle, to alarm the hierarchy of Rome, and to threaten the existence of every opinion not founded upon experience, observation and reason.

The earth was no longer considered a Universe, governed by the caprices of some revengeful deity, who had made the stars out of what he had left after completing the world, and had stuck them in the sky, simply to adorn the night.

I have said this much concerning astronomy because it was the first splendid step forward! the first sublime blow that shattered the lance and shattered the shield of superstition; the first real help that man received from heaven; because it was the first great lever placed beneath the altar of a false religion; the first revelation of the infinite to man; the first authoritative declaration that the Universe is governed by law; the first science that gave the lie direct to the cosmogony of barbarism and because it is the sublimest victory that the reason has achieved.

In speaking of astronomy, I have confined myself to the discoveries made since the revival of learning. Long ago, on the banks of the Ganges, ages before Copernicus lived, Aryabhatta taught that the earth is a sphere, and revolves on its own axis. This, however, does not detract from the glory of the great German. The discovery of the Hindoo had been lost in the midnight of Europe—in the age of faith, and Copernicus was as much a discoverer as though Aryabhatta had never lived.

In this short address there is no time to speak of other sciences, and to point out the particular evidence furnished by each, to establish the dominion of law, nor to more than mention the name of Descartes, the first who undertook to give an explanation of the celestial motions, or who formed the vast and philosophic conception of reducing all the phenomena of the Universe to the same law; of Montaigne, one of the heroes of common sense; of Galvani, whose experiments gave the telegraph to the world; of Voltaire, who contributed more than any other of the sons of men to the destruction of religious intolerance; of August Comte, whose genius erected to itself a monument that still touches the stars; of Gutenberg, Watt, Stephenson, Arkwright, all soldiers of science in the grand army of the dead kings.

The glory of science is, that it is freeing the soul—breaking the mental manacles—getting the brain out of bondage—giving courage to thought—filling the world with mercy, justice and joy.

Science found agriculture plowing with a stick—reaping with a sickle—commerce at the mercy of the treacherous waves and the inconstant winds—a world without books—without schools—man denying the authority of reason, employing his ingenuity in the manufacture of instruments of torture, in building inquisitions and cathedrals. It found the land filled with malicious monks—with persecuting Protestants and the burners of men. It found a world full of fear; ignorance upon its knees; credulity, the greatest virtue; women treated like beasts of burden; cruelty the only means of reformation. It found the world at the mercy of disease and famine; men trying to read their fates in the stars, and to tell their fortunes by signs and wonders: Generals thinking to conquer their enemies by making the sign of the cross, or by telling a rosary. It found all history full of petty and ridiculous falsehood, and the Almighty was supposed to spend most of his time turning sticks into snakes, drowning boys for swimming on Sunday, and killing little children for the purpose of converting their parents. It found the earth filled with slaves and tyrants, the people in all countries down trodden, half naked, half starved, without hope, and without reason in the world.

Such was the condition of man when the morning of science dawned upon his brain, and before he had heard the sublime declaration that the Universe is governed by law. For the change that has taken place we are indebted solely to science—the only lever capable of raising mankind. Abject faith is barbarism; reason is civilization. To obey is slavish; to act from a sense of obligation perceived by the reason is noble. Ignorance worships mystery; reason explains it: the one grovels, the other soars.

No wonder that fable is the enemy of knowledge. A man with a false diamond shuns the society of lapidaries, and it is upon this principle that superstition abhors science.

In all ages the people have honored those who dishonored them. They have worshiped their destroyers, they have canonized the most gigantic liars and buried the great thieves in marble and gold. Under the loftiest monument sleeps the dust of murder.

Imposture has always worn a crown.

The world is beginning to change because the people are beginning to think. To think is to advance. Everywhere the great minds are investigating the creeds and superstitions of men, the phenomena of nature and the laws of things. At the head of this great army of investigators stood Humboldt—the serene leader of an intellectual host—a king by the suffrage of science and the divine right of Genius.

And to-day we are not honoring some butcher called a soldier, some wily politician called a statesman, some robber called a king, nor some malicious metaphysician called a saint. We are honoring the great Humboldt, whose victories were all achieved in the arena of thought; who destroyed prejudice, ignorance and error—not men; who shed light—not blood, and who contributed to the knowledge, the wealth and the happiness of all mankind.

His life was pure, his aims lofty, his learning varied and profound, and his achievements vast.

We honor him because he has ennobled our race, because he has contributed as much as any man living or dead to the real prosperity of the world. We honor him because he honored us; because he labored for others; because he was the most learned man of the most learned nation; because he left a legacy of glory to every human being. For these reasons he is honored throughout the world. Millions are doing homage to his genius at this moment, and millions are pronouncing his name with reverence and recounting what he accomplished.

We associate the name of Humboldt with oceans, continents, mountains and volcanoes; with the great palms; the wide deserts; the snow-lipped craters of the Andes; with primeval forests and European capitals; with wildernesses and universities; with savages and savans; with the lonely rivers of unpeopled wastes; with peaks and pampas, and steppes, and cliffs and crags; with the progress of the world; with every science known to man, and with every star glittering in the immensity of space.

Humboldt adopted none of the soul-shrinking creeds of his day; wasted none of his time in the stupidities, inanities and contradiction of theological metaphysics; he did not endeavor to harmonize the astronomy and geology of a barbarous people with the science of the nineteenth century. Never, for one moment, did he abandon the sublime standard of truth; he investigated, he studied, he thought, he separated the gold from the dross in the crucible of his grand brain. He was never found on his knees before the altar of superstition. He stood erect by the grand tranquil column of reason. He was an admirer, a lover an adorer of nature, and at the age of ninety, bowed by the weight of nearly a century, covered with the insignia of honor, loved by a nation, respected by a world, with kings for his servants, he laid his weary head upon her bosom—upon the bosom of the Universal mother—and with her loving arms around him, sank into that slumber called death.

History added another name to the starry scroll of the immortals.

The world is his monument; upon the eternal granite of her hills he inscribed his name, and there upon everlasting stone his genius wrote this, the sublimest of truths:

"THE UNIVERSE IS GOVERNED BY LAW."

"God in a Nutshell," and "Everywhere."

S. H. PRESTON CRITICISED.

A huge "nutshell," and an inconsistent idea for consistent minds to offer; yet, no doubt are the result of convictions, and considered as true, hence, Mr. Preston is forced to utter such, if he speaks them at all, even to sending those with other opinions into annihilation, calling his so "self-evident as to admit of no cavil," and yet not so "self-evident," when millions differ from him.

"Are not facts ignored and passed in silence? Yes, plain facts!"

1. "Something must have always been." Agreed. How could "anything now be" without LIFE to produce it? An important question this—

2. Then Life "was eternal and self-existent" if something always was:

3. And, being "eternal and self-existent," is everywhere," and the cause of all worlds and things that exist "everywhere" is it not?

Now readers, these three propositions are as plain as Mr. Preston's four, and I submit to each reader which is the most consistent.

When humanity will admit it is not within the grasp of human intellect to conceive from whence all entities come and go, that moment some respect, at least, may possibly be extended to other opinions by all sensible and reasonable minds. Such is to be hoped for, at least.

Is it not a fact that life is the cause of life, and that like produces its like the world over? and the dead nothing at all? If not a fact, why? By admitting the impossibility of knowing what life is, or from whence it came, the part of wisdom is manifested as better to know everything possible of what can be known as facts, than something so supposed about what cannot be known at all, assuming it as a fact! Think of this in earnest. Many facts are plain to perception. Take a grain of mustard, an apple seed, or that of a peach. Each are widely different in appearance, and have life; or that within each has it, called "the germ," when all but the seed has no life at all, unless called negative. Placing the seed in proper soil, and in its proper time its like appears without any creation, its prototype having previously existed, and this will apply to all existing things having positive life, while negative life has no manifestations to offer.

The idea of "creation" given up as beyond our grasp, or the first of anything, and "nothing" as not in the catalogue of entities, the fact remains as an anchor sure, that life continues to exist, and always has (for all we can learn to the contrary), with evidence in abundance. "Everywhere" it has not been idle, hence would it not be folly for me to assert "there is no God" or Life, because we cannot comprehend it? or to say "there never has been anything for a God to do," or for life to do.

Mr. Preston no doubt thinks the mind perishes with the body, when it is generally admitted as a fact, there is no annihilation, which, if true, does not admit the idea of the mind being squeezed into nothingness. Now, Mr. Editor, you probably agree with Mr. Preston and disagree with my views, but as you profess to be a "Truth Seeker," I offer the foregoing solely to elicit truth, hoping its fate will not be your waste basket for lack of merit in your estimation, for something (if but little) may possibly be learned from every one.

Mr. Preston has stated the views I had for many years, and did it probably better than I could. I have more happy ones now.

The question, whether the mind is immortal, and has a separate existence from the body (the same as an apple seed from its body), or perishes with the body, is not so "self-evident as to admit of no cavil," the proof of such fact yet exists and has from time immemorial.

Respectfully seeking for truth, is A. B. CHURCH.

How Does Blood Help God to Forgive Sin?

Two very pious men near me, for all the time I have been in this State, have abused my good name because I was an Infidel, and said many things against me falsely for Christ's sake.

Supposing these men come to me and desire my forgiveness, I tell them my word is out, never to forgive. They ask, is there no way we can come on friendly terms? Yes, one; kill Hubert, my only son, and sprinkle his blood on you, then I can forgive you. They do it; and are forgiven.

Then years elapse; others come for forgiveness. Well, Hubert's blood is gone, but sprinkle water on you, or be immersed in his name, and drink wine and eat bread, then I can forgive you, else I cannot. Who would not say that I was an idiot? for why could I not have forgiven without my boy's blood?

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

SIR: It is now time that this metropolis should possess a Temple of Reason similar to, or grander than that recently erected in Boston, known as the Paine Memorial Hall, and I am sure that if a movement to that effect were begun, funds would soon flow into its treasury from private donations and bequests, sufficient to meet the wants of the ever-increasing multitude who are now shut out from the churches, because they are too rational to believe in the supernatural, or to admit the false geology, false astronomy, and false reasoning therein, and too honest to submit the guidance of their lives to a system whose fundamental doctrine of atonement is based upon injustice.

It would aid our cause materially if you would, through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER, furnish such facts as would lead us fully to understand—

1st. What the Boston Society have done, in order to effect an organization?

2d. How many trustees has the Boston Society, and how many are required by the laws of the State of New York in order to effect a legal organization?

3d. How many members does the Boston Society contain, including trustees, directors, and lady members?

4th. Can you furnish us with a copy of the doctrines or principles to which they subscribe in order to become members? Also a copy of their special rules regulating their general and special meetings.

In short, any information about the present workings of the Society that would be suggestive to those forming a similar Society; also the names of the trustees to whom James Lick and others made their donations, and a copy of the instrument under which they hold the trust for posterity.

An early answer to these inquiries will oblige me and many others who are in favor of organization and unity of action among Liberals.

CHAS. A. CODMAN.

New York.

[REPLY. We are not, dear friend, sufficiently informed to answer your interrogatories. We only know that there is a fine building erected, and we are proud to say we were present when it was dedicated on the 29th day of January last, to the memory of Thomas Paine, defender of the rights of man. We would refer you to Horace Seaver and J. P. Mendum, editor and publisher of the Boston Investigator, who can furnish you a full answer, and shall be pleased to publish their reply in THE TRUTH SEEKER, so that you and other Liberals throughout the country may be encouraged to go on with the work of organization.—Ed. The Lord a "Good" Pay-master.

MR. EDITOR: Our Christian friends are prone to expatiate upon the punctuality and liberality of the Lord towards all those who give to him and his cause. Christians not only urge one another, but even outsiders to contribute to the cause of religion, saying, "that whosoever giveth to religion, lendeth to the Lord," and he will reward them two-fold. But it seems the Lord sometimes not only forgets his promised reward to his servants, who administer to him and his cause, but delivers them into the power of the adversary. To illustrate more fully, we will relate an incident which occurred some years ago in one of the Eastern States.

Mr. H—, a well-to-do farmer and a prominent member of the Methodist church in the town where he resided, was much given to extolling the Lord as a "good" pay-master. On one occasion, at a distracted meeting, where the preachers were begging for money to put into the Lord's treasury, Brother B. arose and said that he could testify to the goodness of the Lord, and that he knew he was a "good" pay-master; for, said he, not long ago while in meeting one evening, Brother D. came and asked me to give something for the Lord's cause. I was about to give him twenty-five cents, but hesitated a moment, and finally concluded to give one dollar—a big pile for him—and see if the Lord would not in some mysterious manner reward me two-fold. Well, one morning as I was going to feed my cattle, I thought I would take along my gun, and right in the road but a few rods ahead of me stood a large, nice fox. I fired and killed him. A few days after, a very pious brother, who was peddling, stopped with me over the Sabbath and gave me three dollars for the skin—two dollars for one. In all this I saw the hand of Providence; here I was getting two-fold pay. I tell you, brothers and sisters, the Lord is a "good" pay-master; he will never disappoint nor deceive you.

A day or two after this exhortation in the meeting, Brother H— being in town, he purchased some necessities, and in payment presented his "fox" money, when lo! and behold the shopman told him it was not good money, and he should advise him not to try to pass it, as it might get him into trouble. The surprise and astonishment that were depicted in the countenance of Brother H., when he found the Lord had gone back on him, and paid him in bad money, were ludicrous in the extreme.

Brother H. was never afterwards known to allude to the Lord as a "good" pay-master, nor have we ever heard of his shooting any more "Providential" foxes, nor entertaining over the Sabbath any more very pious peddlers. J. HASELTINE.

The All-powerful God.

One of the chief props of the Christian's argument is that his God is "all-powerful," and he will quote: "With God all things are possible." For many years we were among the number who clung tenaciously to this gratuitous assumption. The Christian says (assumes) that God made (created) all things, including this earth, of course, in six days of twenty-four hours each. Science teaches that the planet we inhabit was evolved out of pre-existing matter in accordance with nature's eternal, changeless laws. Taken at his own words and definitions, the Christian's God is changeable, while the God of science is immutable.

Let us for a moment look at some of the potentialities assumed of the Christian God. We may point back to the legendary tales coming down through Hebrew history, whose parallels we find in the mythologies of India, Persia, Greece and Rome. Later in the stage of thaumaturgy appears God's only son as a miracle performer. But Jesus, as a magician, is inferior to Aaron of old. God, the father, displayed more power than the Son. Indeed Samson really exhibited more marvelous powers than Jesus.

True, the latter raised the dead; but this is nothing new in more recent times, as claimed on respectable and authentic authority under the Church of Rome. Now some of the acutest minds in the Church to-day are attempting to throw miracle overboard and found evangelical Christianity on a scientific basis. This done, and what becomes of the "all-powerful" God? No! The priests will sniff the air afar and sound the warning before such a diabolical thing shall be accomplished. Renan says, "that miracle is not impossible, but hitherto no miracle has been proven." This is the point! All things may be "possible with God," but of this we know not from verifiable sources. Christ may have been crucified and placed in the sepulchre as dead, but that every function of his body had been stilled in actual death is open to grave doubts. What competent physician examined his pulse, and took notes of his physical condition? He was, according to the account, on the cross only a few hours—a much shorter time than ordinary criminals, and not longer than some have remained apparently asphyxiated and unconscious after hanging by the neck in England, and yet in whom life and consciousness again returned. The death on the cross may only have been a swoon or simulated death. We say it is open to doubt.

Jesus' ascension is also open to the same suspicion, because attested to only by interested parties. The story of the "earthquake" and the "darkening of the sun," when claimed as marks of divine power, is only begging the question. Not long ago, when science was weak and struggling against the persecutions of the Church, eclipses, thunder and lightning were regarded with superstitious awe. It certainly must be a source of keen regret to the devout Christian that these marks of divine power are not of frequent occurrence in modern times. Freethinkers, certainly, are not to be blamed for attaching more or less suspicion to those old occurrences which happened under Messrs. Aaron, Joshua, and the stories of the fiery furnace, the hungry bears and big fish. Let us have a few No. 1 demonstrations from the Christian's God like this:

1. Make the Mississippi river run up hill—say into the Arctic ocean.
2. Pile the Pacific ocean on top of the Atlantic without flooding the Continent, and
3. Put all the water of the Gulf of Mexico into a quart jug.

Three feats of this kind would be sufficient to convert the heart of a salamander, and would at once confirm the assumption of the pious Christian.

The pious man when "cornered," says: "O! we see God's power daily in the sunshine, the air, the water and all that surround us." But this the Freethinker calls nature's forces, which are constant equivalents in whatsoever way manifested. The Christian acknowledges that the laws of nature have an existence; so far he and the Freethinker agree. But the Christian says, "If you have laws, it necessarily follows there must be a law-maker." By the same logic the Freethinker replies that, if you have a God, you must, of necessity, have a God-maker.

Again: If "salvation" be so important, why don't this "all-powerful" God make it so plain—write it in letters of blood across the noon-day sun—so that all might read and have eternal life. On humanitarian principles, it ought to be done. It would be economic. This business of the Devil getting ninety-nine hundredths of the human family ought to be stopped, and it's going from bad to worse! In fact God, in his fatherly love for his children, ought to do something, as the priests can't manage things any more. Just look at B. Well, no matter. If only the Devil was killed; but, my eyes, what a howl of protest from the priests were this to be attempted. It would never do—wouldn't be "policy." We doubt if, in this case, God could be a "free agent," or if he would have the power to annihilate his old enemy.

In conclusion, the more we look at this matter, the more we think the facts bear us out that the assertion of Christians with regard to God's capabilities of physical power is very like their piety—a "bladder of wind." WHISTLER.

How to Reform.

FRIEND BENNETT: I have read with pleasure, and I hope with profit, your book, "The Heathens of the Heath." As to its merits as a novel, I do not presume to be competent to judge. It is interesting, amusing, and instructive; but I value the book more for its historical facts than for its fiction, though they may not appear so evident to the American reader as to one who has been familiar with the manners and customs of the people and priesthood of which the author writes. But these heathens of the heath—who are they? When and where was the reformation made that produced such effects upon an ignorant, scottish, and miserable community? At Lanark, in Scotland, I think about forty-eight or fifty years ago, a reformation similar to this was effected, and was produced by the single endeavors of that benevolent Freethinker, Robert Owen, father of the present R. D. Owen. Lanark was, at that time, a small factory village situated in a glen or valley far apart from more civilized communities, and its inhabitants were the refuse of more populous districts, who made it a hiding-place from justice. This was the condition of the place when Mr. Owen took possession of the factory, and as Owen's philosophy was that man, or a community, could be better and easier governed by attraction than by repulsion, this was a fine field in which to try the experiment.

His first object was to get the good-will and affection of the people, and then appeal to their reason. He engaged teachers for the children, and built school-houses. He was the first man to reduce the hours of labor in factories in England and Scotland. He took much interest in the progress of education. He instituted philosophical exhibitions and amusements, and miniature performances for the children, which attracted their mothers, and they by degrees attracted the men. Night-schools were opened for men and boys. Then came down the tavern signs, and Lanark became a happy and prosperous village, and the change was acknowledged by both priest and press, the country round.

My space is limited or I might give you many little anecdotes that I have had from his own lips.

T. B. JOHNSON.

Thomas Paine.

MR. EDITOR: Your paper of April 1st, has a long article giving the various Christian accounts of the death of Thomas Paine. They all charge that he died lamenting that he did not enjoy the sweet peace with which heaven impregnates those who approve of Calvin's burning Servetus. These statements may be all true, or they may be all false, or they may be mixed—some truth with some falsehood.

Napoleon I. was a devout Catholic, yet when the Pope refused to give him a divorce from Josephine, he imprisoned him for a long time. Some of his staff officers being shocked at such impiety, asked him if he did not think that on his death bed, he would have to repent of his unchristian conduct.

Certainly I will, said he; when a man is dying, his mind and his sympathies revert to the times of his youth, and as in my youth I should not dare to think of doing such a thing, so on my dying bed I shall be filled with remorse on account of this deed—"once a man, twice a child."

Precisely this same thing occurs among the dying Pagan converts to Christianity, they can be kept true to their new faith by means of coercion, cajolery and by personal benefits to be derived therefrom, but they demand to be allowed to die in the (to them) blessed faith of idolatry as did their fathers and mothers. This may have been the case with Mr. Paine, (provided his parents and those that were dearest to him died Christians), or it may be, as I fear it is, that these statements have been invented by the clergy, in order to assist in preserving their profitable employment from danger.

Within the last fifteen years it has become customary for the three liberal professions—law, physic and divinity—to work in concert. An attorney will never counsel his client to bring a clergyman in court as evidence in any case, for he would be necessitated to speak the truth, and possibly give offense to some paying member of his church, or else lie and give offense to some other paying brother. In either case the Gospel herald would be out of pocket something, consequently he would retaliate by withdrawing the patronage of his flock from that attorney's law shop, precisely as he does to the butcher, the baker or the dry goods man, if they venture to accept pay from him for their goods. Also, when a man is about to die, who has not been sufficiently liberal towards the support of the gospel, the physician is expected to impregnate him with spasmodic drugs, so as to make it easy for the herald to make a profitable sermon picturing the agonies of the dying Infidel or the parsimonious Christian. If the dying man had been sufficiently liberal in his payments, he is regaled with exhilarating decoctions, making him exhibit a glorious specimen of a happy flight from time to that beautiful land, where, according to the Christian Bible, they have had two wars, the last one occurring seventeen hundred years ago, no notice having been transmitted to this planet in regard to its termination, whether successful or otherwise. To say what we have to say in regard to what Mr. Paine did say, or did not say, his last words evidently were not, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? ROYAL.

The Press on Beecher.

Do you want to know the real judgment of the people upon Henry Ward Beecher? It is in the fact that books bearing his name have utterly ceased to sell. No man and no woman will now buy a book of which he is the author. —N. Y. Sun.

THE CATHOLIC CLERGY COUNTED OUT.—Some of Mr. Beecher's friends—probably Brother Shearman is the main mover—are spreading the report that Cardinal McCloskey, Bishop Loughlin, and other Catholic prelates are likely to participate in a demonstration in honor of Beecher, proposed by Plymouth church. Such an absurd story is in keeping with Shearman's prayers and tears and the whole management of Mr. Beecher's case. —Boston Pilot.

BEECHER'S IMPROPER CONDUCT.—The immodest estimate which Mr. Beecher made of his own goodness and greatness in his speech last evening will hardly strike the world favorably. If he had really dwelt during the past five years so near to God as he asserts, he would not have gone down on his knees to a "heathen," or humbled himself before Theodore Tilton, or prayed that a woman outside of his own household should come and comfort him. But if Mr. Beecher's estimate of himself is a trifle overdrawn, his confidence in Plymouth church is not misplaced. That congregation of emotional and business Christians will never desert the pastor while the annual rental of pews nets $70,000, or while merchants, lawyers and stock-jobbers find in the "lecture-room" such a pleasant place to vent their spare piety and rhetoric. —Utica Observer.

In an article on "Mr. Beecher's conduct since the trial," the New York Sun says of the pastor's boasting that the expenses of the said trial had been more than $75,000, and that Plymouth church had given him the money to pay it, and saying, "On the other side the expenses have also been large, but they have got no money to pay them with."

Making fun at the expense of his accuser's poverty is certainly a remarkable thing for a minister of exalted religious susceptibility and Christian character to do. What is the hide of this man made of?

The exhibition Mr. Beecher is making of himself is casting new reproach on the Christian ministry of the country with which he still claims and has affiliation. He would do better to retire into the wilderness for a season, and with fasting and prayer realize in his character and in the chastening of his spirit the lesson of the terrible trial through which he has passed. His attitudinizing in the part of a manly fellow and an honest man is not of benefit to him, or edifying to the religious or irreligious community.

LICENTIOUS MINISTERS MUST BE REFORMED.—Since the arraignment of the pastor of Plymouth church, ministerial scandals have become a common topic. Scarcely a day passes that does not herald charges more or less grave against pulpit occupants. How many have been made public since the Beecher scandal first took definite shape and form, we have not the means of accurately stating just now, but the number is certainly very great compared with the aggregate of ministers. Laymen appear to have taken courage, and clerical sins hitherto compounded and sedulously concealed, have been brought to the light of day, and Philadelphia has not been without her share. The last case is one now on trial before a church tribunal, and comment upon which would scarcely be proper, as there is a decided conflict of testimony. Whatever the results, it is to the credit of the laymen of the church most interested that they resolved to reach the truth, if such a thing were possible, and if that course were inflexibly pursued, whenever reasonable grounds for its adoption existed, ministerial undue familiarities would become less frequent, and ministerial influence be immensely enlarged. —Philadelphia Evening Chronicle.

NOT SUCCESSFUL.—Mr. Beecher's parishioners, being blessed with wealth, have chosen to gild the stains upon his character, and to plug the holes in his reputation, which the scandal trial failed to stop, with the same material the dentist uses to plug a carious tooth. But so long as Mrs. Moulton's and Mrs. Bradshaw's testimony is unimpeached, and Mr. Beecher's letters are not rationally explained, just so long will the stains be apt to show through the gilding, and the bullion plugs will be continually dropping out. And just so long will Mr. Beecher continue to "sit upon the ragged edge of anxiety, remorse, despair and fear." They may vote him more money, or pave the paths about his mansion with gold until they shine like the pavements of the "New Jerusalem," and he may be "cheerful at times," as he says "he has been so often among his friends, while suffering all the torments of the damned." He will continue to "pass sleepless nights often, and come up full and fresh on Sunday; but that wearing and grinding of the nervous system," of which he speaks in one of his letters, will still continue; for in the human mind there is such an element as conscience, and it will do its rightful work at last.

The public can never be made to believe that Mr. Beecher is innocent by any amount of crying or kissing, by voting money, or sending "pastoral" letters, numerous signed, until all these dark and mysterious transactions are brought to light. So far they have not been convinced that there could have been so much lurid smoke for so long a time without any fire; such an unsavory odor of carrion, filling all the land, which Coleridge says he counted in the city of Cologne, from virtue, undecayed; and we shall still look for the time when, in spite of all subterfuges, in the language of John Milton, "daylight and truth will meet us with a clear dawn; representing to our view, though at far distance, true colors and real shapes." —Boston Herald.

WHY THE TRUTH HAS BEEN TOLD.—There is no reason why Mr. Beecher should not go among his friends and allow them to cheer him and give him money; but when he and his friends become the aggressors and present their pastor as the victim of a wanton conspiracy, they do him infinite harm. They compel us to say that Mr. Beecher, judged by his own written and spoken record, is unworthy to teach the Gospel. By his own confession, he brought ruin upon a home he was bound to protect and cherish.

When the scandals were first breathed the Press took his side almost without an exception. They defended him so long as defense was possible. They had every inclination to aid Mr. Beecher. He was a national man, a great orator and writer, with a hundred winning qualities, who lived in the sunshine of enthusiastic friendship, and whose fall it was naturally feared would be a misfortune to the country and religion. Mr. Beecher caused the change in the tone of the press. The newspapers were not within the ægis of Plymouth church. They knew the meaning of English, and when they found a master of phrase humbling himself before an adversary as before his God, and wishing he were dead, and that he alone was guilty; and when they saw him paying money to purchase silence, and for four years a puppet in the hands of a shrewd, driving business man, arranging "devices" after "devices" to "save ourselves," they reached a conclusion which Mr. Beecher's moaning rhetoric under a Peekskill moon cannot destroy. We do not know of anything that would have given the press higher satisfaction than to have seen Henry Ward Beecher overthrow his accusers by showing his absolute and undoubted innocence. Moulton and Tilton were nothing to us in comparison to him, and if he had been truly innocent the journals would have seen them float over the "moral Niagara" without a regret. Even now no one desires to be cruel to Mr. Beecher. We know of no man in public life to whom more kindness would naturally flow. But he must not pose as a martyr. Whatever he may be to Plymouth church, to the world he is no longer the Beecher of the old days. The Beecher of the old days is dead. The Beecher of freedom and emancipation and religious tolerance—the Beecher who did such valiant service in England—no longer lives. He died under the pen and pistol of Frank Moulton when he signed the letter of contrition—a letter which he could no more deny to the common sense of mankind than Shakespeare could have denied "Hamlet." —N. Y. Herald.

LIFTING THE MASK.—If anything were needed to prove that Mr. Beecher is a guilty man after the revelations of the trial he has supplied the deficiency. His conduct since the trial has had all the force of an unconscious and unintended confession. At the Plymouth meeting in which he defied public sentiment, and declared that he was a manly fellow, and told what he should do, and boasted that he and God were against the world, he lifted the mask from a conscience-stricken mind, so that any one of ordinary insight could see its writhings and feel its desperation. Innocence never talks in that rampant and half impious way. True manliness is modest and does not need to shake its fist in the face of all mankind, and slap the Almighty on the shoulder to prove that it is courageous.

But the Peekskill demonstration lifted the mask still more. At Plymouth he was defiant; on his farm he was exultant and broke into braggadocio. He had gone thro' the red sea and gained strength by the exercise. He had come out of the fiery trial without so much as a singed hair. He was all right; and he even went on to tell the reason of his escape. His honesty had saved him. His truthfulness had supported him. His character had carried him through. Such assertions are enough to make one gasp for breath. He himself confesses that the trial cost him over $75,000. But for the constant and herculean efforts of an able council, and devoted church, and hundreds of friends, he would have been convicted. No unbiased human being can read his answers to the cross-questioning of Mr. Fullerton and see his miserable shufflings and evasions and pottering with a double sense, without feeling that the truth was not in him. For four years, according to the showing of the witnesses and his own confession, he was engaged in a long and complicated conspiracy to deceive the public and cheat friends, and even to hoodwink his own investigating committee, and yet this man has the impudence to boast that his truthfulness saved him. The man who has confessed on the witness stand and in his letters to conduct which shows the want of common morality, proclaims himself an example of character for young men to imitate! Such brazen declarations show an utter demoralization of mind. They lift the mask on features that are enough to make the discerning shudder. He is having his punishment in what he is. Everything he does shows what no mask can conceal. Judged by a worthy standard of morals he is an unconvicted crime, a living lie. And the professions of virtue and claims of piety with which he insults mankind are despairing clutches of a mind that knows its utter nakedness of anything to cover its depravity. —Golden Age.

BEECHER AS AN INNOCENT MAN.—Supposing Mr. Beecher to be innocent, what is it that yet remains for him to answer for? He and his friends do not deny that he perpetrated the indiscretion of allowing Mrs. Tilton to grow too fond of him. In response to the suggestion that no good man in his senses but could and would have nipped such a passion in the bud, they claim that Mr. Beecher is a mere child, that he is so emotional as not to be responsible for his acts, and that he has suffered enough in spirit for the thoughtless imprudence of disrupting a marriage tie which he himself had bound, of destroying a household into which he had entered as a sacred guest, of blighting the fair fame of a woman who had bloomed beneath his hand, and of sending little innocent children forth upon the battle of life, hard at best, with blasted names and broken fortunes. Yet, though he hung upon the edges of despair while there was a hope of averting a part of the disaster he had wrought, now that it is complete and exposed to the knowledge of all the world, this tender, gentle, child-like spirit rides the whirlwind and guides the storm with the audacity and firmness, the skill and the will of a demon of darkness. He stands defiant in his pulpit, receiving with triumphant smiles the homage of the multitude. There is not an additional wrinkle on his brow or a gray hair the more upon his head. There is no tremor in his voice. The trial is over, and, content with such vindication as it has brought him, he haughtily dismisses the past. It can let loose no phantoms to haunt his soul as long as he is the idol of this flock of rich voluptuaries. What cares he for its shadow as he stands, one ruddy and one vast substantial grin, in the glare of Plymouth church, his expenses made good to him by a doubled salary, and his sensational capacity augmented by this last amazing lucky hit of his? It is Tweed let loose and elected Mayor of New York. It is anything, anybody without the sense of grief or shame, or any gentle, self-denying, manly virtue or modesty, lording it amid the invisible ruins of the little moral world about him, and complacently receiving the ovation of fools and knaves. A sweet, lamb-like spirit, truly! preaching the grace of humility on a hundred thousand dollars a year and playing monkey-tricks for the edification of righteous worldlings who think that there is no harm in fornication.

He is stronger now than ever, they tell us. He is at length completely master of Plymouth church. In 1866, because of a liberal and patriotic speech he made, inculcating tolerance to the South, they came within an ace of turning him out. He had to make an humble apology for being, "for one night only," a Christian and a patriot. Not so since he has passed through a lascivious, sentimental ordeal, seduced a woman, submitted to blackmail, and bullied his way to a divided verdict from a jury which his managers regarded as their own. That is an achievement to be visited with flowers and applause, with more flowers and applause, and with flowers and applause again, together with a salary double that of the doubled Presidential income, a respite of three months and preparations for a grand display of pious fire-works in the autumn. Faugh! it smells to heaven! Nay, this is not all. So far from shunning these vainglorious displays—this ground and lofty tumbling—our peaceful shepherd, usurping the attributes of his Maker, numbers his own days, and fixes the date of his physical demise. He is to live in glory, though he does not tell us to what extent he will sin in glory, for the next twenty years. Twenty years—twenty bully, golden years! A goodly time, by the mass! with a hundred thousand dollars stuck to each, and a first-class line of march to Greenwood at the close, to say nothing of the bevy of angels in short skirts and spangles to bear him off, as Don Giovanni was not borne off in the amusing operative extravaganza.

Why should Beecher retire from the world? He has been the central figure of a scandal the most enormously demoralizing of any that has ever cursed the earth. He has been the creature of a myriad of indecent jests all over the world. He has brought to hearthstones base suggestions, that else had never entered there—he has familiarized the young with guilty love—he has popularized the idea of adultery, and it is safe to say that this affair of his has caused more lapses from virtue than any event in modern times. But, being guilty, why should he retire? He must face it out in order to establish an innocence that, if it were genuine, would shrink back and say, "God's will be done." Not a bit of it. He has no thought of submitting himself to any such upstart as God Almighty as long as he can set up a little brass heaven of his own and run a race with destiny. Born an actor and a great one, he will die an actor; but, like others of his kind, let us hope he will "leave no copy." —Courier.

Another "Tidal-wave" of Orthodox Christianity.

MR. EDITOR: I have noticed for more than fifty years, that about every decade, and sometimes oftener, that the orthodox God pours out his spirit upon the people of this nation, and adds to the churches of such and such only as shall be saved, or expect to be, by some one's righteousness besides their own, and on all such occasions the holy ones—the pious editors in particular—in order to show their gratitude to their God, take special pains to eject a large amount of orthodox filth upon the name of PAINE, and they use their old stereotyped politeness by calling him Tom Paine, and they always assert that he died in great agony, calling on God to have mercy on his soul, and regretting that he ever wrote such a wicked book as the "Age of Reason," and they quote from a pamphlet or tract, that they hired a pious liar by the name of Grant Thorburn to write.

This Thorburn pretended to have boarded in the same house in company with Paine, and one of the "religious tract societies" gave this fellow a hundred dollars for the libel he wrote on Paine. This pious (?) slanderer was afterwards convicted—so history says—of various thefts, and was forced to sign a libel for things he had said against the character of a lady. I am moved to write this letter by reading an article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of April 1st, which you quote from a paper calling itself the Christian Observer, whose editor consoles himself by saying that "Paine's birthday was scarcely noticed this year in this city. Thirty years ago it was celebrated with great enthusiasm; now none so poor as to do him reverence."

The editor then adds this lie, viz: "Infidelity is not half so rife as it was just after the Revolutionary war; not half so wide spread as it was fifty years ago." If this editor did not know that both these assertions are great lies, he is to be pitied for his ignorance. He adds another gross falsehood; he says: "The old members have gone into another world, and have left no successors." Their successors are now ten to where they numbered one thirty years ago. Paine's name is as much revered now by tens of thousands of our best minds as any of the Revolutionary patriots.

I have taken some pains to distribute his "Age of Reason," and I find no man to whom I have sold a copy (whose mind has not been misled by orthodox training), that does not highly prove it. It is free from all the vulgarity and nastiness that we find in the orthodox Bible, and the "Age of Reason" is growing more into public favor, and will continue to do so until orthodox clergymen learn to preach a gospel with more common sense, reason and justice in it, than they do at present, although they have knocked off some of the rough corners of their old-time creeds.

Beecher's Union says of the Bible, (speaking in regard to Infidel attacks on it,) "It survives both friends and foes, without being able to speak one word in its own behalf but what it has already said; it moves on in majestic silence, totally unharmed by the attacks of its millions of foes, it is the same blessed gospel that must be accepted by all mankind, or they must eternally perish."

I would like to ask the man who uttered this nonsensical falsehood, if he had never read or heard of a distinguished philanthropist by the name of Paine, who fired one shot from his twenty inch gun at his blessed, invulnerable Bible, and tore a hole clear through it, or, as the sailors say, tore it from "stem to stern," so as to let the light of reason and common sense shine clean through it, and show its inherent deformity? The shot so riddled the old hulk that one Bishop Watson came to its rescue by writing an "apology," and the old craft is in such a condition now (and has been for some years), that they have three or four hundred of the best boss gospel carpenters in Christendom at work, to so repair it that it shall not soon fall to pieces. It has cost the Churches untold millions to keep the old craft in decent repair since Paine fired his big gun through it. And these three or four hundred (more or less) D.D.'s. have been doctoring this perfectly healthy patient (?) for two or three years, and it has so many gangrenous spots that it is supposed it will take them several years more before they will get it sufficiently patched up to be turned loose upon the world with any expectation that it will long be able "to paddle its own canoe."

This wonderful God-aiding council proposes to make all needful (!) alterations and additions to this divine document that they think God, in his shortsightedness, seems to have left out. I would suggest, at this time, only one addition that I think will be of great importance for "all of human kind" to know, and I would add it as an appendix to one of that God-like man's (King David) comforting declarations, when he says, "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom." I would like them to add or append to this the following, viz: And the fear of the orthodox Devil is the end of it.

I think there is much more truth and sense in the latter than in the former. I think the two should be yoked together, and that they would be considered as closely related as the Siamese twins.

But to return from this discussion. I really hope this "Christian observer" will not "lay the flattering unction to his soul," that the followers and lovers of Paine are diminishing in the least; if he should, I would ask him to look at the beautiful and magnificent "Paine Hall" that has just been finished and dedicated to his revered name in Boston, where a hundred years ago the best Puritanic Christianity they had was employed in publicly whipping lovely and innocent Quaker girls for insisting that they had the right to worship a God in such manner as they might choose, where men and women, and even children, were whipped publicly in the street, fined, imprisoned, branded, and hanged for choosing their own mode of religious worship.

In the city of Boston, where "primitive Christianity" held unbounded sway for nearly or quite a century, we find a greater proportion of Infidels (positive ones I mean) than in any city in the Union.

These few facts show that Christianity is in a fatal decline, and that Infidelity is "running and being glorified" throughout all Christendom. Yours for continued progress,

T. J. MOORE.
Starfield, Ill., April 20th, 1875.

The Religious Amendment.

The great and all-absorbing question of the day is the proposed religious amendment. It can no longer be denied that it is the duty of every Christian in the land to stand up and demand that our God and the holy Bible be put in the Constitution of the United States without further delay. I feel sorrowful and solemnly sad that, as a nation, we should be compelled to longer abide under our present Godless instrument. Let us all be sorrowful—we have cause to be. It behooves us as Christians to at all times be sorrowful. "Sorrow is better than laughter, for by the sadness of the countenance the heart is made better. The heart of the wise is in the house of mourning, but the heart of the fool is in the house of mirth" (Eccl. vii: 3, 4). We must frown down upon the fool. We must work for power and law to enforce obedience to God's mandates as laid down in his holy Word. That this has not yet been accomplished is an especial cause for sorrow at this time. Inasmuch as we are created in God's own image, we should endeavor to be like unto him. "And it repented the Lord that he had made man on the earth, and it grieved him at his heart" (Gen. vi: 6); "The Lord said he would dwell in thick darkness" (1 Kings 8: 12); "He made the darkness his secret place" (Ps. xviii: 11); "Clouds and darkness are round about him" (Ps. lxxviii: 2). So let us humble ourselves, hang our heads, be lowly and full of lamentation.

In speaking of putting God in the Constitution we mean to include our beloved Christ Jesus, for he is one with God. He himself hath said. "I and my father are one" (John x: 30); "All power is given unto me in heaven and on earth" (Matt. xxviii: 18). Inspired writers, in confirmation of this, have declared that, he "who being in the form of God thought it not robbery to be equal with God" (Phil. ii: 5). Yea, Father, Son and Holy Ghost constitute one God, "for there are three that bear record in heaven" (1 John v: 7). The three as one must bear record in the Constitution, for "the Lord our God is one Lord" (Deut. vi: 4).

"No man hath seen God at any time" (John i: 18); "Ye hath neither heard his voice at any time, nor seen his shape" (John v: 37), but we have the evidence within the covers of his blessed book that he is an all-sufficient God, for "with God all things are possible" (Matt. xix: 26). Witness his noble attributes: "For I, the Lord thy God, am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation" (Ex. xx: 5); "Jacob have I loved and Esau have I hated" (Rom. ix: 13); "Thus saith the Lord, behold I frame evil against you and devise a device against you" (Jer. xviii: 11); "I make peace and create evil, I the Lord do all these things" (Is. xxxv: 7); "For it was of the Lord to harden their hearts that they should come against Israel in battle, that he might destroy them utterly, and that they might have no favor" (Josh. xi: 20); "The Lord is a man of war" (Ex. xv: 3); "I will not pity, nor spare, nor have mercy, but destroy" (Jer. xiii: 14); "And thou shalt consume all the people which the Lord thy God shall deliver thee; thine eye shall have no pity upon them" (Deut. vii: 16); "Now go and smite Amalek, and utterly destroy all that they have, and spare them not, but slay both man and woman, infant and suckling" (1 Sam. xv: 2, 3); "The Lord thy God is a consuming fire" (Deut. iv: 24); "For I have kindled a fire in mine anger, which shall burn forever" (Jer. xvii: 4). Is not this reason enough why we should acknowledge him in our Constitution as supreme ruler? The attributes of man in this day and generation are so nearly allied to him that it is no better than heresy or blasphemy to longer delay the adoption of the proposed Christian amendment. In proof of man's likeness to God we have but to turn to his holy Word and read: "And the Lord God said, Behold the man is become as one of us" (Gen. iii: 22).

Let us work day and night, "nor tarry nor tire" until this God-inspired amendment is adopted. Infidelity is making rapid strides in our land. It must be put down, and the first step toward that end is to Christianize the Constitution. Heresy can then be punished by death on the rack, or at the stake, as our law-makers, or inquisitorial tribunal, may elect.

We have some noble men in the field now, working for God—such as the Rev. Jonathan Edwards, who says, "Infidels have no rights we do respect," and the Rev. Mr. Wells, secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association of Northern Ohio, who says, "the time is coming when Christians will love God so intensely that they will put to death even their own children who may be found holding and teaching heretical opinions." Noble men! They love God now! Their great hearts are full of those high attributes of God. Give us enough of such men, and we can have one hundred thousand Infidels burned, racked and thumbscrewed before the first half of the next decade shall have passed by.

We might be carrying out the fruits of our love to God now, were it not that our Infidel Constitution stands in the way. This great barrier—the work of our Infidel forefathers, must be removed. If in no other way, we must rise in our might and overthrow it by force of arms, and re-establish the God-given times of old, when Christianity was in the ascendancy.

The public schools, as well as the churches, must be in the hands of the Christians. 'Tis there we must indoctrinate the young. They must be taught to quote all the scripture possible, both in writing and in conversation, in order to keep God's holy word constantly before the people. There must be no plays, dances, nor mirthfulness, whatsoever. There must be no affection, love, nor friendship, allowed to exist between sexes or persons, for God says in his holy book, "if any man come unto me and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brother and sisters, yea, and even his own life also, he cannot be my disciple" (Luke xiv: 26). Love God only, and let that love be such as the Rev. Mr. Wells describes, and such as will cause you to offer up your own children as a burnt offering unto God, as did Jephthah, of his own daughter, when God delivered the children of Ammon into his hands" (Judges xi).

Sectarianism is all well enough for common, to keep up strife, to make us hate each other, and to make us look glum, but we must all unite under the banner of the Y. M. C. A. in order to perfect our scheme for the punishment of Infidelity.

Infidels, so far as their belief is concerned, matter nothing; but it is the unpardonable sin of their refusing to contribute to the support of the church that we cannot, and will not, tolerate. So far as any other sin is concerned, it is nothing to us, "for there is no man that sinneth not" (1 Kings viii: 46); "Who can say I have made my heart clean; I am pure from my sin?" (Rev. xx: 6); "For there is not a just man upon earth, that doeth good and sinneth not" (Eccl. vii: 20); "There is none righteous, no, not one" (Rom. iii: 10).

Again, we are all on the same plane at the end of this life; but that is no reason why the Infidel should not be made to help support the church. In proof of this sameness at the end of life, we have but to turn to holy writ and read: "As the cloud is consumed and vanisheth away, so he that goes down to the grave shall come up no more" (Job vii: 9); "The dead know not anything, neither have they any more a reward" (Eccl. ix: 5); "They are dead, they shall not live; they are deceased, they shall not rise" (Is. xxvi: 14); "For that which befalleth the sons of men befalleth the beasts, even one thing befalleth them; as the one dieth so dieth the other; yea, they have all one breath, so that a man hath no pre-eminence above a beast" (Eccl. iii: 19).

But let us work for the amendment, for we must again show the world the power and glory of the church. The people must be made to study the scriptures of truth, and get wisdom, "for in much wisdom is much grief, and he that increaseth knowledge increaseth sorrow" (Eccl. i: 18). This grief and sorrow will bring us down, and render us far more likely to incur the anathemas of our brethren, for "wo unto you when all men shall speak well of you" (Luke vi: 26).

We must have a Christian dictator at the head of the nation; even such an one as was Moses, so that thousands and tens of thousands may be slain as of old, and let the word be, "Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, put every man his sword by his side, and go in and out from gate to gate throughout the camp, and slay every man his brother, and every man his companion, and every man his neighbor" (Ev. xxxii: 27). And when the victors return with their spoils from the Infidel, Spiritualist, Unitarian and Universalist camps, let future history speak of our dictator as does the holy Bible of Moses: "And Moses said unto them, have ye saved all the women alive? . . . Now therefore kill every male among the little ones, and kill every woman that hath known a man by lying with him: but all the women-children that hath known a man by lying with him, keep alive for yourselves" (Num. xxxi: 15, 17, 18). AMEN. Thank the Lord! Let us hasten the adoption of the amendment! Let it be in our day, while we are yet in our prime.

JULY 9TH, 1875.

[THREE HUNDRED AND FIRST MEETING.]

MRS. DR. S. B. CHASE read a paper entitled Responsibility of Sex, from which we can give but a few extracts.

At an age averaging from twelve to sixteen years, the girl suddenly withdraws from the arena of activity and amusement which has been common with her male companion, while he, gratified with the same pastimes as before, continues on for years only a boy, and the same boy still. Following her on her divergent path, we find her marvelously transformed. She has become suddenly increased in stature; her bony fabric has acquired nearly its standard solidity; her general tissues, firmness and strength, and her pelvis and pelvic viscera nearly their maximum stablesness and capacity. Her former lean and awkward figure has given place to symmetry and elegance of proportion, and her former romping and ungainly action to a movement graceful and charming. Her eye gleams with a softer lustre, her bosom heaves with an increased volume and beauty, and her voice, from lark-like, has become dove-like.

Psychologically, she is a new creature, her soul has become the throne of a new motive and a new hope. Her family of dolls, so long caressed, are orphaned and forgotten; her jumper-cord and hoop are among garret rubbish; the old maltese, the hearth-stone idol and the last of her pets, which she first enjoyed for his antics, but afterward for his purring breath, is banished from fellowship and given over to the mercy of old Towser, the household dog. Life, as it relates to things useful and things to come, engrosses her mind, school privileges are no longer used for amusement and time-killing, but for culture and preparation for the great need of future years. Home exerts an influence, and wears a charm unfelt before; its nursery and its fireside, its altar and its love disclose new and surprising lessons of experience and example.

Might we look within her soul, where before was only a dream-chamber, we would discern a secret shrine, and an unconscious worship, in part a memory and in part a hope, one reaching back into childhood, where, among the older of her mates, was one who, whether hoop-trundling, butterfly-chasing or hide-and-seeking in rivalry of speed and tact, was always sure to win, whose laugh had the merriest ring, whose eye the brightest flash, and whose lips the sweetest kiss—the other reaches into the future, after a pure and exalted manhood. In brief, the blithe and aimless girl has become the thoughtful, loving maiden. This wonderful transformation, in its aggregate expression, defines puberty. But why this sudden and marvelous change? What is the significance of puberty?

It is that the germ-cells which were early planted by Nature, within her ovarian tissue, and which in a constantly ascending series of development have been ripening and bursting and giving place successively to a new and more perfectly vitalized group, have now attained such completeness of endowment as to be capable of impregnation. It is that she has become a generative being—a germ-bearer of Humanity.

This ovum or cell-germ, whose perfection of development constitutes the fundamental idea of puberty, is, as it relates to her sex, only a vitalized structure in the sense that it has a vital connection with her body, as we use the term vitalized, as applied to any other living tissue, as the brain or lungs—that is, it is incapable, by any power which she alone can exert upon it, of putting on any form or producing any result higher or beyond its own simple structure. In other words, unaffected by any force or influence than what is derivable from her own being, this cell, this germ, as soon as matured, is separated from her tissues and blights and dies.

In speaking of the pubertic change, we alluded to a secret shrine and worship; soul answers to soul across the years and over land and sea.

But we will pass the rapture of betrothment, the solemnity of the plighted vow and the unapproachable sanctity of the wedded bed, and concern ourselves only with her condition after the copulative act.

If now, with microscopic aid, we look upon and within her ovaria, we behold this cell-germ encompassed with seminal spermatozoon, the object of their strange pilgrimage and search.

They touch and permeate the cell and feed upon it! This is all our lens can reach, this is all we know! But the miraculous result—generic life, being and immortality! This is IMPREGNATION.

Impregnation marks the only time and place, for all his life in which man's blood-force can touch, mingle with or influence that of his offspring. Yet it embraces only a moment of time, and only microscopic space.

All subsequent paternal influence, immeasurable as are its capabilities, is incomparable with this; moreover, it is all his own, God-given and God-protected. Woman, however, is not thus limited, for her life and blood-contact with her offspring continues on through both gestation and lactation.

The act of impregnation, though limited thus by time and space, carries with it results which concern no less than the perpetuity and well being of the race. For in this act is transmitted—

1st. Genus. "Each after his kind," is the most wonderful law displayed in the whole economy of nature. It touches every link in the change of being. "Man, beast, bird, fish, insect, what no eye can see and no glass reach."

It extends through the vegetable kingdom as well, and binds under its inviolate sway the mightiest and tiniest growth of mountain and valley, forest and field. The mountain pines are the same to-day, and chant their peans as grandly tuned, and in as sweet accord as when God first created them to chant his praise; and the lily is the same, and blooms with a whiteness as pure and a perfume as sweet as when he first betrothed it to the valley to teach the kinship of purity and humility.

Neither the silent agency of the elementary forces, though operating through all time, nor the grand convulsions which have rocked the world, have ever disturbed the primordial moulds in which all organized matter was originally cast.

The wonder of this law grows upon us as we contemplate its sway over man.

From century to century it gleams with the flash of the poniard, the torturing blaze of fagots, the lurid glare of sacrificial altars, and the fiery breath of war. Want and vice, crime and pestilence, diseases of loathesome and consuming taint, "maladies of racking torture and heart-sick agony" pour their corrupting currents all down the ages, yet mark the marvelous truth—genus has never been disturbed. Each successive generation have been made to receive and transmit the race-mould unbroken and inviolate.

2d. Equality of sex-ratio. No philosophic mind can contemplate the numerical ratio of the sexes, preserved as it has been, intact, through all the vicissitudes to which our race has been subject, without the convictions that the record—"male and female created he them," conveys an important physiological fact, namely: that a certain numerical sex-ratio was originally stamped upon the generic life-stream of the race. The popular notions that a particular decubitus in sexual embrace, or subsequently in gestation, or that the will of the party which predominates, or that climate or seasons, or the all-prevailing moon, influence or determine this must be regarded as purely speculative. What must have ever been and what must continue so vital to the well-being of the race, could not have been left to the caprice of circumstances, no, the law of the Universe ineffably and beneficently stamped sex-ratio upon the primordial race-mould and the race can therefore no more break away from this law than from the law of genus.

In the act of impregnation there are transmitted: 3d. Moulds of being, corresponding to and resembling those of the parents. This accounts in the main for all the striking differences of form, proportion, color as well as the subtler distinctions in the human organization which are denominated constitutions, temperaments, idiosyncrasies.

It is a high prerogative and a solemn truth that in the act of impregnation we impress our offspring with our own moulds of being; with our own physical, mental and moral natures. This truth should never be lost sight of. Let every woman know and believe that the strong frame and noble fashion, vigorous life-force and exalted spirit of the man she loves and marries shall determine largely the fashion and organization of her offspring, and that in their individualities she shall surely find resemblances which, more than anything else, will reward her sacrifices, and comfort and sustain her under all her cares and burdens. Let every man know and believe that the finely wrought physique, purity of blood-force, loveliness of spirit and charm of character of the woman he woos and weds shall stamp their outlines of grace, beauty and power somewhere upon, or within on the cherub forms of his children.

Conversely, let every woman know that whatever of unsightliness is individualized in the physique of the man she marries, whatever of deformity in his mental constitution, whatever of baseness in his moral nature, will unmistakably impress themselves on their offspring. And let every man know that whatever uncomeliness is individualized in the physical, mental and moral nature of the woman he marries, will be reflected in accurate portraiture in the body-mould and mental and moral endowments of their children.

The individualities of both parents descend to their children or their children's children, and from this law there is no escape; and these individualities impress the race and are never lost, except as the given branch or family may perish without reproduction. True, that of one parent may predominate over that of the other, which may not declare itself in the first succeeding generations; yet that it fails not to be transmitted, we have evidence in the remarkable fact that it may always be found in one or another of the following generations; the translation taking place in some instances over to the third, fourth, and even to the fifth and sixth. The great truth to be impressed upon the mind is this: in the new life springing from a vivified germ, there is no sifting out of the individualities of either parent. They touch the race alike; though they touch the same generation unequally. Sometimes there are found in offspring an unequal blending, and a beautiful and perfect harmonizing of the individualities of either parent. This is the realization of the original and perfect law of reproduction. Could the marital relation always secure a perfect adaptation of organization, the resultant progeny would always preserve this completeness and harmony and beauty of being. As it is, however, in the economy of nature, the immediate offspring are most commonly unequally impressed, though time never fails to equalize the impression as the family runs on into successive generations.

Individuality embraces the entire being, body and spirit, and everything engrafted on either, so as to become an integral part thereof. Accordingly there are transmitted in the act of impregnation.

4th. Diseases which as a class so engraft themselves on the life-forces, so grow into and become an integral part of the constitution as to stamp themselves irrevocably on the individuality of either parent. Diseases of this class may or may not have a local habitation or a name; may or may not be expressed through localized or general suffering. They may pervade the life-forces so subtly as to escape the consciousness of the victim or the eye of the medical adviser.

What a solemn, startling truth is this, and should be written in letters of inextinguishable light upon the altar of every home where consumption haunts with hectic beauty and cheating hope, or where scrofula stalks with hydro-cephalic head, distorted vertebra and leprous skin, or where misery-making idiocy has made wreck of all that is beautiful in human form. Would that it could be indelibly inscribed on the door panels of every house of shame, high as well as low where woman with power accorded to her by nature to elevate and bless, woos to corrupt and wins to destroy.

The great primary truth, that diseases are a part of our individuality become transmitted in impregnation, has a corollary truth worthy a place in this connection, and too important to pass unheeded. It is this, that such diseases when inherited or acquired are irrevocable, and beyond the reach of art or medicine. It must be admitted that this corollary neither flatters the profession, learned, studious, and aspiring ever, nor pays compliment to impudent, ignorant, vaunting charlatany.

As I have traced the history of a man once happy, in health and reputation, home and estate from the time he first tampered with the intoxicating glass on through his swift career, till his stalwart frame trembled with disease and his proud spirit shivered in despair, till he was "naught but a pauper whom nobody owned," and his only prayer, rum or death. And as I have watched his once honored and love-glad wife at last a drunkard's widow in a garret or cellar home, and his children fed on crumbs and couched on straw, I have thought how fleet and terrible are even earthly retributions. But what of the Nemesis which haunts his path who, a slave to passion, and fearless of results, or timid and cheated by these lying pledges of impurity, dallies with pleasure and bows his soul to sin and shame, and his blood to vice and taint—who, afterwards wins away from a home-circle where she was alike the joy and hope, a pure, trusting and forever loving girl, and in the holy embrace of wedded love, casts upon her waiting ova corrupt and poison-bearing spermatozoon! Mark his portion in a few faithful life pictures.

Picture first. His own health, after an indefinite time, betrays the mischievous work of ruin. Erythematous blotches dapple his blanched and cachectic skin; ulceration corrodes the fauces, caries gnaws with a merciless tooth and makes cavernous his bones, crippled, emaciated, haggard, he spends his days in anxiety and weariness, and his nights in mingled dreams and horror. His voice becomes husky and faint, and finally lost; he swallows first with difficulty, then with pain, and at last with torture; more and more putrescent, he lives in self-detestation, remorse and hopeless lamentation, and dies scourged as with tongues of fire, and with curses in his heart and upon his lips.

Picture second. He himself suffers with little else appreciable than a mottled, or dappled, or pimpled skin, and this at times made temporarily to clear off by a round of medicines. But in the meantime his wife's sweet face grows pale and stricken, her vigorous frame haggard and trembling, her strong and steady heart beats faint and shivering, and under the daily added anxiety, and exhaustion, and distress of wasting disease, unsuspecting and faithful to the last, she at last enters into the eternal tearless rest, where, thank God, no defilement of earth can follow.

Picture third. He remains the same as last portrayed, but his wife's contamination takes on a more aggressive career. After repeated impregnations, her general health, otherwise at first but little affected, her throat becomes like the vortex of hell, with the fire and stench of destructive ulceration, her nasal bones waste, and their proud arch falls in, and her teeth drop out, and her bleared and half-blinded eyes weep tears of pus, or her skull is seized upon by torturing caries, and is eaten out line by line, inch by inch, till in her agony, and humiliation, and rottenness, she exiles herself from the atmosphere and ministry of love and kindness, and dies like an outcast; or her skin is smitten by the leprous curse of his guilt, and she, pitied for a time, is at last loathed and abandoned to the tongues of dogs.

Picture fourth. Neither he nor she betrays any boldly marked insignia of their contamination, and yet as surely as she conceives she sooner or later aborts, and always with a dead or rotten embryo, or, more successful, gives birth to living children—but note their history: The first-born, through painful days, and nights, and months, and years, just grown to feel the touch of manly aspiration and of the world's great want, is overtaken by the insatiated and relentless waste of hectic frost and fire, and fades and dies like a frost-stricken leaf. Their second-born has long since been laid in the tomb of their first sorrow. Their third-born and last surviving child totters tremblingly to their knees and clings languidly for support, his feeble limbs never climbing the chair backs with gymnastic glee, his little feet never pattering the halls and corridors in sportive leap, or tramping the floor in martial pomp and miniature battle charge, his voice never singing with the glad, wild note of joy, which cheats old time and makes us young again; but the faint hope glimmering through his doubtful life, withers upon their breaking hearts, for he soon fades away and carries into the tomb a family name thus destined to perish from among men.

Away with the popular sentiment that it is a matter of indifference, beyond himself how a young man shapes his course. For be assured that health impaired and blood corrupted by his dissoluteness concern more than himself, though his were enough to shake him from his infatuate purpose; more than mother or father, whose hair whitens faster at the spectacle of his folly than by the lapse of years; more than brother or sister whose brows lighten with joy at the memory of what he was, but blanch with shame at the record of what he is; more than his heart-broken wife who has been cheated by his vows, and poisoned by his blood, and dishonored by his name; yea, more than all these they concern the ill-fated children through whom alone he is linked to the future of the race.

In conclusion, our subject plainly teaches that for any who are knowingly possessed of contaminated blood to enter into the parental relation is a crime. I say crime and no less so because human law and justice are too materialized to reach and suppress it.

The crime is two-fold.

1st. It is a crime against the offspring of such wedlock.

The wrong inflicted smites the defenseless. The poison scattered corrupts the innocent. The blight entailed tarnishes the purity, the beauty and glory of the otherwise undefiled.

2d. It is a crime against the race.

Look over the world and watch one generation from the womb to the tomb. Its infancy is weakness, its maturity is frailty, its old age is disease. It is born in suffering, it lives by struggle and is buried in sorrow and tears. Who can voluntarily add to its decay, augment its sufferings or embitter its sorrows and be criminally guiltless?

But what of frailty and disease, pain and sorrow, blight and premature death may be inflicted upon a single generation, by no means measures the crime against the race; for race embraces our humanity for all time, and what of evil it embodies overleaps the graves of the generations and perpetually renewed, curses forever more!

"There needeth not the hell that bigots frame
To punish those who err; earth in itself
Contains at once the evil and the cure.
And all sufficing nature can chastize
Those who transgress her laws she only knows How justly to proportion to the fault
The punishment it merits."

After the lecture the subject of it was discussed in an animated manner by Messrs. Wilcox, Dawson, Dr. Atkinson, Dr. Lambert, Dr. Merrill, S. P. Andrews, Mrs. Dougherty, Henry Evans, and the lecturer of the evening.

Many complimentary remarks were made relative to the character and excellence of the lecture, and but few criticisms were made against it. All seemed highly pleased with the instruction and interest imparted by it.

JULY 16TH.

THREE HUNDRED AND SECOND MEETING.

A paper was read by DR. R. A. GUNN, upon

Food and Medicine.

By way of introduction the lecturer said, that many popular fallacies were rooted in the public mind, and that they were supported by the unscientific utterances of those who hold themselves up for public teachers. He associated the terms food and medicine because of the intimate relation they bear to each other.

After giving the proportions of the chemical elements and proximate principles that exist in the human body, he showed how these were being constantly removed by destructive assimilation, and their places supplied from the blood, which in turn was supplied from the food taken into the body.

He divided human life into three periods: the period of growth, the period of interchange, and the period of decay; and then dwelt at considerable length on the proper food for each period.

He denounced the fallacies and errors that prevail in regard to infant feeding, and stated that infants often died of starvation even though the stomachs are kept loaded. This is due to the inferior quality of prepared foods. The practice of diluting cow's milk one-half and adding large quantities of sugar is productive of much harm. From a comparison of human and cow's milk, it will be seen that the addition of two per cent of water and one drachm of sugar of milk to the pint, will very closely approximate human milk. The milk should be given at the ordinary temperature of the living room of the child; for in this way the variable temperature that is sure to follow all attempts at heating it is avoided.

In the prime of life—the period of interchange—the diet should be a mixed one, of animal and vegetable food. Tripe, oysters and fish do not contain such a large percentage of phosphorus as has been asserted. The idea that so-called phosphatic foods are valuable to brain workers is greatly overdrawn.

During the period of decay—after the age of fifty—food should be prepared so that it can be easily digested. Meats and vegetables should be cut very fine before eaten. A little alcohol, daily, is of great advantage in arresting excessive waste of tissue. In this period of life it has a decided food action.

The lecturer then spoke of the influence diet has on disease, and claimed where food was given with special reference to its influence on any disease, it might properly be considered a medicine.

He also denounced the popular prejudice against the medicinal use of opium, alcohol and other drugs. He pointed out the advantages of opium in preventing the loss of vital force from severe pain, and of alcohol in shock and severe nervous prostration. Both may be abused the same as the use of food may be; but this is no reason why we should deny ourselves and our fellow beings the benefits to be derived from their proper use.

He pointed out a few of the fallacies that have prevailed in regard to medicine, and cautioned the public against them; and concluded with a tribute to the zeal and self-sacrifice of the medical profession.

After the lecture a spirited discussion took place, participated in by Dr. Vandeweyde, Dr. Lambert, Mr. Wilcox, Mr. Andrews, Mr. Ormsby, Dr. Atkinson, and closed by Dr. Gunn. Some personalities passed between some of the speakers.

A Plea for Secular Schools.

What is religion? Is it necessary?

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Numerous as are the devotees of religion there are but very few who ever earnestly reflect on the first of the two foregoing questions, and fewer yet are those who have anything like a correct understanding of it. The large majority of believers seem never to think of or to trouble themselves about finding out what religion is. For of what value is it even to those who imagine to know and to love it? Education and mental culture are of the highest improvement to men; but of what value is religion? Of none whatever, and obtained as all valueless things, too easily. Men get their education and culture only by enlightening their minds by dint of hard study, while they receive their religion without any effort, and as it were, passively, first from their parents as an inheritance, then further at Sunday-schools, at a period of their lives when their reasoning faculties are yet undeveloped and when their plastic minds would receive anything as truth that parents and teachers might represent to them as such. Their childish simplicity and natural reverence for these persons would never doubt the truth of their teachings, even if their (the children's) mind were less confidently trusting in it than it certainly is at that period, and when their imperfect judgment was not yet too unripe to form conclusions for themselves. Religion, then, or what is represented to them and taught as religion, is thus planted into their young and tender minds, where it finds nourishment in their best qualities, gets strength and is growing as they themselves are growing, and by the time they have reached the period of manhood and reason, their "religion"—with all the superstitions, errors and prejudices adhering to it—has gained such control over them that they cannot free themselves from its blasting influence any more even if their awakened reason should teach them better. They may now see its fallacies, regret its effect on them, and resolve to combat its influence, but—it is, for most of them, too late now. How ever keenly they may face the contrast between their "religion" and the truth, as found out by reason—it is but rarely that one made thus early the victim of religion and its effect, can ever free himself from its influence; for it is not enough that enlightened reason sees the real facts, and desires to gain its freedom. It wants also the strong will and the unflinching courage to reform in compliance with the former, and to accomplish the latter, unhappily just the two qualities which the blasting influence of religion has weakened the most. Thus it is that scarcely one out of twenty succeeds to free himself from the bondage to which religion has reduced his mind's energies, no matter whatever may be the strength of his reason or the light of his intelligence.

It is, then, but a small, a very small minority that dare to question the truth of the doctrines, the value of the rites and forms that have been taught as represented to them as religion, and who have a mind or the capacity either to examine them impartially, fearlessly or critically. And yet it is but this very small minority who, if they, after a judicious examination, do yet believe in any religion at all, are the only true believers in religion, because they have tried to prove it and believe with conviction. But even these honest believers can never agree with one another in defining religion, in telling in exactly what it is. And very naturally so, too, for "religion" is at best but an idea, an abstraction, which must necessarily be colored by the prism of the individual mind, and thus must appear differently to every one individual believer, hence even the best educated, most learned and greatest scholars cannot give us an all-satisfying and generally accepted definition of it, but are eternally disputing and quarreling with each other about one. The best definition of "religion" given yet, seems to me, is that of Mr. F. E. Abbot, of the Index, "An effort to perfect ourselves." This, however, is only the best because the most rational, the most truly human, but is also, for that very reason in fact, no definition of "religion," but merely of the rationale of men's being, i. e., of what he ought to aspire and live for. Good, then, and very acceptable, as this definition is in itself, and cannot really be accepted as a definition of "religion." For, according to the common acceptance of the word "religion"—as well as understood by those who actually believe in, or pretend to have religion, as by those who do not believe in or pretend to have any religion whatever—includes necessarily a belief in God and in some (fancied) relations between God and men. Definitions of religion, including these essential points, seem then, to me, more correct, however unsatisfactory they may be in other respects; such definitions, for instance, as Webster's "The recognition of God as an object of worship, love and obedience," or "Any system of faith and worship," and others.

But when we then further consider that we cannot know anything at all, either of God as of the relation between him and men, it naturally follows that religion itself can be nothing else than an illusion, a phantom of the imagination, and hence as unreal as a definition of it is impossible. All the "religion" that a man can have, then, or ought to have, is reduced to Mr. Abbott's definition, "an effort to perfect ourselves."

Having thus answered my first, my second question is thereby also answered of itself—answered, however, only theoretically, practically it comes ever up before us again and again. We are told daily—and not merely by priests, ministers and their dupes, but also by intelligent and even Liberal men—that religion is necessary, at least, for the uneducated masses. It was but a few days ago that I was told so in a talk with two quite intelligent and Liberal men, and it is, in fact, this talk that induced me to write this communication.

Now, Mr. Editor, is this so? Is religion necessary in spite of its airiness, its chimerical character? It certainly cannot be; and yet I believe we may answer this question both affirmatively and negatively, and both answers may yet be true and correct. Negatively I have already answered it in answering my first question, as I did above. For when religion is, as I believe it is, merely an abortion of the imagination, having no existence in reality, it can, of course, not be necessary. Nor are the doctrines, rites and forms generally taken for religion really religion; they are but mistaken for it, and being wrong—at least not all of them good, neither in themselves nor in their effects—they can, certainly, also not be necessary. Nevertheless, I would submit religion, in its common acceptance, with all its faults and even evils, was yet necessary for that low class of its votaries, at least, who have been made so depraved by its teachings and its effect on them, that they now know of other motive for good, nor of any other restraint from licentiousness. Religion, I further submit, was neither any better nor any worse for them originally than for others; but it is their misfortune to have got too much of it, so that they have become so ignorant, superstitious and depraved by it, that now but religion alone—or rather the awe and fear it has for them—can yet retain their depraved nature from being worse yet, and from becoming a menace and danger to society. And this very depravity of their nature having, by the very influence of religion, made them callous to the teachings of reason and common sense and to human sentiments, it would actually be dangerous for society to take now from them the only restraint that can yet keep them from destroying society. So, whatever else the nature of religion may be, it may be good, it may be necessary for them as they are.

But because it may only be so for them, and as they are, it must also be clear that it is the duty of the State and of society to prevent that any of its younger members may or ever can become as depraved as they, shall grow up under similar religious training and teaching, and to prevent that religion may ever become thus necessary for its younger and future citizens as for these elder and depraved ones, in order to save society from their depravity. The great, the all-important question is then, how is the State and society to prevent this without violating the sacredness of individual conscience and liberty?

There is but one answer to this question, Sir, but one way to accomplish this. Since ignorance, superstition and a false teaching are the cause of the degradation of the former class; education and good teaching must be the talisman that is to prevent the growing up generation from becoming as depraved, as dangerous as the former. Prevent, destroy then, the ignorance and superstition, and cultivate the intelligence, morality and humanity of the growing generation by judiciously instructing and educating them in free and secular public schools, and make it compulsory for every child between the ages of say from six to fifteen years, to frequent regularly these free and secular schools for at least half their regular school days.

Yours for humanity,
TITUSVILLE, Pa., May 26th, 1875.

Bible Obituaries—No. I: Jonah.

BY M. P. ROSECRANS.

Lost to the world about two thousand seven hundred and thirty-six years ago, Jonah, age unknown to us. Neither can we tell correctly the land that gave him birth; but we are sure it was neither Tarshish nor Nineveh. Yes, dear reader, he is gone, and the places that knew him once will know him no more forever. This makes us sad and we try to drop a tear; but our eyes shed no moisture for the reason, he was no relative of ours, was a crusty peevish old bachelor, as far as we know, and were we to weep it would be for sympathy with wife and children.

At the time he lived names were scarce and he had but one simple appellation—Jonah. Were he living at this time, in our day and age of the world, and poor, his name would be Jone for short; but if he were rich he would be called the Hon. Lord Augustus William Alexander Napoleon Charlemagne Fitz Herber Mortimer Jonah, A.B., A.M., D.D., LL.D., F.R.S. As a sailor his experience would have dubbed him with the title of Commodore, at least, and as a preacher, among the wealthy he would be called the Right Reverend A. W. N. Jonah, Doctor of Divinity, Rector of the great City of Nineveh, and among publicans and sinners it would be the Reverend Morgan Jonah, the sailor preacher.

Like many persons of the present day he had a call to preach, but preaching in his day did not pay; neither were there fine churches a la Henry Ward Beecher's at Brooklyn. Under this state of affairs Jonah paid no attention to the call; it had no attraction for him. But the call at last was too loud for poor Jonah; it rang in his ears by night and by day; it made him extremely uncomfortable. Had he been called to preach near home among friends where he was acquainted it would not have been so bad for him; but the call was for Nineveh, a strange city, a great city, and the words he was to tell them, was to carry to them, were not the gospel of glad tidings of the present day; he had no plan of salvation opened up in his discourses; he was to preach death and destruction to all, rich and poor, king and servant, horses and cattle, sheep and asses. Poor Jonah! How we feel for thee! How we sympathize with thee in thy great trouble! In thy affliction! You saw no fine Church awaiting you in the distance; no fat salary, no worshipping congregation. You had no Elizabeth in prospect; you saw no converts to minister to your temporal wants while you ministered to their spiritual. No, you were encouraged by nothing of this nature. You fled from home, you bade your father Amitai, farewell, you ran away; you embarked in a ship; you were caught in a storm; you fell among gamblers, they cast lots to see who was the unlucky man, and the lot fell on Jonah. You were cast into the sea like meat cast into a boiling pot; the sea became calm, the waves ceased to roll, and the ship reached Tarshish with all on board except Jonah; where is he? We are thankful that we are not left in doubt; that our story is not yet ended; that Jonah is not yet dead, and that his powers of endurance were remarkable—were equal to the emergency. A fish gulped him down, swallowed all there was of Jonah, and thus saved his life—saved him from drowning. In this kind of a boat Jonah commenced navigation on his own hook, and yet he did not enjoy life here. He thought he was in the belly of hell; he thought this worse than preaching without church or salary; he prayed inside the fish that had preyed on him; he stuck it out for three days in his solitary prison; he was nearly starved; food was scarce and the accommodations were not good for cooking. Jonah was hungry; he could not sleep in this craft; he was in great horror of being digested. He kept up a continual commotion; the fish though it had dyspepsia; it became sick, its stomach began to heave and at last it heaved up Jonah. They bade each other a sad farewell. Jonah was not well prepared for the fish, but the fish was prepared for Jonah. There was discord, there was inharmonious, and their parting was without regret. Jonah made up his mind to preach, he knew he could not worst it, he had already been in hell and he knew of no worse place. He went to Nineveh that great city of three day's journey; that city of one hundred and twenty thousand people. He was excited, he cried out with a loud voice; "Yet forty days and Nineveh shall be destroyed." He felt glad of the fact, he felt mean; he felt that he had suffered greatly on account of that great city; that on account of the people of that city he had fled from home; had left his friends; had caused the waves to roll; the ship to rock; the sailors to gamble, and himself to be cast into the briny deep; to be swallowed by a fish as bait without a hook; to live three days and nights without much air, with no food or drink save what he found in the bowels of the fish, and this in a bad state of preparation. Oh, Jonah! Now we begin to feel for thee in thy great distress; in thy sad affliction! Had you remained quiet you would have been done for; you would have been used up; you would have taken the regular course of nature; your turbulent disposition saved you; you kept a continual commotion; you determined to escape; you began to pray; the digestive organs of the fish refused to act; for three days and nights the end was uncertain; but pray in your case was better than prey; your prayers had more force and greater effect than Tyndall's physic; in your case the prayer guage prevailed, and you were free.

But we suppose Jonah is dead at last; we suppose he died near the wilted gourd; he had stood all these trials, had been in the belly of hell, had told a lie, he was angry, he even said it was better for him to die than live and be tormented so. We never heard of him afterwards—we suppose he committed suicide. Being a false prophet he was not highly honored; he had no monument erected, no marble statue; yet, did we know where his bones lie we should be tempted to organize a mite society, and raise money to purchase a statue to mark the spot where lie the ashes of Jonah, the sailor-preacher. As it is, we are powerless; we can do nothing worthy of him. And still, every time we see a fish we think of him, and when we see a large fish we almost fancy he is present. Oh, how we wish we knew his fate! the full account of his death; how, after escaping the perils of the sea, he died as a land critter.

Farewell, Jonah! We have written thy obituary, all we know of thee. May thy life, as recorded, be a warning to all young men who think they are called to preach! May they never be swallowed by a big fish, and if this result be attained, we will be glad to have written thy obituary.

Friendly Correspondence.

R. SORENSON, Monroe, Utah, writes: If anything can spread light in the dark corners of this world, I think your paper can do it. If you can only secure a candid hearing, I assure you would carry conviction and dispel the dark superstition that has so long ruled the world.

H. W. DRIVER, Lonoke, Ark., writes: Speed the good work. Our cause here in our little town is gaining new converts from orthodoxy every day. Your paper and other Liberal publications are acting as "eye openers" for the people. I would not be willing to do without your paper.

H. G. GRATTAN, Waukon, Iowa, writes: I believe that you are doing a good work, and trust you will meet with ample success. The old Investigator has long been my spiritual adviser, and I cannot afford to let any other publication supersede it; but I will also make room for yours along with it.

HALSEY COLLINS, Rockford, Iowa, writes: Please continue sending me THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am an old man nearly seventy years of age, and I want something to give me courage. Your paper is "victuals and drink" and almost lodging for me. Money is hard to get, but I must spare a little of the small amount of it I have for your paper.

SAMUEL STRAUSS, Chicago, writes: I wish to say that your TRUTH SEEKER reaches the minds of the laboring classes, who understand the same much better than the well paid for, and still mind confounding teachings of their religious guides. Away with these teachers. Give us light and we can see for ourselves. Light, light forever. Education, humanity, universal brotherhood. Down with the barriers, up with mental freedom!

L. C. ROOT, East Minneapolis, Minn., writes: I send you herewith one year's subscription. Count me a life subscriber. Draw on me when anything is due from me to you. I do not wish to be lacking in my support of such a noble paper. I hope the time will come when you can see your way clear to make it a weekly; for I get lonesome waiting for it between times and watch every mail closely when it is due. It is a feast to my mental soul to drink in its precious truths. Go on, dear brother; may your days be long, for such as you are much needed in this priest-ridden land.

J. W. MACKIE, San Francisco, Cal., writes: Enclosed I hand you one dollar for which send me its value in assorted tracts of your publishing. Let me improve the present occasion to say that I like THE TRUTH SEEKER all through and through. The reports of the N. Y. Liberal Club are worth far more than the price of the paper. I cannot see how you can afford to give so much reading matter and of such good quality for the little money. I really hope you will be able to stand the press. You see Liberalism was not liberal enough to support Common Sense on the Pacific Coast, for which I am very sorry. Yours for truth and liberality.

DR. J. S. LYON, Springfield, Mo., writes: Allow me to congratulate you in behalf of the growing interest your paper is eliciting from thinking minds from every quarter. Its motto truly is progression—onward—upward. There seems to be a gradual improvement in each succeeding number, which makes its regular appearance freighted with choice articles from the moral and scientific world, supplying rich, wholesome, nutritious food to the myriads of hungry, starving intellects unconsciously seeking it. It handles the wily priesthood without gloves, and spares no pains in reporting and exposing the errors of old theology, thus adapting itself so perfectly to the great want of the present age. I regard it a treasure I would most unwillingly part with. May it ever live to expel error and encourage the honest seeker of truth.

THOMAS FEE, Lindsay, Ont., writes: Our good cause is gaining ground here. I am inducing a good many to commence reading Liberal tracts, books and papers. I keep a small circulating library of Liberal reading matter for which our Methodist minister gave me an overhauling in one of his sermons for distributing. (I was once one of the props of that church, but I could no longer be a hypocrite.) He made one admission in his discourse that speaks volumes for the cause of Liberalism; that was that it took educated men and men of talents to be Infidels. Probably he meant by that I was not qualified to be an Infidel. I never in my life felt more than now that we need papers like THE TRUTH SEEKER, with Liberal works of various kinds together with the exertions of Liberal-minded and talented men to obviate the prevailing ignorance, superstition and popular delusions in the minds of the people. Send me Draper's Conflict, the Bhagvad-Gita, and one dollar's worth of your tracts.

Our friend, uncle THOMAS H. DODGE, Oxford, O., writes:

Once more in hand I take my pen,
To write to you, my dearest friend,
To let you know that I am well,
And on Long street I still do dwell.
I'm working hard both day and night
For THE TRUTH SEEKER, ain't I right?
Methinks that I do hear you say,
Yes, uncle Tom, that's the right way.
Press on, press on, and let them know
Their God is all an empty show.

He also enclosed the following lines on THE OLD ROCKING-CHAIR:

The old arm-chair where mother sat
And rocked me while I sucked the teat,
'Tis fresh within my memory yet;
That rocking-chair I'll ne'er forget,
That old arm-chair with rockers on She's rocked me to and fro upon;
And sung to me the sweet lullaby,
And rocked me that I would not cry;
That old arm-chair, its praise I'll sing,
So oft to me did pleasure bring.
When weary, cold, hungry and wet,
In the old arm-chair I oft have sat
And rocked my weary limbs when sore;
The old arm-chair'll ne'er rock me more;
The old arm-chair my mother had—
She's rocked me in it—so has dad—
That rocking-chair I'll see no more
That's rocked me on the parlor floor,
Its back and arms and legs you see,
Forever now, have gone from me;
No more I'll rest my weary head
On the arm-chair, for it has fled,
Farewell, old chair, 'tis fate's decree
That I shall rock no more with thee.

OTTO SMITH, Davenport, Iowa, writes: You have, my dear sir, within a very brief space of time brought your journal to a level with the very best anti-Christian advocates of the age. You have evidently endorsed the old Roman maxim, fortuna audacem juvat, and hence you will feel well. There is no use in handling the so called Christian Church with kid gloves. It requires a mailed hand for the purpose of tearing down that structure which always has been and now is the impediment of the main avenue mankind must pass through on their march to true civilization. Speaking of the Church at large, it seems to me, however, it is the Catholic Church we have to dread much more than that of any other denomination, because it represents one solid phalanx with spears extended like that of the Spartans and Macedonians; whilst the so called Lutheran Church is divided into hundreds of different classes, hostile and vindictive to each other. The Papists are now more than ever heretofore striving to get the control of our public schools, or partly so by claiming their share of the funds destined to sustain said schools, and they have in divers instances and sections of our broad domain accomplished their foul schemes. We should all unite, and the press especially, in rebutting and annihilating further aggressions from and compromises with that quarter. The people should be warned in thunder-tones of the danger threatening them and their posterity by the downfall of our glorious system of education. "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty," and without education there is no liberty. Let me suggest, therefore, that while you hammer away lustily at the tottering church in general, you will pay attention to the Catholic Church in special and without intermission. As for the Lutheran, it will probably not dare to try again to establish the Lord in the constitution; and if it does, the people will protest as vehemently as heretofore. When shall we have a law making the property of all the churches liable to taxation? That question should always be on the tapis.

DANIEL TUTTLE, Poplar, O., writes: I get your paper regularly and cannot help thinking that it is one of the best armed sentinels to-day upon the battlements of human freedom, one that is not asleep at his post. Hailing as it does from an atmosphere of putrid moral corruption, when within the sound of your press a six-months' high court of blue cockalorum has been in session with closed doors against virtue and justice, in the pay of Plymouth Church to sanctify debauchery and make adultery and perjury respectable, and incorporate them into the holy sacraments of the Church of God. I wonder sometimes that you with all the other papers of New York are not bought and sold for the sake of Jesus. When I take a survey of the times as they now are all over the land, I am amazed and astonished. I have become a royal arch granger. I am down on the "middle men" and middle gods. I totally object and protest against all the almighty gods in the Universe, except the one almighty principle of right. To this power I give my admiration, but not my homage or adoration. I care not by what name it may be called; but this is the only power I love, respect and admire. And I don't want even this god to have a large squad of angels about him; either seraphims, cherubims or any other evangelical whims. With wings on their shoulders and the ends with blood tipped, and in each hand a Sharp's rifle or with revolvers equipped.

I protest also against that "middle man" Jesus Christ. I want none of his blood, carcass, goods, wares, or notions, and I will not have them at any price; for they have been so long peddled around the world at wholesale, retail, and long-tail by the Rev. blood sucking cannibals until all and every part of "old Zion" is nothing to-day but a putrid moral tophet. The most abominable and cursed gang of hell-whelps and loafing middlemen; the most impudent and debauched horde of bloodthirsty robbers among the people, against whom I protest in the name of humanity, is the 50,000 "white choker" gentlemen supporters of a vindictive god! These worse than frogs, lice, famine, pestilence, earthquakes, tornadoes and fires, are now eating the best and fattest of the land, and by their influence are debauching the fairest portion of our country, while they chant their hallelujahs at the desolation they make. Go ahead, though the infernal Comstocks of your Zion howl; though the Reverend Elders gnash their teeth, and Beecher and his sanctified sympathizers should oppose you. "Truth though crushed to earth will rise again."

A NEW BOOK. THE Doctrine of Descent AND DARWINISM.

By PROF. OSCAR SCHMIDT, of the University of Strasburgh.

The Investigator is devoted to the Liberal cause in religion; or, in other words, to Universal Mental Liberty. Independent in all its discussions, discarding superstitious theories of what never can be known it devotes its columns to things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who have entered its unknown shores. Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interest of this world, it confines itself to things of this life entirely. It will soon commence its FORTY-FIFTH year and asks for support from those who are fond of sound reasoning, good reading, reliable news, anecdotes, science, art, and a useful Family Journal. Reader, please send your subscriptions for six months or one year; and if you are not satisfied with the way the Investigator is conducted, we won't ask you to continue with us any longer. THE BHAGAVAD-GITA; Or, a Discourse on Divine Matters, between Krishna and Arjuna. A SANSKRIT PHILOSOPHICAL POEM, TRANSLATED, WITH COPIOUS NOTES, AN INTRODUCTION ON SANSKRIT PHILOSOPHY, AND OTHER MATTERS.

BY J. COCKBURN THOMSON,

MEMBER OF THE ASIATIC SOCIETY OF FRANCE, AND OF THE ANTIQUARIAN SOCIETY OF NORMANDY.

This work contains curious details of the Manners, Customs, Mythology, Worship, etc., of the Hindus. The principal design of these dialogues seems to have been to unite all the prevailing modes of worship of those days: the Brahmins esteem it to contain all the grand mysteries of their religion, and have exercised particular care to conceal it from the knowledge of those of a different persuasion.

The spirit of the age prompts thoughtful people to inquire into the traditions of the past. In doing so, it is found that Mythology has played her part well. The traditions of the fathers have been systematized by thoughtful men, from time to time, in different ages of the world. Later generations have believed such traditions, so systematized, to be nothing less than divine commands. Imaginary gods have been constructed, to whom the world has paid homage and divine honors.

If we receive as truth all that is believed by credulous devotees, the world has had numerous incarnate deities.

Those who have been educated to belief in the Christian religion, and to regard the gentle Nazarene as the only Son of God, take a very limited view of the various religious systems of the present and of the past ages.

Among the incarnate deities that different systems of religion have recognized as having existed, through omnipotent love for fallen humanity, by the overshadowing of females of vestal purity, Krishna was a character as important in the Brahminical system of religion, as Christ is in the plan of salvation instituted by the Jews' Great Jehovah, believed in by Christians.

His coming was foretold, even as was Christ's.

At the age of sixteen Krishna began to preach, and was, like Christ, the founder of a new religion.

Prior to the great Chicago fire, the Religio-Philosophical Publishing House published the Bhagavad-Gita, from a translation of the Sanskrit by that celebrated scholar, Charles Wilkins. Nearly two editions of that work were sold when the fire-flend came and destroyed the stereotype plates. The demand for the work being so great, we were induced to send to England for a copy of a more recent translation, by J. Cockburn Thomson, member of the Asiatic Society of France, and the Antiquarian Society of Normandy.

The translator accompanied the work with copious notes, which are doubtless of more or less value, as explanatory of the text, but the reader will take them for just what they are worth—nothing more is expected.

The text, as correctly translated, contains gems of thought, transmitted from antiquity, which are of real intrinsic value to the thoughtful people of the age, and to them he work is most respectfully recommended by the American publisher.

PRESS COMMENTS ON THE BHAGAVAD-GITA:

"More than ordinary care and trouble have been spent upon this work. It is in every way creditable to the scholarship and enterprise of the west."—Inter-Ocean.

"This curious volume purports to give a full and accurate compilation of the tenets taught by Krishna. The text contains many brilliant thoughts, well worth the attention of the thoughtful student of history, literature or science."—Our Fireside Friend.

"This translation of a Hindoo poem, dedicated by Mr. Thomson to his sometime instructor, Professor Wilson of Oxford, is one of a class of works demanding all the consideration and assistance that scholars everywhere can afford. It belongs to a class of books believed by great numbers of our fellow-men to have been supernaturally inspired, and trusted by them for their guidance in the ways of this life, and for light to pierce the dividing darkness between death and a future existence. No such book can, in the nature of things, have been thus esteemed by rational beings without having in itself much that is intrinsically valuable for comfort and instruction in righteousness, or at least, considered at its lowest, much that is curious and suggestive, as affording insight into the desires and needs of the souls that found therein their bread and water of life."—Overland Monthly.

"This is an unusually interesting publication. Mr. Thomson has rendered good service to the more thoughtful class of readers. There is a peculiar charm about ancient literature of the profounder sort. The old Hindoos were an intellectual people. The poem before us is probably older than the time formerly fixed in Christian chronology for the creation of the world. It breathes a lofty spirit of unselfish devotion to good objects. We cannot refrain from complimenting the Religio-Philosophical Publishing House, upon giving to the public so excellent a book. . . . Grandly useful, especially as it is thoroughly indexed."—Chicago Evening Journal.

"A rare work from the ancient Sanskrit, in which will be found many of the religious ideas and notions which the Christian Church adopted long after. . . . It contains some 275 pages, printed on beautiful paper, and richly bound. . . . It is profusely supplied with notes, definitions, and explanations."—Truth Seeker.

"This is a rare book, which sheds more light upon the subjects of which it treats than any we have ever read. We heartily recommend it to those who wish to look into antiquity in regard to the religious views of a most remarkable people."—Samuel Watson, D.D., Editor Spiritual Magazine.

The book is a 12mo. of 278 pages, and the mechanical part is finished in a superior manner, being printed on heavy tinted paper, and bound in extra heavy cloth with richly illuminated back, borders and side title.

Studying the Bible.

BY ELMINA D. SLENKER.

This capital little volume is made up of sharp criticisms upon hundreds of the more prominent passages of scripture. One cannot read it without being firmly impressed with the great fallibility of the "good old book." Sent postpaid at 75 cents. For sale at this office.

THE WORD,

A Monthly Journal of Reform.

E. H. HEYWOOD, Editor.

Regarding the subjection of Labor, of Woman, and the prevalence of War as unnatural evils, induced by false claims to obedience and service; favors the Abolition of the State, of property in land and its kindred resources, of speculative income and all other means whereby intrusion acquires wealth and power at the expense of useful people. Since labor is the source of wealth, and creates all values equitable vendible, the Word (not by restrictive methods, but through liberation and reciprocity) seeks the extinction of interest, rent, dividends and profit, except as they represent the work done: the abolition of railway, telegraphic, banking, trades union and other corporations charging more than actual cost for values furnished, and the repudiation of all so-called debts, the principal whereof has been paid in the form of interest. Terms 75c. annually. Address The Word, Princeton, Mass.

MONEY:

Its Relation to Property and Usury.

The disastrous effects of Financial Panics, and the imperative needs of Productive Enterprise, should induce all classes of people to carefully study the money question, with which underlie it. Both "contractionists" and "expansionists" are mistaken in their methods to secure honest money; for Justice demands the extinction of Monopoly and the entire abolition of Usury. In order to help business to what it should unconditionally claim, Free Currency; and that the ominous feud between Labor and Capital may be settled on the sure basis of Equity, we have published the following works:

Yours or Mine:

An essay to show the true basis of Property, and the causes of its inequitable distribution. Twenty-fifth thousand. By E. H. Heywood. Price, postpaid, 15 cts.

Mutual Banking:

Showing the Radical Deficiency of existing circulating mediums, and how interest on money can be abolished by free competition. Sixth thousand. By Wm. B. Greene. Price, postpaid, 25 cts.

Hard Cash:

An essay to show that Financial Monopolies hinder Enterprise, and defraud both Labor and Capital; that Panics and Business revulsions will be effectually prevented only through Free Money. By E. H. Heywood. Tenth thousand. Price, postpaid, 15 cts.

Odds and Ends.

AN ORATOR who had raised his audience to a great height by his lofty roarings, exclaimed: "I will now close in the beautiful language of the poet—I forget his name—and, I forget what he said, too."

"MY DEAR," said a husband to his better half, after a quarrel, "you will never be permitted to go to heaven."

"Why not?"

"Because you will be wanted as a torment down below."

This odd advertisement is from an English newspaper:

"My husband is out on a strike. He prefers that to work. He ain't of any use to me. I must work to keep the children and myself. His ten shillings goes in beer. I'll swap him while he's on a strike for a sewing-machine."

A TALL Western girl named Short, long loved a big Mr. Little; while Little, little thinking of Short, loved a little lass named Long. To make a long story short, Little proposed to Long, and Short longed to be even with Little's shortcomings. So Short meeting Long, threatened to marry Little before long, which caused Little in a short time to marry Long. Query, did tall Short love big Little less because Little loved Long?

BAPTIZED BY MISTAKE.—Some of our worthy colored brethren of the Baptist persuasion had a baptism down at the creek last Sunday, and the ceremony attracted a very large crowd of people. Mrs. Pitman's colored servant girl was very anxious to be present, and, as it was not her Sunday out, she slipped away from the house while the dinner was cooking, and went around in her working clothes. Her interest was so intense that she stood close to the minister, who was in the water, while the ceremony proceeded. After six or seven had been dipped, the clergyman, filled with enthusiasm, seized her and pulled her into the water. She resisted, but the minister imagined that she was merely afraid of the coldness of the water, so before she could explain the situation he soured her. She came up spluttering and exclaimed:

"What you doin'? Lemme go, I tell you!"

But he exerted his strength, and sent her "ker-chuck" below the surface again. She emerged, clawing the air wildly and shouting:

"G'way from here! Don't you chuck me under agin, you nigger!"

But the clergyman was inexorable, and he plunged her under a third time, and held her there for a minute, so as to let it soak in and do her good. Then she came up and struck for the shore, and standing there, looking like a dragged mermaid cut in ebony, she shook her fist at the astonished pastor, and shrieked:

"Oh, I'll fix you! I'll bust the head offen you, you or'nary trash! sounsin' me in dat dare creek and nearly drowned me, when you knowed all de time dat I'se a Methodist, and bin chrissened by dem dat's yer betters, and knows more about religion den all de Baptisses dat ever shouted, you mis'able black scum! and me got the rheumatiz enough to set me crazy! Oh, I'll see what de law kin do for you! I'll have you 'rested dis very day, or my name's not Johanna Johnson, you wooly-headed her-rin'! You hear me?"

Then Johanna went home to redress, and the ceremony proceeded. Miss Johnson is now persuaded that the Baptists are not any better than pagans.—N. Y. Weekly.

A BORNED DOCTOR.—Upon the examination yesterday morning before the Recorder, of M. Taylor, accused of administering poison to Mary Ann Tolden in a glass of soda water, Dr. Thomas Taylor, a colored "gemman," was called to the stand as a witness for the State. The doctor is a small-sized individual, is slipshod, walks with a cane, has a small head, scant of wool, solfenino eyes, mouth cut biased, and the look of one who has an eye to the main chance.

The doctor hobbled up to the stand and proceeded to answer the questions put to him by the Court, thusly:

By the Court—What is your name?

Dr. Taylor—Dr. Thomas Taylor.

Court—What is your trade? What do you do for a living?

Dr. Taylor—I'se a doctor—er fission (physician).

Court—Under what school of medicine do you study?

Dr. Taylor—Hey! Didn't study 'tall. Cum into de wurla' doctor. Was borned a doctor. You see, boss. I cures people wid dis yere han', dis yere right han'. I jes puts it on 'em, and does a little summen to 'em, and dey gits well; I does. I was worth more ter my old masser than all de oder niggers he had, I'se a doctor, I is. (Here the witness surveyed the audience with a great deal of gravity and importance, hitched up his pants, and turned again to the Court.)

Court—Do you know Mary Ann Tolden? If you do, state what was her condition when you visited her Sunday or Monday last.

Dr. T.—I knows her. Well, boss, you know, last Sunday or Monday. I disremember which, I was called in 'fessionally to see de young lady. I found her in 'vulsions and 'plaining of thing wurrien 'bout her heart. Says I, "Mary Ann, what's de matter?" Says she, "Doctor, I feel things wurkin' round my heart." I put dis yere right han' on her and she got still. I saw her sorter swelled out and felt things a wurkin' round in dere, and I knowed she mus' have sum varmint in dere. So I give a table-spoonful of fresh milk, and den I took a speckled chicken—a real, natural chicken—and cut it open and put it on her right side, jes' over whar the heart beats. I kep' it dere for some time, may be half hour. De treatment fatched 'em out; cured her up.

Court—Have you a license to practice medicine?

Dr. Taylor—Yes, sir! (Here witness produced a city license issued Jan. 1875, signed by Mayor Hurley, authorizing him to carry on the occupation of a physician from Jan. 1, 1875, to July 1, 1875.)

Court—Can you read?

Dr. Taylor—No, sir; I don't need ter. I'se de sebeneth son of de sebeneth son. My nollige was born wid me.

Court—Have you a license from the County Board of Physicians?

Dr. T.—No, sir; what for I want to go to dem for? I'se a doctor, I is. I cures people with my han'—my right han'. I don't give no doctors' stuff. (Here witness looked disgusted, as though to insinuate that to go before the common board were a great insult.)

Court—Do you get pay for your visits and doctoring?

Dr. Taylor—Pay? Pay? In course I does. I'se no fool, I ain't. I'm a doctor, I is. Course I gets pay. I charges 'em $25 for every case, and I make 'em pay me, I does. I'se a doctor, I is.—Galveston News.

THE

New Gospel of Health:

AN EFFORT TO TEACH PEOPLE

The Principles of Vital Magnetism;

OR,

How to replenish the Springs of Life without Drugs or Stimulants.

BY ANDREW STONE, M.D.,

Physician to the Troy Lung and Hygienic Institute; Inventor of the "Pulmonometer, or Lung Tester;" Author of a "Treatise on the Curability of Pulmonary Consumption by Inhalation of Cold Medicated Vapors, Natural Hygiene," etc.

Its aim is to set before the general public the principles of vital magnetism, whereby the springs of life may be replenished without the use of drugs or stimulants. The subject matter is divided into thirty-eight sections, and purports to come from physicians who, ranking among the highest when in earth-life, have now made the attempt from the spirit sphere to communicate through an earthly medium knowledge which shall be even more powerful for good among the masses than their former labors in mortal. The ground gone over by these various contributors is wide and varied, and the hygienic hints given for self-cure are worth many times the cost of the volume.

The book is illustrated with over 120 engravings, among them being a steel plate likeness of Dr. Stone.
619 pages, cloth, $2.50, postage 25 cents; paper covers, $1.25, postage 10 cents.

THE SUN, in a somewhat severe article, winds up with; "Mr. Beecher had better leave off writing the life of Christ, and write the life of the Devil. That would be much more in his line."

EGYPT has two enlightened rulers who desire to put that country on the civilized track; they are the Kedhive himself and his Minister of Foreign Affairs. They hold that, while the doctrine "Egypt for the Egyptians" is a sound one, still, to run the machine on that system, a little more foreign talent and skill are needed. The old fogies growl at this.

"AMEN! amen!" shouted a Cedar Rapids parson, at the elegant remarks of a stranger at the camp-meeting. Suddenly the parson turned his eyes on the man, and, jumping up, screamed, "Catch him, brother, catch him! He's the three-card monte man that got my last month's salary." This is a fact, and the monte man is now in jail at Cedar Rapids.

SPENCE BOONE, a feeble-minded Kentucky nigger, was coming up out of the water of the Meherrin, wherein he had just been baptized. As he emerged he clapped his hands and shouted: "I've seen the Lord Jesus!" "Hush, you d-d fool!" exclaimed a brother convert who had been immersed in the same squad with Spence, "'twas nothing but a turkle! I seed it!"

BLOODY RIOT IN SAN SALVADOR.—At San Miguel, Salvador, a bloody riot, growing out of religious fanaticism, is reported. Generals Espinosa and Castro were killed and the former cut to pieces. Numerous lives were lost. The damage to property is estimated at $1,000,000. "Pass-ports to heaven," signed by the Catholic bishops, were found on the dead rioters.

We seem to be threatened with another Beecher-Scandal trial. Gen. Morris has served a notice on Mr. Beecher's attorneys for a new trial, to come off in a few weeks, which it is intended to make more short and decisive than the former trial; when Mr. Beecher will be the party tried, in place of Mr. Tilton. Please wait, gentlemen, till the hot weather is over.

"I TRUST," said the Archbishop of Canterbury to the Sultan of Zanzibar, "that your Highness will not object to British missionaries having access to your dominions." "Certainly not," the Sultan replied. "I think that no obstacle should be placed in the way of so great an event as the English being brought to a knowledge of the true faith. Let them come, and my learned men shall instruct them."

THE PEACH CROP of Maryland and Delaware is enormous this season, amounting, it is believed, to ten millions of baskets. Extra efforts have been made to find a market for them. Special fruit trains have been arranged to carry hundreds of thousands of baskets of this luscious fruit as far west as Cincinnati, Indianapolis, Chicago and St. Louis. Large quantities will be shipped in refrigerators to Europe. Immense quantities will be brought to this city. Everybody ought to have plenty of peaches this year.

DR. ALLEN, of Philadelphia, was preaching one day in Tennessee to the Freedmen, when an old colored brother came to him after the sermon, and said: "I like to hear you preach, for I understand your preaching." "I am very glad of it," replied the Doctor. "But I understand every word you say." "I hope so; I try to make myself understood." Again the old African came to the charge. "Yes," he said, "I understand you jes as well as if you was a nigger." Dr. Allen acknowledged the compliment.

A LITTLE GIRL, named Sarah Chandler, in Lincolnshire, England, was recently sentenced to fourteen days' imprisonment, and four years in a reformatory, for plucking a single flower from a geranium in the public grounds of an almshouse. In view of the many criminals who escape for committing most heinous offences, this instance was very severe and unequal. The official who passed the sentence is a clergyman; the Home Secretary, however, had the kindness of heart to revoke it.

THE very unusual rains which have prevailed in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and other western States for the last three weeks, have done incalculable damage. Streams have overflowed their banks, thousands of shocks of wheat have floated down with the surging tide, and that which has been left standing in the field is nearly ruined by the continued rain. It is indeed a saddening sight, after the husbandman, by toil and care, has secured a crop to see it destroyed or floated off by the ruthless flood. Bridges, fences and buildings have been carried away, and the danger is imminent that the Mississippi will overflow her bank, when immense damage will befall the cotton plantations. We fear the clerk of the weather has been negligent of his duty.

The New Era, the well-known Jewish monthly magazine, has a remarkable article by Mr. D. E. De Lara, against Christianity. He attacks Unitarianism and Trinitarianism alike, but directs his loudest thunderbolts against the Church of Rome. He contends that Jesus Christ was simply a Free Mason in the full sense of the term. In the course of his disquisition he refers to Dr. Lardner, Jt. Jerome, Bishop Marsh, Michaelis, and Origen. "The Jews," he says, "as a body are and ever have been attached to their religion; not because they believed it to be of divine origin, but because it is the only rational system of religion." His essay is to be continued in future numbers of the New Era, and it cannot fail to receive wide attention.

FALLEN FROM GRACE.—John McDuffy, the class-leader of the Methodist church of Patch Grove, Wis., and also leader of the Sabbath-school, has lapsed from virtue. It appears that the brother got on very intimate terms with his wife's sister, Mrs. Cornell. Mr. Cornell thinking them too much so, thought to watch the deacon. He made pretence that he would be from home all night, so the deacon thought he would take up lodgings in his place in his absence. After the lights were extinguished, Mr. Cornell entered and went to his wife's bed-room and there in bed with his wife lay the deacon as snug as could be. The whole church refused to believe the story, but upon Mr. McDuffy giving Mr. Cornell his note for $500 for damages done him and his wife, the church had to give it up. Some of these deacons, with a little practice, would doubtless make good pastors.

MORE FRAUD FOR RELIGION'S SAKE.—Some time ago a clergyman of the Episcopal Church, residing near Covington, but not in charge of a parish, was accused of being drunk while delivering a sermon in St. John's Church of this city. The matter was speedily hushed up and whitewashed, a verdict of acquittal being rendered on the ground of temporary mental disorder instead of drunkenness. It was well known at the time by those most interested that the explanation was false. It has, however, come to a sudden end—the convivial clergyman having been roaming around the past week in a state of inebriation that no whitewashing can conceal.

It is full time that religious denominations should understand that ministers, like other men, are prone to sin as the sparks to fly upward; and that when they fall, the most sacred interests of the cause demand that they shall be quietly but inexorably requested to withdraw from their places of trust—in other words, to "step down and out." A course that attempts to cover up such sin by what the world well knows to be nothing but deliberate deceit, is an open and heavy blow at the cause of Christ and his religion.—Cincinnati Times.

AMONG the recent heavy failures in this city may be mentioned that of J. B. Ford & Co., who were publishers for Henry Ward Beecher. It is to be feared that in addition to the heavy charges which already rest upon him he will also have to bear the responsibility of this failure. It seems that six years ago he entered into a written contract with the firm to write the "Life of Jesus the Christ," and to have it completed within eighteen months, and for the performance of the service he took, in advance, the snug sum of $10,000 cash. In view of the great sale which the life of such a great character, written by such a great individual, would meet with, great expenses were incurred. The firm claim to have expended over $90,000 upon the work, but the reverend gentleman—who had secured his pay and spent it—has been too busy, or too fond of pleasure to complete the work. The first volume has been printed a long time, but the second is not yet written. As the work was sold largely by subscription, thousands refuse to pay for the first volume until the work is completed, consequently the firm has large numbers remaining on hand, and being unable to induce Mr. Beecher to carry out his contract, laying out of large sums of money they otherwise would be in possession of, have been compelled to suspend. The verdict of the great American jury—the people—is plainly indicated by the almost total cessation in the sale of Mr. Beecher's works, thus confirming Sam Wilkinson's prediction that "the publicity of the scandal would knock the 'Life of Christ' higher than a kite." It would seem a pity that Christ should also be a sufferer by Beecher; but having had so many biographers, perhaps he can dispense with Henry Ward.

In a recent Lecture delivered by a reformed Catholic priest, Father Gerdemann, to a large audience in Philadelphia, he gave some startling facts relative to the Catholic clergy. He says that they have an inordinate desire for money. The poor people are importuned for money on all occasions. They must pay every time they go to church and every time the priest goes to them. He knows several priests who have been scarcely ten years in the business and have laid up $20,000 and $40,000 of the money they have taken from the poor laboring classes. In point of indulging the appetite for eating and drinking they evidently do not deny themselves. He says no class in the country live higher than the Catholic clergy and the quantity of wine, whiskey, and brandy they use is perfectly appalling. He has known of great numbers of cases of intoxication among them, and has known some to go to the altar to officiate in their professional capacity so much intoxicated that they could scarcely stand. In sexual indulgences they are also equally intemperate, large numbers of them keeping mistresses, and some more than one. This is the class of men the poor, ignorant dupes are dividing their hard earnings with, under the delusive idea that they are pleasing God and securing a passport to heaven. When will they learn the truth? But for the attendance of the Mayor and large numbers of police this apostate priest would doubtless have been mobbed by the enraged Catholic populace. On a subsequent occasion when Mr. Gerdemann was examined upon a trumped up charge against him, some three thousand Catholics gathered together and evinced a strong desire to have revenge upon him. Men and women almost frothing at the mouth, cried out, "kill him, kill him!" and but for the protection the police timely afforded him, they would doubtless have killed him on the spot. They cannot bear to have the truth told of them.

The Pro and Con of Supernatural Religion; or,

An Answer to the Question: Have We a Supernaturally Revealed, Infallibly Inspired and Miraculously Attested Religion in the World?

BY E. E. GUILD.

REVIEW OF THE EVIDENCE IN FAVOR OF MIRACLES, AND OF THE AUTHENTICITY OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

The substance of the best things that can be said in favor of miracles, and of the authenticity of the New Testament may be summed up in the following propositions:

1. There is an antecedent probability in favor of miracles as a means of authenticating revelation. 2. The doctrines of the Bible are of such a nature as to prove the book divine. 3. It is impossible to account for the existence of so many marvelous stories in the New Testament, only by supposing either that they are true, or that the Evangelists were guilty of wilfully falsifying in order to deceive. 4. Variations in the accounts of the Bible writers is no proof that what they record is false, inasmuch as "substantial agreement with circumstantial variety is characteristic of all human testimony."

1. The antecedent probability. Miracles, it is said, are necessary in order to authenticate revelation. This we deny, and therefore deny the probability of them. If God wished his creatures to be religious, the probability is, he would make them naturally so, and not so arrange the order of nature as to make it necessary to break in upon and disturb the natural order in revealing himself and making his will known. Accordingly, we find that man is endowed by nature with religious powers and faculties—that the germ of religion is planted in his heart and mind. That in the infancy of the human race and while in a barbarous condition, the religious sentiments should be comparatively latent or but feebly manifested, and often misdirected is no more strange than that the reasoning powers of man should be in the same condition, or that we should be born into existence with all our powers both of body and mind in a latent condition.

It is generally admitted that miracles are intrinsically improbable and incredible. If, then, it was necessary for God to make a special revelation to man and to authenticate it by miracles, the amount of proof of the miracles ought to correspond to their incredibility. If we ask for proof of the miracles, we are told that the Bible is authority for them. But how can an incredible thing be authenticated by an authority which itself needs authentication?

2. The doctrines of the Bible. If they were all new and true that would not prove that they were specially revealed; nor that they were above the conception of the human mind. Besides, there is no religious doctrine or moral precept, no rite, ceremony or institution taught in the Old Testament, that had not its counterpart in the opinions and religions of the Pagan nations existing when the Hebrew Bible was written. And all the real doctrines and precepts taught by Christ, as well as all that have been incorporated with them, have their counterpart in the teachings of men who preceded him by several centuries.

3. Were Christ and his disciples impostors? In regard to Christ, it is sufficient to say, that as he left no record of his life or teachings, and did not authorize any one to make such a record for him; and as there is abundant evidence in the record which we have that it attributes to him sayings that he did not say, and doings which he never did, it is impossible to tell what he did or did not say and do. As for the Evangelists, it has never been proved that they were the authors of the books usually ascribed to them. The weight of evidence, and even of authority of learned divines, is that they were not. But suppose they were. Then we shall be asked "if the miracles recorded in the four gospels were not wrought, how came the writers to believe that they were?" It will be said, "these men had common sense; they were capable of judging; they make no attempt at exaggeration, and they record the miracles in a simple, artless manner, as any historian would record events of common occurrence." Here we must proceed with caution. This is a vital point. This argument is not to be treated with a sneer, nor passed by as of no consequence. Before we proceed to comment on it we must warn the reader that it will not do to transfer our knowledge, opinions, views and feelings to the men of those ancient times. To do so, is a fallacy so glaring that we marvel that it should be so generally overlooked. Undoubtedly if some one in our day should claim the power to work miracles, such as raising the dead, &c., we should be exceedingly incredulous, and would not believe only after the closest scrutiny and the presentation of an overwhelming amount of evidence. But with the Evangelists, the case was quite different. They lived in an age and among a people who knew but little about nature and her laws; a people who were exceedingly credulous and superstitious, and believed that miracles were wrought almost every day in their public streets. All the common and ordinary phenomena of nature they attributed to the direct agency of God or the Devil.

The Evangelists were Jews. They believed that in all past time God had wrought miracles in behalf of his chosen people, and that the time had arrived when there was to be the grandest display of almighty power for the redemption of the Jews from their bondage and degradation. Nothing was more natural then, than that they should expect from a man who claimed to be a religious reformer and deliverer, that he should work miracles. Hence, when they saw things done which they deemed miraculous it excited in them no surprise. The only thing that surprised them was that the miracles were so different in kind from what they were expecting. Christ was a remarkable man, commanding in his appearance, voice and manner. He possessed a great share of that personal, mysterious magnetism, which has been so often displayed by other men. He taught doctrines which were adapted to the wants of the common people. His miracles, such as healing the sick, restoring sight to the blind and hearing to the deaf, were such as were wrought at the present day; but which no one supposes to be miraculous. The power to cast out evil spirits was possessed by some men among the Jews, in common with Christ. All these things were thought to be miracles by the disciples, and believing them such, opened the way to their believing almost anything.

According to Lardner, the gospels were written, the earliest not less than thirty-one, the latest thirty-five years after the death of Christ. Two of the supposed writers, Mark, and Luke, were not eye-witnesses of what they record. All four wrote with a view to give an outline history of the life and teachings of Christ. Nothing could be more natural than that they should record, not only what they knew, but also all that was currently believed by their fellow Christians of that day. The artless manner in which they recorded what to us would be incredible, is thus easily accounted for. And we are under no necessity of supposing that the writers were any other than honest men, aside from the tendency of religious enthusiasm and love of the marvelous to exaggeration. A critical examination of the gospels will enable us to detect such a tendency even in them. For proof, see Matt. iii. 5, 6; iv. 23-25.

Before the gospels were written, Christian congregations had been gathered in Syria, Egypt, Greece, Rome and other places. Soon after they were written Jerusalem was destroyed and the Jews dispersed. The principal interest in these writings was confined to those who were interested in having them received as authentic. But few copies of them were in existence; only a few among the people could read them, and they were mainly in the hands of the clergy. There was no one to question their genuineness until some time after they first appeared: and when they began to be criticised, the writings of those who did question them were not long after destroyed.

If God chose miracles as a means of authenticating a revelation, it is certainly very singular that the means should prove so inadequate to the end. At the very time when miracles were wrought in the greatest abundance, a great majority of those who are said to have witnessed them were not convinced by them. If the Jews had believed them to be genuine, would they have dared to proceed against Christ as they did? The miraculous portion of the gospels has always been a serious obstacle in the way of their reception by scientific men, and to-day hinders the progress of religion in the world.

Let us now take another view. We will suppose what the weight of evidence and authority justifies us in believing to be true; that these gospels were not written by the Evangelists, but were compiled by after writers at a time somewhat later than the date usually assigned them, and when nothing was more common than to forge books and attribute their authorship to distinguished persons in order to give them authority. Is it not possible, then, that some liberties may have been taken by the compilers? Whether they were written by the Evangelists or not, it is certain that they have been frequently copied; that they were finally separated from a mass of similar books, and pronounced to be authentic and authoritative by uninspired and fallible men. Can an incredible thing be proved by such evidence? The evidence is wholly ex parte. No scientific test was applied to any of the miracles. No committee of scientific men examined to ascertain whether Lazarus was dead or not, and we have no opportunity to cross-question the witnesses.

As to the internal evidence of the infallibility of these books, we know that they contain incredible statements; direct contradictions, and glaring inconsistencies. As a specimen of the latter, we are told that at the baptism of Christ, John recognized him as the Messiah, and boldly announced him as such to the people. Not only so, but the fact was confirmed by a miracle, the visible appearance of a dove and an audible voice from heaven. Yet subsequently to this impressive scene, John is represented as having been in doubt on the subject. Is it possible that if John was inspired, and had witnessed this miracle, he could have such doubts?

The fact that the New Testament contains contradictions is sometimes denied. Let us examine and see. Take the account of the resurrection of Christ.

All the accounts agree that after the crucifixion his body was placed in the tomb of a man who was one of his friends. Mark says, that when he was taken down from the cross, Pilate "marveled" that he was so soon dead. They all agree that the tomb was visited on Sunday morning, and that the body was not there. But they differ,

1. As to the time of day. Matthew says, it was "in the end of the Sabbath, as it began to dawn toward the first day of the week." Mark says it was "at the rising of the sun." Luke, that it was "very early in the morning." John, that it was "when it was yet dark." This difference is slight, and we only mention it to show that the visit was probably before it was light. How could Matthew know that an angel from heaven had been there and removed the stone from the door of the sepulchre? Neither he nor any of the disciples were there to see. Was not this a mere inference, from the fact that this stone was rolled away? He certainly testifies to something of which he was not an eye-witness. Nor could he have witnessed it, for it was done, if done at all, in the dark.

2. Number of persons who visited the tomb. John mentions but one; Matthew, two; Mark, three; Luke, three, and "certain other women who were with them." Now these gospels are supposed to have been written by independent witnesses. Here they are relating one of the most important events in the career of Christ, one on the truth or falsity of which the whole superstructure of supernatural religion depended. They are supposed to have been inspired in order to assist them to tell the truth. They should, then, have told "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth." But if there was more than one person that went to the sepulchre, then, John did not tell the whole truth. If there was more than two, Matthew failed to do it; and if more than three, Mark did not tell it all. It was an important point, for much would depend on the number of witnesses of the resurrection.

3. Number of persons who appeared to the visitors. Mark says one "young man;" Matthew, one "angel;" Luke, "two men;" John, "two angels." If there was but one person, there were not two; if there were two, there were more than one. If the persons were men, they were not angels; if they were angels, they were not men.

4. Time of the appearance of these men or angels. According to John, not till Mary's second visit to the tomb, after Peter and John had been there. According to Matthew, Mark and Luke, it was when Mary first went to the place.

5. Message of the persons seen at the tomb. John said the two "angels" said to Mary Magdalene, "Woman! why weepest thou?" Luke says that two men announced to several women that Christ had risen. Mark tells us that this announcement was made to three women by a "young man." Matthew says it was made to two women by the "angel" who had rolled away the stone.

6. Conduct of the parties to whom the announcement was made. Mark says, "they said nothing to any man." Matthew, Luke and John say that they hastened to carry the news to the disciples.

7. The persons to whom Jesus appeared. Matthew says, it was first to two women, then to the disciples. Mark, that it was to one woman, then to two of the disciples, and then to the eleven. Luke, that it was first to Cleopas and his companion, as they journeyed to Emmaus; then to Peter, then to the eleven. John says it was to one woman, then twice to the eleven.

8. Places where Christ was seen. Mark does not mention any particular place. Matthew says he was seen by two women on their way to tell the disciples what they had seen at the sepulchre; then on a mountain in Galilee. John says it was first to Mary Magdalene at the sepulchre, then at Jerusalem, though he does not name the place; and then to the disciples at the Sea of Tiberias. According to Luke, it was first on the way to, and at Emmaus, then at Jerusalem and Bethany.

9. According to Matthew, Christ directed the disciples to go to Galilee, and promised to meet them there. Mark says, this direction was given by a "young man," who was seen in the tomb. Luke and John are silent about this direction and meeting. According to Luke, the meetings of Christ with his disciples were all in Jerusalem and its vicinity, at one of which he directed them to "tarry in Jerusalem until they were endued with power from on high."

10. Matthew says, the disciples went to Galilee and met Christ there. Luke, that they tarried in Jerusalem, and "were continually in the temple praising and blessing God."

11. Matthew and John say nothing about what became of Christ after his resurrection. Mark says, he ascended to heaven, but does not tell us when, where, nor how. Luke says, he was "carried up into heaven" from Bethany, but does not say in what way. He also tells us that his ascension took place on the evening of the third day after his resurrection. (See chap. xxiv. 21; compare verses 33, 36, 50.) But in Acts he tells us that he did not ascend until forty days after the resurrection, and that it took place from Mount Olivet.

Another remarkable thing in these accounts is, that the persons to whom Christ appeared could only with difficulty recognize him. When Mary saw him she did not know him, but supposed him to be the "gardener." Two of his disciples journeyed with him, conversed with him, spent some time in his company, and yet did not know who he was, but regarded him as a "stranger." When the eleven met in Galilee, where they went by appointment, expecting to see him, "some" of them "doubted." At his first appearance to them they were "affrighted," and "supposed they saw a spirit." From Mark xvi. 12, we learn that he appeared in different forms. Matthew tells of a phenomenon which occurred at the resurrection which is not mentioned by either Mark, Luke or John, viz.: a "great earthquake" and the descent of an "angel of the Lord from heaven." Of this we will speak in the proper place.

Whether Christ ascended to heaven in his natural body, or whether his body passed through a change of any kind, we are not informed. If his body was changed so as to become etherealized and fitted for a residence in a spiritual sphere, and the Evangelists knew it, it is strange that they did not record that fact. The fact that they did not, is evidence that they did not perceive the incongruity and impossibility which was perceived by Paul, viz.: of "flesh and blood inheriting the kingdom of God."

In order to account for the difficulty of the disciples to recognize Christ, it may be said that his excitement, anxiety and sufferings previous to and at the crucifixion had so worn upon and emaciated him, as to change his appearance. But the same power that could impart life to his dead body, could also restore it to perfect physical health and integrity, and doubtless would do it. It may be said that his resurrection was so unexpected and attended by such marvelous occurrences, that the disciples were alarmed and bewildered. But veteran soldiers, who have been often under fire, are not apt to be alarmed out of their senses when they hear the familiar sound of the booming cannon. The disciples had been living in the very atmosphere of the marvelous and supernatural for three years. They had witnessed miracle after miracle; they had seen Lazarus raised from the dead, and associated with him without fear after his resurrection. Surely, after witnessing what they had, no display of divine power ought to alarm or astonish them. If it was not in body but in spirit that he appeared, as Prof. Bush taught, and as our modern Spiritualists teach, it is sufficient to say that this is expressly contradicted by Christ himself. (See Luke xxiv. 39, and John xx. 27.) Besides, if his resurrection and appearance was of the spirit only, then it comes under the head of those appearances of the spirits of deceased persons to the living, about which we hear so much at the present day, and passes out of the domain of the miraculous.

Here, now, we have the testimony of four witnesses in relation to the great crowning event, the grand central fact of supernatural Christianity—an occurrence which, if it actually took place, was the most important of any in the world's history, involving the interest of every human being. And what is the testimony? It is vague, obscure, conflicting, inconsistent with itself, and self-contradictory. But worse still, even if it were not so, it utterly fails to establish the vital point in the story, viz.: the resurrection of Christ from the dead. If he rose, he must have risen in the dark, and not one of the witnesses was present when the occurrence took place. We can easily believe that he was placed in Joseph's tomb, but we have no proof that life was extinct when he was put there. It may be said that the wound in his side must have produced death. This is a gratuitous assumption. It might have been the means of his resuscitation from a swoon. Besides, the circumstance of the wound in the side, made by a Roman soldier, is narrated only by John, and totally ignored by all three of the other witnesses. We may believe that when the tomb was visited on Sunday morning, the body was not there, but this does not prove that a miracle was wrought to restore it to life. It is quite probable that some of his followers saw, or thought they saw, him after his body was laid in the tomb, but the fact that he was seen by nobody else, is certainly not a little suspicious. Is it likely that God would work a miracle to attest a revelation, and then leave the miracle to be attested by such proof?

It may be said, that although there is some variation in these accounts, yet, "circumstantial variation with substantial agreement is characteristic of all human testimony." So it is. But testimony that is wholly false may have the same characteristic. Besides, although the rule is good as relates to human testimony, it is not applicable to divine testimony; and we are here dealing with what is supposed to be infallible testimony. Infallibility does not admit of degrees. Divine testimony cannot be partly true and partly false. It cannot be substantially true and circumstantially untrue.

"The Nazarene gave but one law in one syllable—love."

C. B.

FRIEND B.: It may sound very devotional and holy to say such things as this of one's worshiped ideal, but the question is whether the assertion be a fact or mere fiction. Was there ever a teacher, a leader or God who gave but one law? Webster defines a law to be "a rule commanding what we shall do or prohibiting what we are to forbear." Christ, as a moralist and theologian, as well as a god, (for does he not insist that he and the Father are one,) gave many rules, commands or laws, and they are by no means all "laws of love" either, nor are they all good, just or right; but Christians are very careful not to quote any of his sayings that do not chime in with their own opinions, or if they do, they so twist and controvert the real meaning of the texts, as to make them seem to imply something entirely different from their actual signification, thus "clothing error with the livery of truth."

Jesus says: "Love your enemies; do good to those who hate you." Is not this a rule or law just as manifestly as the one you have given? A law, too, which no one can obey. We may treat an enemy with justice, kindness and politeness, but our love we cannot control, for it is an involuntary emotion. To say we love one who we know is hating and trying to injure us, is to tell "the thing which is not." Some may fancy they love, but it is not real affection they feel—only its shadow or similitude.

Again Jesus says: "Be ye perfect." But there is no such thing as perfection, especially so as regards the moral character of a human being. We may all act out the perfection of our natures; a man becomes a murderer through an imperfect organization and improper training combined with demoralizing circumstances convincing him, and he is a perfect development of the nature these things have created in him, but is this the kind of perfection that is, "As your Father which is in heaven"—granting there were such a being! "Give to him that asketh." Is not this also a law, and just as binding as the law of love? Yet should we literally obey it, we should soon be all beggars together. "If thy right hand offend thee, cut it off." Another bad law, for how many have maimed themselves for life in a too blind idolatry of this perfect (?) law-giver. "If you salute your brethren only, what do ye more than others?" Is not this a virtual command to make no choice, but to greet all whom you meet with a "paroxysmal kiss" given with "true inwardness?" Never mind if the breath be foul with tobacco, whisky or gin. What matters it if you are nauseated by sickness, effluvia from dyspeptic stomachs, or disgusted by all manner of filth and offensiveness? You must obey the law, the command of the blessed Nazarene. "Let your light shine before all men, that they may see your good works." "Do not give alms before men to be seen of them." Perhaps you Christians may be able to obey two such contradictory commands, but it is a puzzle to me. "Rejoice when men say all manner of evil against you falsely." How simple and easy to obey this behest. How much time, trouble, anxiety, expense and reputation would have been saved had Beecher done so: instead of sitting for long years upon the "ragged edge," he might have been "rejoicing" all this time; but perhaps the evil of him was not said falsely, and hence the command was null and void.

"Agree with thine adversary quickly." 'Tis easy to say this when one is not well warmed up in a good sound dispute. But when you get thoroughly aroused to the merits of a cause you think just and right, how then? What thought Luther when opposing Catholicism? What thought Washington when contending with his English adversaries for freedom and liberty of conscience? What thought the North when she was striving for the liberty of the down-trodden and oppressed slave? What think we Infidels now, as with tongue and pen we are doing our level best to put down old Theology and build up Free Thought? Shall we "agree quickly," and let wrong and oppression triumph? "When thou prayest, enter into thy closet, indulge not in vain repetitions as the heathens do." Yes, if they only would, what a relief it would be to gods and men to be no longer bored. "Ask and it shall be given you." Is it given? Would it be best for us were it given? How much more noble to work and earn what one needs, and thus be independent and self-supporting. "Forgive us our debts." Honest men do not wish to have their debts forgiven; they prefer to pay them and be under no obligations to any giver. "Lead us not into temptation." 'Twere wiser to ask for strength to overcome temptation and resist evil, thus being strong, bold and self-reliant. A child always carried in the arms will never learn to walk. "Lay not up your treasures upon earth." O, no! go back into barbarism and dwell in caves like Troglodytes, eat the flesh of wild animals and crack the bones and suck the marrow! For there is where such doctrines will lead you at last. "Lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven." But suppose there is no heaven? And if there were, you have only one chance in a hundred of going there to enjoy the treasures after you do lay them up. "Take no thought of the morrow." No; do as the birds do—"they sow not, neither do they reap." But really a good dinner of nice light bread, rich ripe fruits and juicy, tempting berries is preferable to being fed upon crawling worms and creeping vermin, such as the heavenly Father furnishes them. There is starvation enough now in the world, and if all trusted to being fed like birds, the race would soon become extinct.

Again, if we take no thought for raiment, we shall be compelled soon to resort to fig leaves and the skins of wild beasts, and these are not picked up everywhere and without thought. Beware of false prophets; ye shall know them by their fruits. Yes, when it is too late. Who wishes to raise a crop and wait for the fruit ere they can judge of its merits? Nourish a tree and let it cumber the ground for long years and at last have the fruit to condemn it! Who wishes to trust and confide in a neighbor or friend and rely upon his teachings, should he happen to be a preacher or prophet, until all at once by one fell swoop he sweeps away from you hope and happiness, thus proclaiming to you his fruits when the knowledge can no longer save you or yours? The theological tree, especially, is apt to prove very faulty in its fruits.

"Let the dead bury the dead." An impossible act at this day, but perhaps feasible then! Christ advises that no one should marry, as those who do are not accounted worthy of the resurrection or of heaven; but if they remain single they will not die, but will be equal with the angels. (Luke xx. 35, 36.) So if you wish "to be an angel, and with the angels stand," avoid wedlock by all means.

"Resist not evil." Let desperadoes murder or maltreat your wives and little ones, destroy and lay waste your property, abuse and trample upon you and all your rights, bear it all in patient submission, for is it not the command of the Nazarene that thou do so? "Sell all thou hast and follow me." If all obey, where will be the buyers? "If any man love the world the love of the Father is not in him." So, of course, no Christian can love the world. Such a saying amounts to a prohibition as much as if 'twere couched in the language of a law or command. But who love to dwell more upon the glories of the world than preachers? To praise the loveliness of hill and dale, forest and glen, of blooming flowers and singing birds, and cry that all these proclaim the glory of God. Are Christians any more ready to bid farewell to the world than Infidels? Do they love it any less, or enjoy its manifold blessings with less relish?

"Sublunary pleasures tend to evil."

And lead back-sliding sinners to the Devil.—Yahoo.

Heavens without End—Amen.

As concomitant of "Worlds without end—amen—" why not have Heavens without end, amen? Is there anything unscientific about it?

This little Universe is being constructed upon the Variety in Harmony ideas. No two are, in all respects, alike. All attempts to mould minds into one shape have proved a failure. Forever will. So is the Law. What is Heaven for one may not be Heaven for another—nor for the same individual long at a time. Progress forbids it. Progress is second to no ordinance of Heaven. The motto of the Empire State is the motto of the Universe—"Heavens without end are a necessity—Amen."

Heavens upon earth.

For definition of Heaven we are not dependent upon dictionaries. What do dictionaries know about Heaven? That in which a man, or woman, finds highest enjoyment is his, or her, Heaven for the time being. No need to quit these mortal shores in search of Heaven—nor 'tother place. We have one, or the other, as a mixture, here and now. Some Heavens are on a low plane—poor Heavens, not worth their cost. There are Heavens worthy of highest aspiring. Heavens rise above Heavens in geometrical progression, suited to all degrees of advancement. Sensible people find highest enjoyment in seeing—in feeling their old Heavens dissolve—the elements thereof melting with fervent heat.

And while their old Heavens are burning like chaff they patiently sit in new Heavens and laugh. Somewhere about here please let me off. Go back on your own record—see how you find it.

Best respects—Amen.

PRENTISS.

THIS has been a year remarkable for floods and earthquakes. In France the most disastrous floods have taken place. A sixth part of that extensive country has suffered most severely, crops utterly destroyed, houses, barns, fences and everything washed away. Cities even containing 20,000 inhabitants have been destroyed, and thousands of buildings prostrated. Thousands of human lives were lost, to say nothing of greater numbers of animals. It will take many years for the country to regain what was then lost in a few hours. In Austria and England floods have also been destructive. Earthquakes in Central and South America have been severe and disastrous. Cities and thousands of lives have been destroyed. It would seem the recurrence of such events should shake the confidence of credulous dupes in the belief that all things are controlled by a wise, beneficent Providence. Scientists understand that these things are all the result of natural causes, and that no beneficent Providence has anything to do with them.

The Bible.

NO. XXVI.

Our attention to the famous Bible narratives having been temporarily arrested by looking after Elder Shelton and others, we now cheerfully return to the subject.

Among the numerous Bible stories of marvelous events, the interesting narrative of David removing the Ark of God from Kirjath-jearim unto his own city, should not be omitted. It was, doubtless, a commendable thing for David to do, after the numerous successes that had recently attended his battles with his competitor Saul, and it is creditable to him that in the hour of his triumph, he did not forget the residence of his God and provided for it.

This ark—totally unlike the ark Noah constructed, both in size and purpose, has a history, which we will briefly examine. It was manufactured by direct command of God to Moses while the Israelites were journeying from Egypt to the land of Canaan. On a certain occasion, when God had commanded that every man in the whole congregation should bring him a free-will offering, either of gold, silver, brass, blue, purple or scarlet linen, goat's hair, ram's skins dyed red, badger's skins, shittim wood, oil, spices, onyx-stones, etc., he gave explicit directions for the construction of the ark. It was to be made of shittim wood, two and a half cubits long, (about four feet,) a cubit and a half wide, and the same in depth (some thirty inches our measure.) It was to be overlaid with gold inside and out, and a crown of gold upon it. A ring of gold was also to be attached to each corner, through which staves of shittim wood also overlaid with gold, should be introduced with which to carry it. A mercy-seat of pure gold, and of the same length as the ark, was to be placed upon it, with two gold angels called cherubims, one at each end, stretching forth their wings and covering the mercy-seat and the ark therewith. In the ark was to be kept the testimony or covenant of God to the people, and it was to be his special residence, and from above it he was to hold communication with Moses.

It was some little time before the ark was constructed according to these directions, and not until after Moses went up on Mount Sinai to assist at engraving the ten commandments, after Aaron had made the golden calf to worship, after Moses in a fit of anger thereat broke all the commandments at once, and had to return to the Mount and repeat the process of getting them up again. After all this, one Bezaleel, the son of Uri, who, by the by, must have been a good mechanic, got up the ark, and the mercy-seat, and the staves, and the cherubims, with their wings spread according to stipulations, as well as a great deal of other work, including the tabernacle candlesticks, lamps, vessels, bowls, altar, pots, shovels, basons, flesh-hooks, fire-pans, laver, court-hangings, curtains, etc., etc. It would seem to require a manufactory, with good facilities, to turn out such a variety of workmanship, and a little wonder might well be excited how a wandering people, in a wilderness, could afford the necessary facilities for such a diversity of mechanical operations.

This ark was kept in the tabernacle, which was a kind of tent, and the Israelites kept it with them in all their wanderings and through all their wars, but we do not hear much more of it till near the close of the life of Joshua, when at Shiloh, he divided the country among the twelve tribes by lot; whether by throwing dice or by drawing straws, or picking numbers out of a hat, or by playing "seven up," or some other game of chance, we are not told, but that deciding by lot means by a game of chance of some kind, cannot be denied. Well here the tabernacle and the ark was duly set up, and remained there for a considerable period.

After the time of Samuel, on a certain occasion, when the Israelites were badly whipped by the Philistines at Eben-ezer, when four thousand were slain and left upon the field; the defeat seemed to be a matter of surprise to the Israelites, and they enquired among themselves what it could mean. They said: "Let us fetch the ark of the covenant of the Lord out of Shiloh so that it may save us from our enemies." Accordingly Hophni and Phineas, sons of Eli, were sent for the ark, and they conveyed it into the camp. Upon its arrival, the Israelites shouted loudly and made such an outcry, that it alarmed the Philistines who heard it, and when they learned that their enemies had brought the ark of their God and would then have his assistance, they nerved themselves to the contest, and said to each other, "Be strong and quit yourselves like men," thus relying upon their own strength and prowess in opposition to the God of the Jews. In the contest that followed the Israelites were more unsuccessful than before the arrival of their God; this time thirty thousand of their footmen alone, were slain. Hophni and Phineas were also put to death, and the ark was captured by the Philistines.

A sad fatality seemed connected with the ark; when a man of the tribe of Benjamin, with rent clothes, hastened to Eli, the aged father of the two unfortunate men who had charge of the ark, who had arrived at the advanced age of ninety-eight years, as soon as he heard the intelligence of the capture of the ark and the death of his sons, he fell over, broke his neck and immediately died. The death could not be called premature, but was nevertheless sad. His daughter-in-law, the wife of one of the sons, as soon as she heard the news, was taken with premature labor and brought forth a child, which she named Ichabod, and she died. Thus the ark was the cause of a very unusual commotion, in that family at least, and, so far as they were concerned, it had better remained at Shiloh.

The Philistines took the captured ark to Ashdod and into the temple or house of their God, Dagon, and set it up beside him, and it seemed to be a disturbing element there. This god, Dagon, had before always behaved himself with propriety, but the first night after the ark was brought into his presence, he fell with his face to the earth before the ark and laid there till his loving worshipers picked him up in the morning and sat him right again in his place. On the second night this thing was repeated, with this addition, on the second morning Dagon was found with the palms of both hands cut off, and only the stumps were left. This extraordinary occurrence greatly alarmed the priests of Dagon, and they doubtless felt as though they had in that ark an elephant upon their hands. They feared greatly that the invisible god in the ark was more powerful than their god, which they had before regarded as possessing supreme power.

It is said, also, the hand of the Lord was heavy upon them of Ashdod, and he destroyed them and smote them with emerods in their secret parts. These were probably very bad things to be smitten with, and when the people of Ashdod saw all this, they felt that the invisible god in the ark was unfriendly to them thus to afflict them, that they said, "the ark must go." It was taken to Gath; but that city, in consequence of the presence of the ark and the mysterious power within it, was equally unfortunate. A very great destruction came upon the city, and all the men, both great and small, had emerods in their secret parts. It is no wonder those people decided the god in the box was not kind to them, and that they immediately removed it to Ekron, where consternation and great destruction was also the immediate result. Great numbers were destroyed, and the balance smitten with emerods.

It is not singular, we say, that the Philistines became greatly disturbed at the presence of that mysterious ark, and that they wished it removed from their coasts, for they became convinced that the god within it would not become acclimated to their country or be friendly to them. It was suggested that they make some golden mice and some golden emerods and place in the ark as a trespass offering to appease its god for what they had done in bringing the ark to their cities, and then to send it away. They did so. The manner of sending it away was singular. They fastened two new milch cows to a new cart and placed the ark upon it; their calves were shut up at home, whereupon the cows, without a driver, immediately started for Beth-shemesh, a portion of the territory of the Israelites, and when they arrived there, the men of the place were busy in the harvest fields securing their wheat, but when they heard the lowing of the cows, and saw the ark coming, they rejoiced and expressed their joy by cutting the wood of the cart for fuel, and offering the two cows as a burnt offering to the god of the ark. It may be judged that this effort on their part did not put him in a particularly good humor, for in consequence of some one opening the ark and looking in, he smote just fifty thousand and seventy men on the spot. A pretty good number of men, truly, to be gathered in a harvest field in the country on a summer day; but we are only relating the account, and will not stop to question the statement.

It is not singular that the people lamented the return of their god; they had got along very well without him, and over fifty thousand lives to pay on the first day of his return, was a heavy price indeed. The people who were left—for the fifty thousand slain did not embrace all who had assembled—sent the ark to Kirjath-jearim; it was taken to the house of Abinadab, and his son Eleazar was sanctified as priest to attend to it. In the absence of the god of ark among the Philistines, the Israelites seem to have adopted Baalim, Ashtaroth and other gods, and Samuel persuaded them to discard these and return to their old-time god who had been brought back to them. He took a sucking lamb and offered it for a burnt-offering "wholly unto the Lord," which seems to have restored the former amicable relations, for in the battle with the Philistines which immediately followed, the latter were badly used up, and for a long time remained quietly within their own borders.

As we were saying, it was from this place that David decided to remove the ark to his own city, and that, after wading through the blood of his own people, which he had so freely shed in his way to the throne, it may have been a very praiseworthy measure of his to remove the aforesaid ark.

He gathered together thirty thousand of his chosen men for the purpose, a number quite sufficient, it would seem, to move a box four feet long. The ark was placed upon a new cart, hauled by cattle, which were driven by the sons of Abinadab. David and all his companions played before the Lord on all manner of musical instruments while the ark moved along.

On the way a sad event occurred, which proved how dangerous a matter it was, even with the best intentions, for a man to touch the ark. As the cart passed over rough ground, the gait of the cattle shook the ark badly, and a man by the name of Uzzah fearing the safety of the ark was endangered, probably with the best motives in the world, put his hand upon the ark to steady it and to keep it from falling from the cart. For this piece of temerity the unfortunate man suffered severely; "the anger of the Lord was kindled against him, and God smote him for his error, and there he died by the ark of God."

This alarming event frightened David so greatly that he felt it would be unsafe to have so dangerous a piece of furniture near him, so he caused it to be conveyed to the house of Obed-edom the Gittite for three months; and after he learned that the household of Obed-edom prospered greatly, he deemed it would be safe to convey the ark to his own city. This he had done with great gladness, and on the way he sacrificed oxen and fatlings, and he danced before the ark with all his might midst shouting and the sound of trumpets. All this, it is to be supposed, placed the Lord in very good humor, for no one was killed on this occasion, which was the first instance for a long time, when the ark had been moved without one or many deaths resulting from it.

David had the ark placed in the tabernacle which he had pitched, and he sacrificed more animals and made peace-offerings and served bread and flesh and a flagon of wine to each one in the multitude. Good feeling and joy seemed to possess all, save his wife, Michal, the daughter of Saul, who looked out of the window and witnessed David dancing so vigorously before the ark in an uncovered condition that she reproved him for his shameless, undignified conduct in the presence of so many hand-maids and servants. David, however, justified himself and said he would do more than that next time. For thus speaking unto David, it is said "Michal had no child unto the day of her death," but in a subsequent chapter it is stated she had five children. How both of these statements can be true, or which is true and which is false, we can hardly decide, and will leave our clerical friends to explain it.

After David had deposited the ark and its god in a tent, while he himself occupied a house, it struck him as not being just the thing, and he proposed to the prophet Nathan to build a house for the Lord. Nathan approved of the plan, and said the Lord did also; and here was the origin of the temple afterwards built at Jerusalem. David, however, although said to be after God's own heart, was so much a man of blood, having caused the death of untold thousands, that he was deemed unfit to build the temple, and it was reserved for his son and successor, Solomon, who was not so bloodthirsty and warlike, but who had a wonderful penchant for the opposite sex, and drank bullock's blood to recuperate his animal powers and functions. He had, it will be remembered, seven hundred wives and three hundred concubines, and for him it was reserved to build a holy house to the Lord God.

The main lesson to be learned from this story is, to see the crude, imperfect and improbable notions entertained about God in those primitive times; that the God of the Universe could be confined in a box four by two and a half feet square; that he could be moved from place to place by means of cows and oxen; that he flew into a fit of anger upon very trifling provocations and killed fifty thousand and more at a time; that he could be pleased with the blood of animals and the smell of their roasting flesh, the noise and sound of horns, trumpets, shouting, etc., and with boisterous dancing and jumping. It is easy to see these ideas of Deity were very crude and unprogressed. Now, it is not supposed the God of the Universe can be confined in a box of the dimensions named, or that it is in the power of men and cattle to move him around and set him up here or there. It is scarcely believed now that he gets angry and slays thousands of men for unintended mistakes, and hence it can be seen how unreliable and absurd many of those old Bible stories are, and how illy fitted they are to the needs of humanity in the present age of the world.

Prayer to the Devil.

Oh, thou Lucifer, Son of the Morning, Prince of the Air, thou Sulphureous Majesty, known also as Belzebub, Apollyon, Satan, the Power of Darkness, the Evil One, and Monarch of the nether regions, we would address ourselves to thee. We know not whence thou art nor whither thou goest, and in an under-tone we would say, we seriously doubt thy existence as a personage; but having heard much of thee, we would approach thee respectfully. As much as is thought to be understood of thee, as many as think they have been annoyed by thy presence, little or nothing is known of thee. Thou art said to have a frightful visage, horns on thy head, a cloven foot and a long barbed tail, but there is not a being alive who hath ever seen thee, and the word of those who in former times claimed to have had a glimpse of thy person is not worthy of credit.

He who hath told us most of thee, giving us thy early history and exploits, was St. John, surnamed Milton. He described thy tall majestic form and thy imposing presence. He narrated most eloquently; and, in sublime verse, thy prowess and valor in thy terrible contest with the King of Heaven, and his superior forces commanded by his Lieutenant-General Michael, in which grand contest rocks and mountains and thunderbolts were fiercely hurled and no one killed. If it was thy unfortunate fate to be beaten in that primary conflict and to lose a subordinate position in heaven, thou hast ever since been the victor and hast ruled in hell, and without successful opposition on earth. Howbeit, John was a poet and dwelt so completely in an imaginary world, his descriptions of thee must be viewed in that light, though they have been the basis of the theological views concerning thee.

The class of men called priests have much to say of thee, and claim to have derived great information concerning thee from an old book written by many unknown persons and which itself sadly needs confirmation.

From all that we can learn of thee, by this record and what its expounders say of thee, thou hast been greatly slandered and maligned. Thou art called a liar, the father of liars, the source of all evil and the cause of all the trouble and unhappiness the world has known. We believe this unjust and unfounded. In that "snake story," when thou persuadest our first mother to eat a fine apple thy antagonist had created, it is held thou didst act very badly, but we cannot see wherein; the fruit did open her eyes and the eyes of her husband, to know good and evil, and when thou saidst to her that in the day they ate thereof, they should not surely die, thou toldest no lie, but the truth, for they lived nine hundred years thereafter. If it was wrong for thee to induce them to partake of such beautiful fruit that was within their reach, was it not more wrong to create such dangerous temptation and place it in their sight?

In that friendly tilt thou hadst with thy competitor, the Son, otherwise known as the carpenter of Nazareth, and who said that he and the father were one, when thou carriedest him to the top of a mountain so exceedingly high, that thou couldst show him all the kingdoms of the earth, including not only those on the side towards thee, but those on the opposite side as well; and when thou takedst him to the pinnacle of the temple to show him the surrounding country, thou at least proved thy superior physical power, and if thou offeredest him all the kingdoms of the earth for a certain consideration, tho' thy enemies would disparage thee for this, and say thou didst not own them, it would seem thou didst by the right of conquest; and that at all events, thou hadst the right to execute a quit-claim deed if thou chose.

That little affair with Job, when thou afflictedst him so sadly and covered him with boils, was truly a little shabby, and one, most assuredly, no gentlemanly devil would want to be guilty of, but it seems it was a special arrangement which thou enteredst into with thy antagonist as a matter of experiment, and if thou wert culpable, he certainly was no less so, for it was he that first named Job to thee. In fact it was a discreditable piece of business for both thee and him.

Though the little experiment here alluded to was not worthy a great being, justice impels us to say that for many centuries thereafter thou wast not known to be guilty of any reprehensible act, whilst thy opponent caused the death of hundreds of thousands of his creatures and incited numerous wars, in which millions of his own peculiar nation and other nations were killed. While he has thus caused the death of untold numbers of human beings, while he acknowledged himself the cause of the evil that exists, while he admits that he caused the prophets to lie and be false; notwithstanding all the charges of iniquity and crime that has been brought against thee, and all the opprobrium that has been cast upon thy name, no priest can point to a single instance where thou hast told a falsehood, where thou hast been guilty of theft, or where thou hast ever caused the death of a single human being. In this respect thou art immensely in advance of thy antagonist, who is said, daily, hourly and momentarily to cause the death of old and young, and who has in so many instances led his chosen people to falsehood, theft, robbery and murder.

As much as thou hast been slandered and abused by those who esteem themselves godly, thou hast never co-habited with a young maiden; thou hast never committed adultery with the older sisters; thou hast not indulged in drunkenness, nor made wine for those already drunk; thou hast not yielded to anger; thou hast not sought to deprive others of their dues; thou hast not descended to back-biting or slander, and, so far as we are able to learn, thou hast always conducted thyself like a gentleman, and in all these regards hast acquitted thyself far more creditably than thy antagonist and his priests.

Of a truth, thou hast proved thyself a fast friend to the human race. Thou hast fostered science and education; thou hast promoted inventions and improvements of all kinds tending to increase the knowledge and happiness of man. It was thee, it was asserted, who first taught Copernicus and Galileo that the earth is round and makes its yearly journey round the sun. It was thee who taught them of the countless worlds which float in space. It is well thou didst this, for it seems thy antagonist nor his Son knew aught of it, or if they did, they deemed not to say a word of it in their books or in their teachings; and though the Church came near taking the lives of those two worthies for telling the world what thou taught them, we are left to conclude thou didst protect and befriend them.

It was thee who was said to have taught Faust and Gutenberg the great art of all arts—printing—and one or both were cast into prison for their supposed intercourse with thee in the matter; and since that day pious men of the Church have repeatedly denounced the printing press as the greatest of evils—an invention directly from thee, and bound ultimately by the dissemination of light and knowledge, to overthrow the Church of God.

The great inventions of the application of steam, the telegraph, railroads, steamboats, lightning-rods, friction-matches and thousands of other useful inventions, have been denounced by thy enemies as thy work, and as having been incited by thee. The pious Presbyterians of Scotland even claimed the fanning-mill to be an invention of thine, and denounced those who employed them for cleaning their oats and rye with using "the Devil's wind," and thought they ought to be cursed of heaven therefor. It is not a little curious how thine enemies, after denouncing all these inventions named, with many others, as thy productions, after man has used them and found great utility in them, and elevated the race thereby, to see them turn and try to claim them as the result of their religion, and to endeavor to establish its proof by their existence?

Few among thy enemies are men of science, and they advocate nothing which tends to impair their old system of theology. They still insist that it is thee who leads these scientific, learned men to discover truths in Nature which disprove the idle tales of ignorance found in that old book. Humboldt, Lyell, Darwin, Huxley, Wallace, Farraday, Tyndall, Draper, and all that class of scholars, are denounced by the Church as thy servants—led and incited by thee; and the brave advocates of mental liberty and freedom of opinion regardless of priestcraft and false theology, are still more denounced and maligned. They are called children of thine own begetting; so that by their own showing, ignorance, superstition, mental slavery and fogysm belong to their side, while science, learning, invention, innovation, enterprise, mental freedom, and human progression, belong to thy kingdom, and are the children of thy begetting. We pray, then, that thy influence may increase in the world, while that of thy antagonist is bound to decrease.

In the matter of prowess and generalship much injustice is intentionally done thee. Thy antagonist is called all-mighty, and is said to be so powerful that naught can stand before him. But according to the confessions of thy enemies this is untrue. In every contest since thy expulsion from Paradise thou hast beaten. In the game for the great stake which thou and thy opponent have been playing for—mankind—thou hast held the trumps and won by far the larger share—say twenty to his one. He had greatly the advantage to begin with. He made everything just to suit himself, and had the fixing of conditions precisely as he wished, in peopling the world, when thou steppedest in, and with little effort or bluster, quickly swept the board. If he drowned the race of man to get rid of thy influence; if he caused nation after nation to be butchered and exterminated to get an advantage over thee; if he even sent his beloved son to be sacrificed and cruelly put to death to make a point on thee, and gain human souls to himself, it all seems of no avail, for thou hast worsted him in every contest, thou hast come off victorious in every encounter and drawest still a retinue of followers after thee, immensely more numerous than the sparse number of bigots and old fogies that he induces to follow him.

In view of these facts the injustice which has been done thee by thy enemies is most apparent. If thy antagonist is called the "mighty one" thou shouldst

Mokanna Unveiled.

BY S. H. PRESTON.

"Yes! I have seen God's worshipers unsheath
The sword of his revenge, when grace descended,
Confirming all unnatural impulses,
To sanctify their desolating deeds;
And frantic priests waved the ill-omened cross
O'er the unhappy earth; then shone the sun
On showers of gore from the unflashing steel
Of safe assassination, and all crime
Made stingless by the spirit of the Lord,
And blood-red rainbows canopied the land."

Queen Mab.

Christianity has had 1800 years in which to save this world. And how, and from what, has it saved the world? From bloodshed and war, cruelty and crime? Professing to be the evangel of peace, it has strewn the half of the earth with the wrecks of armies and the bones of murdered millions. Preaching goodwill to man, it set mankind to cutting out each other's hearts, arrayed nation against nation, and in the name of Jesus Christ, it drenched our beautiful world with blood and tears. Beneath the snow white banner of the cross reddened the fairest fields of the earth. Its consecrated altars have swum in blood. Its history is one of wars and persecutions, crusades and holy massacres. Established by the crimson-handed Constantine, perpetuated by fear and force and fraud, it inundated the ages with an ocean of gore. Verily, Christ came to bring a sword. And through the dim, dreary years of racks and chains and autos da fe, Christianity sat in the world's tribunal an insatiate monster, dripping with the blood of heretical martyrs, feasting from the flesh of sepulchres. The lurid glare of ten thousand fagot piles revealed her in all her gory and ghastly and ulcerous deformity, enthroned upon the skulls and flame-bleached bones of thinkers and discoverers. Has it saved the world from war? At the birth of Christ there was universal peace; the temple of Janus was closed. But since that period, the gospel of the so-called Prince of Peace, has indeed been a sword upon the earth. The rivers of Christendom have run blood.

Have Christian priests been the conservators of peace while preaching of a time when swords should be beaten into ploughshares, and spears into pruning hooks? Let the author-tradesman who answered Bishop Watson, say: "Three hundred millions of human beings have been sacrificed by Christian priests. Whenever the Lord calls to bloodshed, the priests are, to a man, on his side—'For as troops of robbers wait for a man, so the company of priests murder in the way by consent,' Hosea, vi. 9. If they are too cowardly to draw the sword, they do not fail to sound the tocsin of war." Let the poet Shelley answer:

"And priests dare babble of a God of peace.
Even whilst their hands are red with guiltless blood,
Murdering the while, uprooting every germ
Of truth, exterminating, spoiling all,
Making the earth a slaughter house."

And to-day, after nearly two thousand years of advancing civilization—of civilization which has advanced only when Christianity has been powerless to arrest it—have the priceless blessings of peace been secured the Christian world? Let Robert G. Ingersoll answer: "More than five millions of Christians are trained, educated and drilled to murder their fellow Christians. Every nation is groaning under a vast war debt incurred in carrying on war against other Christians, or defending itself from Christian assault. The world is covered with forts to protect Christians from Christians, and every sea is covered with iron monsters ready to blow Christian brains into eternal froth. Millions upon millions are annually expended in the effort to construct still more deadly and terrible engines of death. Industry is crippled, honest toil is robbed, and even beggary is taxed to defray the expenses of Christian warfare. There must be some other way to reform this world. We have tried creed and dogma and fable, and they have failed; and they have failed in all the nations dead."

Let Wm. McDonnell answer: "Christian nations are pre-eminent for their love of war, plunder and devastation; and so great is their mutual distrust, that even during the uncertain periods when there is no actual war, the armed peace of Europe alone costs, as has been stated, about $1,500,000,000 annually."

Did Christianity save the world from cruelty? Let Dr. Dick, the ablest advocate Christianity ever had, answer: "What a dreadful picture," says he, "would it present of the malignity of persons who have professed the religion of Christ, were we to collect into one point of view, all the persecutions, tortures, burnings, massacres, and horrid cruelties, which in Europe and Asia, and even in the West Indies and America, have been inflicted on conscientious men for their firm adherence to what they considered as the truths of religion."

The heathen in the fourth century remarked: "There are no wild beasts as ferocious as Christians who differ concerning their faith."

In the name of its God, Christianity has committed every imaginable atrocity. It invented racks and filled torture-dungeons with refractory heretics; while that Christian institution, the "Inquisition, model most complete

Of perfect wickedness, where deeds were done—
Deeds! let them ne'er be named—and sat and planned
Deliberately, and with most musing pains,
How to extremest thrill of agony,
The flesh and blood, and souls of men,
Her victims, might be wrought; and when she saw
New tortures of her laboring fancy born,
She leaped for joy, and made great haste to try
Their force, well pleased to hear a deeper groan."

Has Christianity, after more than eighteen centuries' trial, saved the world from crime? Thus answers the Hornellsville Times: "The records of the past have never presented a more fearful and corrupt state of society than now exists throughout the United States. The newspapers from every quarter are becoming more and more loaded with the records of crime."

Thus answers the North American: "From the terrible evidences of human depravity which develop themselves from day to day, we begin to think that our cities are rapidly descending to the level of Sodom and Gomorrah."

Thus says the N. Y. Herald: "Crimes of all descriptions are on the increase, especially those of the blackest dye; the increase being much greater than the proportionate increase of population."

Thus says the Expositor: "Crimes, unprecedented in number, and unequaled in atrocity, fill every section of our country with horrors, exhibiting a hardened barbarity, in their details, only to be exceeded in the bosom of demons."

The Scientific American answers thus: "It is admitted by all parties that crimes of the most outrageous and unprecedented character abound through the country, and probably throughout the world, to a degree wholly unparalleled."

The N. Y. Tribune answers thus: "In social life, our newspapers are smutched all over with reports of divorce and separation trials, of infidelity and disgrace; of gigantic crimes undertaken, half accomplished, or completed. What shall be the end of these things?"

Every newspaper in Christian America answers the same. And in this great God-blessed republic, the marvel of Christendom for its magnificent churches and costly cathedrals, a tax upon which would pay our enormous national debt in a few years; in this country which supports an army of 61,000 expounders of Christianity for the one purpose of teaching the people how to cease to do evil and learning them how to do well; in this land flooded with Bibles and tracts, a land renowned among the Christian nations for its missionary enterprises; here where has culminated the Christianity of this nineteenth century, the statistics of crime are perfectly appalling, and every description of vice and corruption and immorality abounds to an extent that may well startle the heathen in lands uncivilized. Prisons and penitentiaries are crowded with Christian criminals, and Christian clergymen are swung into heaven from the ghastly gallows. Between the years 1860 and 1862, four Protestant priests were hung for murder in these United States. And, albeit, many clerical culprits are shielded by a powerful church to avoid scandalizing Christ's cause, yet, as a class, in proportion to their numbers, Christian priests—ever notorious for villainess and sensuality—to-day, excel all others in the commission of heinous crimes.

Did Christianity save our land from slavery? William Denton thus answers: "Christianity did not save the South from slavery, where it was commenced and carried on by Christians and Christian ministers, whose hands were strengthened by their Christian brethren of the North; the one forged the fetters and applied them, the other riveted them, and cursed in the name of Jehovah, all who attempted to break them."

Has it saved from intemperance? Again let Wm. Denton speak: "Christianity does not save from intemperance; for, while men almost universally believed in Jesus where the evil was, it grew till it overshadowed the land. It invaded the pulpit, and dragged to untimely graves hosts of the strongest Christian believers. The first temperance paper was published by Joseph Lindsay of England, who was what is called an Infidel; and it was not until outsiders had done the heavy work, and they saw a prospect of assistance from it, that Christians took much interest in the temperance movement. The Bible is the bulwark of moderate drinking, and the example of Jesus one of its principal supports."

Has it saved mankind from fraud, injustice and dishonesty? Thus answers a distinguished writer. "Can Christian people claim to be more upright, more honorable, and more exemplary than Buddhists, Mohammedans, or Parsees? In numerous instances the ethics of China or Japan might bring the blush of shame to entire Christendom. What among the deceptive transactions of Bible worshipers—who boast of a purer theology—is still most common? Frauds in castle and in court, in state affairs and church matters; frauds in national intrigue, in diplomacy, and in naval and military affairs; frauds in Senate chambers and in low tribunals; in elections and appointments; frauds by word and by oath; in buying and selling; in giving and receiving; frauds by weight, and frauds by measure, and frauds by adulteration, and increasing frauds in every imaginable shape and form that may escape the penalty of crime."

And what of our judiciary? And now give ear, O ye people, to what says the second Isaiah: the "greatest preacher since Paul," as he has been called, even the great Mogul of popular Christianity and scandal in the city of churches. Silence in the congregation of the Lord! Henry Ward Beecher step forth! Hear ye him. "All the framework of society seems to be dissolving. On every side we find men false to the most important trusts. Even the judges on the bench are bought and sold like meat in the shambles. One must go into court with a long purse to obtain justice. The judiciary of New York stinks like Sodom and Gomorrah. Men say they hardly know a court in which to trust a case. It is no longer an honor to sit on the bench; for if the judge be an upright man, his character will be contaminated by the great majority of his associates."

Has Christianity saved the world from sloth and vice and degradation; from poverty and prostitution? Through the dark long years of mediæval wretchedness it filled Europe with monk-houses and beggary, and sent men to hole in caverns like beasts. It gave gilded capitals to popes and potentates, and princely palaces to priests; while it put the yoke of sacerdotal power upon the peoples' necks, and housed them in huts and hovels. And to-day look at Ireland and Italy, Mexico and Spain, by nature, the most beautiful lands upon the globe; look wherever the people have not yet thrown off the trammels of that original Christianity, which, under the administration of holy Mother Church, for fifteen hundred years blighted the fairest portions of earth with deadness and decay. See the barrenness and hunger and distress among the fields where Nature had scattered plenty. See gardens gay with roses dyed with blood. See the ignorance and want, idleness and misery; and see the squalid people, shriveled and dwindled into things fit only to crouch before wooden saints, and lazy, gluttonous priests. And it is only because Christianity has been unable to retard the onward sweep of civilization that portions of the world ever emerged from the putrid pools of slothful ignorance and superstition. The world has improved since the Protestant revolt in the sixteenth century, and Protestant countries are in advance of Catholic; simply because Protestantism was, to a certain extent, a departure from Christianity—a secession of the more liberal and advanced elements of that age. And both must continue to be drawn onward and upward by the great grand car of progress as it rolls eastward toward daybreak, unless by their united, persistent efforts, they succeed in reversing its course, letting it rumble back down the declivity of the ages into old murky midnight again.

But is Protestant Christianity saving the world? Over 100,000 prostitutes, over 150,000 vagabonds and paupers are wandering through the streets of London to-day. And Dr. Lancaster, an eminent coroner of the same Christian city, reports 12,000 cases of infanticide annually. Read the astounding statistics of increasing vice and pauperism and immorality in the reeking cities of Protestant England and America. All the thousands of citizen soldiers and patrolling policemen are impotent to arrest the swelling flood of iniquity and wretchedness. Within the very shadows of costly churches, darkly crouch despair and distress and destitution; while human beings regularly die of starvation. Pale pauperism and ragged want stalk faintly past high domed and richly gilt cathedrals, the elegant entrances to which pious policemen guard. And in the same great city in which Trinity Church corporation holds $70,000,000 worth of property—consisting largely of brothels, grogeries and gambling dens—last winter a man chalked on the walls of his cell in the Tombs, this fearful fact: "In New York city the spires of 342 churches, worth $41,120,000, point heavenwards. I am here for stealing a loaf of bread for my starving child." But the Heathen must be saved in far, far off lands. And so the pauper's penny, and the poor pittance of the wanting widow are snatched by the ravening wolves of a costly superstition to fit out floating palaces freighted with Bibles and grog and gunpowder to carry the glad tidings of great joy to the uttermost parts of the earth. Sea and land are compassed to make one cannibal proselyte ten-fold more the child of hell; while the home-heathen about the church doors are left to starve, and soldiers are sent to shoot the red heathen of the West.

Says the distinguished Dr. Pusey: "There are places in London, as I have myself seen, where, for generation after generation the name of Christ has never reached, and their inhabitants had much better been born in Calcutta than in London; because the charity which sends forth Christian missionaries would the sooner reach them."

Millions of money, made up from many a widow's mite, and the penny offerings of orphans, yearly expended in visionary and extravagant missionary enterprises; an army of lazy, licentious priests, wandering restlessly from pole to pole; twenty-five missionary societies laboring for India alone—maintaining there 350 missionaries at an annual expense of $1,250,000—all for the salvation of distant heathendom. And after sixty years of all these costly and romantic attempts, less than one fourth of one per cent. of the 200,000,000 population of India profess Christianity to-day. Twenty-four missionaries with twelve native helpers in China, and the Foreign Missionary Society recently reports "the baptism of a first convert." Dr. Livingstone, in one of his late works, said, "it was not until after the death of forty missionaries in Africa, that the first heathen had been converted." One missionary report, says, "that besides the actual cost, it takes six missionaries to convert one Hottentot"—that is, six of them die off, and probably the Hottentot does not stay converted only while he is well fed.

How has Christianity saved the Sandwich Islands? Let Governor Kapena, one of the escort of King Kalakana, recently visiting the United States, answer: "It is somewhat remarkable that wherever the missionaries came, depopulation followed."

How has it saved Hindoostan? Let Baboo Protah Clumder Mozandar, the learned Hindoo of Calcutta, answer: "I came from the banks of the sacred river Ganges. My forefathers were peaceful and progressive men. When they were hungry, they did not kill the beasts of the wilderness or the fowls of the air; but they satisfied their hunger with herbs and fruits; and when they were thirsty they didn't open large casks of brandy; but quenched their thirst from the simple streams of our rivers. But the nations of the West have introduced into our land those two mighty powers of modern civilization—grog and gunpowder. Before the god of gunpowder, the physical liberties of my countrymen have made an unconditional surrender; before the terrible god of alcohol, the moral nature of my countrymen is now about to be offered as a sacrifice."

Ever since the days of John Eliot, Christianity has been saving the wild red heathens of America. One powerful missionary society, after an expenditure of $30,000,000, and forty years of labor among a few tribes, confidently pronounced them a Christian people just previous to our great rebellion, exultingly parading their glorious triumph for Christ before the world. And yet the very next year, those same Christian tribes, led by Albert Pike, a Christian missionary from Boston, were scalping our wounded soldiers at Pea Ridge; and the ferocious perpetrators of the horrid Minnesota massacre were Christian Indians, every one. Christian grog and gunpowder have now nearly exterminated these heathens of the wilderness. The Sandwich Islands are being rapidly depopulated. Of all the failures of that sublime humbug of the ages, Christianity, itself a failure and a fraud, the missionary movement has been the most complete. And oh, what a savior has been Christianity! Professing to save the world from the wrath of God, it filled it with hate and horror—with heartless hypocrites and human hyenas. Professing to save man from a hereafter hell, it made for him a hell on earth. While saving the world from ignorance of "Jesus and him crucified," it shrouded Europe for half a millennium in the murky midnight of the Dark Ages. Instead of saving from war, it made a slaughter house of earth. Instead of saving men from fear and force and cruelty, it gave them the Inquisition. Instead of saving from despotism and slavery, it set crowns upon the heads of tyrants, and consecrated the chains that manacled millions. Instead of saving the world from intemperance, it gave drunkenness the sanction of patriarchs and prophets, and Paul, who told Timothy to use wine for his stomach's sake, gave it the sanction of righteous drunken Lot, and drunken naked Noah, and Christ the manufacturer of wedding wine, who took the cup and blessed it and passed it on through the Christian generation. Instead of saving from crime, it clothed its "own naked villainy with old odd ends stolen forth from holy writ," and justified every iniquity in the long black catalogue of crime, when perpetrated for the glory of God and his infallible church. Instead of saving from pauperism, it reduced to poverty the wealthy Jews in Spain, and industrious Huguenots in France, and drove them forth in wandering wretchedness, that their confiscated goods might be clutched by its princely, pampered prelates. It filled the old world with mendicants, reduced kings to destitution, and to-day the conscienceless Christian church would gladly clutch the half consumed crust from starvation's teeth could it count ought in its consecrated coffers. Instead of saving from superstition, itself has been the central—the one colossal superstition that has brooded over the centuries like a nightmare horror, before which mankind have cowered in terror. Instead of saving from any evil that ever cursed this earth, itself has been the chiefest evil—the curse of curses. And yet a little while and it must show the world whether it be able to save itself. It has already cursed earth too long, and its end draws near. Within the last three hundred years most mortal dagger-thrusts have been dealt this usurping Cæsar of superstition that shall bring him to his fall. With his clumsy Protestant poniard, strong old Luther dealt the first stab that caused him to stagger. Voltaire with his keen and poison tipped stiletto, left a cut that never closed. Deadly thrusts were those of Thomas Paine, ruining the old monster through and through with the sharp sword blade of reason. The strong right arm of staunch young science has given the later deadly strokes. And yet a little while and this age-cursed despot, seeking to set a sacerdotal crown upon his head in the senate hall of a great free people, will feel in his quivering vitals the fatal steel of a patriotic Brutus—ay, the death cold steel of Marcus Brutus, the adopted son, who, while loving this ambitious Cæsar much, will yet love his country's Magna Charta more. "Et tu Brute!" Then fall Cæsar! "And wrapping his blood dyed mantle around his passion wrinkled forehead, all written over with the names of blasphemy, with the death rattle in his putrid throat, his black and bloated and bleeding body will fall to the foot of the grand white column of human freedom; while pulpit and press and people will join in joyful proclamation: "Peace, freedom and enfranchisement! Christianity is dead, and we are glad of it!" And through all the coming wasteless years the glad tidings will be wafted on, to be taken up and again repeated in states unborn and accents yet unknown: "Christianity is dead! Peace, enfranchisement and freedom forevermore!"

"A brighter morn awaits the human day,
When every transfer of earth's natural gifts
Shall be a commerce of good words and works;
When poverty and wealth, the thirst of fame,
The fear of infamy, disease and woe,
War with its million horrors, and fierce hell,
Shall live but in the memory of time,
Who, like a penitent libertine, shall start,
Look back, and shudder at his younger years."

"Creator"—"Religion."

TO PROFESSOR TYNDALL.

DEAR FRIEND: Relieved of need to address you on the themes suggested at the close of my former Letter, as having been called since to treat the same in letters to others, yet may I ask your attention to the two most important passages in your Inaugural, the first of which may be said to have become so more than historic as to be already immortal:

"Abandoning all disguise, by an intellectual necessity, I cross the boundary of the experimental evidence, and discern in that matter which we, in our ignorance of its latent powers, and notwithstanding our professed reverence for its creator, have hitherto covered with opprobrium, the promise and potency of all terrestrial life." Shall I be permitted to point out, in opposition to the Past, whose language that is—"matter," "its creator"—and as voicing the language of the Present, and of Science, that Matter on its face has no "creator," can have none, itself is the contradiction of "creator," so that your world-renowned utterance is ready to be recommitted for such revision as shall make the two terms of its statement possible to co-exist! It must either be "matter the promise and potency of all terrestrial life," and then no "creator," or it must be a "creator," and "matter" not "the promise and potency of all terrestrial life"! It must either be "matter," as the world has always written it, or it must be Matter! The great Proper of all things, the great Proper which itself is all things, the Universe, can not be created. Infinite created is stultification, and then Matter created is. Matter has no "latent powers." Of course, take clay, and say its powers: but then take the Matter of a man, and say its powers: take the Matter of the Earth, men and everything else on it, and say its powers: take the Matter of the whole Universe, and say its powers—at last the Matter of all possible beings, things, existences, to infinity and eternity, with its powers! Matter being infinite and eternal, always was everything and did everything, always was the Universe, already existed all these things! It is not the "promise and potency" of all, but already is all—not only "all terrestrial life," but all life—it absolutely now is and always was, all things, consecrating anything beside all things, a "creator," the most ridiculous and impossible conception that ever entered the brain of man!

And as for the "new definition" of Matter for which you call, that is the only final, perfect definition of Matter—the Universe; all Matter is the Universe: any part of Matter is part of the Universe: the whole can have no possible definition but this which the whole is, and no part can have any possible definition nor significance nor even existence except as part of this: there is nothing abstract or apart from the Universe, and then there is no abstract Matter, mere Matter—strictly and literally no Matter, positively nothing but actual Universe! No Matter, then, nothing to be defined, nothing but that same Universe! Even if Matter is that, and that is Matter, yet Universe swallows the other up, and forever alone remains. Even if Matter makes the Universe, it does not in the sense of developing it, unfolding it, but only of existing it—Matter inevitably, inherently, and then eternally, exists the Universe—it never existed, never could exist, anything else—it and the actual, already running Universe are the very same thing, and always were the very same thing—for Matter to be at all, is to be this whole infinite Expanse and Arrangement of Suns, Planets, Men and all things, and for Matter not to be this whole infinite Expanse and Arrangement, would be to be itself non-existent! Matter and Universe are other names, and the same thing, but that thing is at last Universe, in which Matter merges and is lost. Rather, Universe is the thing, and Matter is only a name of it—Universe all, and Matter an appellation—then Universe everything and Matter nothing—or again, Universe everything, and Matter the mere name. Especially, Matter the name, description, characterization of some part, as clay, or the make-up of the air, Ether or Sun, but when we launch out and reach the Whole needing no description, then all else dropping out, and we only able to think and say Universe!

Science joyfully submits to be corrected, and to give place to the new and larger statement by the event proved to be Science, and so now, in the light of all this, but especially to make the truth of the new statement so flagrantly glaring as to compel acceptance from even everybody, I know you will forgive, will welcome, the personal application which the argument makes to yourself, returning to the direct comment on your immortal passage. Then shall the argument be permitted to ask you, by what authority you wrote "matter"—without the capital M? Do all the rest write it so? Well, suppose they do, by what authority did you write it so? All the rest may be ignorant, and fools: was it for you to indorse—or to correct them? The rest are the sheep, who follow any bellwether: you are the man of Science, the teacher: was it for you to run after them—or to bid them come to you? And by what authority did you assert a "creator" of Matter? a "creator" of the Infinite! or by what authority did you assert that Matter is not Infinite? Say that all the rest assert both these things, yet, by what authority did you assert them? By what authority did you speak of the "latent powers" of Matter—by what authority did you pronounce them "latent"—thereby denying that they now are and always have been actualized in the existence of an infinite Universe of Suns, Planets, Men and all things? By what authority did you say you "cross the boundary of the experimental evidence," thereby denying that all this infinite Universe is and always has been such "experimental evidence"? By what authority did you say "promise and potency of all terrestrial life," thereby denying actual and present, even eternal and infinite, realization of absolutely all life, and all things? And, as if to reduce Matter yet nearer to nothing, by what authority did you express "reverence" for the creator who wrecks on it all this revenge? And so by what authority did you, and did you still, "cover" Matter with all this "opprobrium"? By what authority did you assume to do all this, and then by what authority did you assume all this? And so shall we not henceforth have done with such assumptions—have done with "matter," and "creator," and in their place accept the Universe, and Science? I know you consent, and only ask these questions as you would, to emphasize the immeasurable absurdity into which we have all so astonishingly fallen!

And your second passage involves but a continuation of the same argument, even in these strong words of your both thesis and postulate: "The immovable basis of the religious sentiment in the nature of man. To yield this sentiment reasonable satisfaction is the problem of problems at the present hour." But it is the mistake of mistakes to suppose that the way to yield the religious sentiment "reasonable satisfaction," or then any satisfaction, is to give men a "creator," a God! Give men that "creator." Then, before he created, infinity was blank, there was not a Star, a man, an atom; there was nothing, and a whole eternity of nothing—a whole eternity of nothing instead of a whole eternity of this infinite Universe!—and you give that unending annihilation to men to satisfy them! And after he created, all was finite, for he could not create infinite; and so all is finite now, mere and absolute nothing to what it might have been, a little bit of nothing instead of all this infinite Universe—and that is what you give men to comfort them! And because even this little nothing began, therefore it must end—what has one end must have two ends—and so all this that exists to-day must at length cease, and through another whole eternity be nothing again—and that is what is to cheer men so wonderfully! And the God himself—during all that eternity when he was alone, all this other eternity when he will be alone, or all this little minute when he co-exists with the nothing he created—he is nothing, and utterly less than nothing, even to not so much as existing at all! First a God—he, a being, is finite, and nothing to infinite. Next, if the God would not create that whole eternity, when he could, he is a bad God, worse than the worst man that ever lived, and infinitely worse than no God at all! But if he could not create, still his existence, as standing instead of and preventing a Universe back there, was just as much an infinite impertinence and curse! Then the God has always been a mystery, nobody has ever been able to know anything about him, and of course not to get any good out of him, and so instead of himself being a good he has emphatically and only been perplexity and evil! Last, that tells why there has been no knowing anything about him—there has been nothing to know anything about: the God has been all nothing and nowhere, men have simply made it all! It has been all talk, it has been "God," "God," "God," when there has never been anything to answer to it! The Universe is all, it is everything and the everything, and there can be nothing beside it to be a God! There can not be a God in it, because there is nothing in it but it; and there can not be a God outside of it because there is no outside—there can not be anything but the sheer Universe itself, and so there forevermore, can not be any God at all! So that in giving men a "creator," you have lost the Universe, and the God too!

No. But it is this infinite and eternal Universe, and this only, which can satisfy the craving in man's nature. Strike out but the Universe's eternity, and all is gone—stark nothing through a whole forever: carrying with it the equal immortality—stark nothing through another forever! And strike out but the Universe's infinity, and all is gone—all is a mere infinitesimal! Strike out the Universe's infinity and you have struck out its eternity, for it is eternal only because it is infinite! Infinity is the starting-point, that can't be created and so is eternal, can't be destroyed and so is immortal! The Universe is infinite, and hence both eternal and immortal—blot out that infinite, and you blot out that eternal and immortal too! Blot out the Universe's infinity, and you blot out everything! Assume a God and you blot out everything—that says the Universe can be created and then it is not infinite! God that should be salvation becomes perfect damnation, annihilation! But with the Universe impossible to be created or annihilated, God is forever crushed out, forestalled by infinity before, behind, and all round. And then with its infinity, eternity, immortality, all three, the Universe becomes more to man than all the Gods he ever dreamed of, all the Good he ever conceived of! Here is good tangible, the highest he can possibly picture, actually illimitable, running both ways forever! Infinity, Eternity, Immortality, are all made over to him, placed in his very hand, for the repose of his being, for the satisfying of his entire nature! Call him Intellect, or Heart, or Soul—here is all that Intellect, or Heart, or Soul, or all together, can depict or desire! And he is part of it all, bound up in its fate, an indispensable factor, even so that without him the rest could not be; and he reads it all, takes in all this existence from eternity to eternity, and becomes the equal of the infinite he sees—and what can he ask more?—or how can you add to his happiness?

But then he has no "religion," for this is not "religion," but Science, Philosophy, Nature! At last we have reached more than men ever dreamed of, and yet we have found no Religion, for there is no Religion! We have satisfied the highest sentiment in man's nature, and all sentiments in his nature, but instead of any Religion, we have given him something better! When man faints, when he suffers, when his heart goes down to zero, when he alone is not equal to his fate, then he wants to lie back on the bosom of the Infinite! And we give him that Infinite, as no God ever could, nor any created Universe, nor any God and created Universe both together, as nothing ever could but this Universe—we give him that Infinite which all the rest have never given him, and never can give him! Science alike reveals this glorious Infinite to all, and to the same benediction shuts up and seals all, equally yourself and

Your humble friend,

JOSEPH TREAT.

A Generous Merchant.

In response to our maiden effort on the platform on the evening of July 23d, we feel greatly pleased with the following complimentary and very liberal letter from our friend, Morris Altman. It speaks for itself. We trust our Liberal friends will not forget his generosity when wishing goods in his line:

M. ALTMAN & Co., }
301 & 303 Sixth Ave. }

IMPORTERS AND DEALERS IN DRY GOODS, FANCY GOODS, AND MILLINERY.

NEW YORK, July 26th, 1875.

MR. D. M. BENNETT—Dear Sir: I listened with much pleasure to the delivery of your Lecture at Plimpton Hall on Friday evening last, and felt interested in the fact that such a speech could be so quietly and acceptably received by so many persons.

Fully impressed with the fact that much good will flow from a free distribution of your lecture—it being one of the most extreme and radical ever delivered in this city—I hereby enclose our check for FIFTY DOLLARS, to be used in distributing extra copies of your paper containing the Lecture.

Your boldness in uttering such rank heresies in this city, and before such an audience, entitles you to the thanks of every Liberal in the country, and to enable you to spread such radical sentiments broadcast over the land requires the immediate aid and assistance of all who believe in the future emancipation of Humanity.

Fraternally,

MORRIS ALTMAN.

We accord our warmest thanks to Bro. Altman for his liberality and his kind opinions. We assure him the money shall be used in the direction indicated.

The lecture referred to will be found on the tenth page. It will also shortly appear in tract form.

THOSE persons who began to eat large quantities of fish a few years ago, and have kept up the practice ever since without having experienced the desired increase of intellectual capacity, may thank the New Orleans Republican for this explanation: "Unless a man has brains, it is useless for him to eat brain food. It has never been claimed for fish that it creates; it only strengthens the brain."

be called the "most mighty one." If, in memory of what he has done in the world, he should be called kind and benevolent, how much more shouldst thou be styled great, magnanimous, powerful and super-good! How wrong that the firm, including the father, the son, and the other individual, each holding a third interest, should exclude the greatest and best of the four, simply because of his excessive modesty and on whom so much depends, even in the system that has been devised in their interest. Without thee what would their whole stock in trade be worth? Without thee what would become of the millions of priests that have cried aloud in their name? Without thee their whole system, their grand cathedrals, their elegant churches, their sonorous organs, their modest chapels, their monasteries, their nunneries, their seminaries, their colleges, their rites and ceremonies, their countless millions, in tithes and exactions, and even the source of all their terror and fears would have no existence. In view of all this, we exclaim, how shabbily hast thou been treated! Thou hast been kicked out of the firm which should have contained a quartette, with thyself not farther back than second. It might, with propriety have read, Father, Devil, Son & Ghost.

Another great injury we feel has been done thee by the circulation of the report that thou art engaged in a never-ending contract, by the firm aforesaid, to do their dirty work for them—to keep up, without cessation, the sulphureous fires in the nether regions to a white heat, and therein with pitchforks and other cruel instruments of torture, thee and thy sub-devils to forever pitch and punch, to the latest moment of eternity, ninety-nine one-hundredths of the entire unfortunate human race. We cannot believe this of thee. It is all a priestly lie. Nothing in thy character, so far as known, justifies the horrible conclusion that thou wouldst ever engage in an employment so repulsive, and so execrable. As we said, thou hast ever shown thyself a friend to the human race, and hast rarely done an unkind act to any individual, and we feel assured that thou wouldst never be so base, so heartless, so inconceivably cruel, as to torture thus, countless millions of poor, weak, ignorant, helpless mortals through endless ages, for the trifling offenses of a short earthly life, and just to please thy old antagonist—the firm of Father, Son & Co. We believe, Uncle Nicholas, if they wanted thee to do this work for them, that thou wouldst immediately spurn the idea, and bid them do it themselves.

No, no; imperious Lucifer, we can believe nothing of this cruelty of thee; the idea is too monstrous to attach to any being, god or demon, much less to a character so amiable as thou hast thus far shown thyself to be. The good and benevolent, the free, the wise, the intelligent, the learned, the scientific, and the lover of liberty, all follow in thy wake. As thou hast heretofore treated them well, thou doubtless will continue to do so. We much prefer to train in thy band with such men as Socrates, Plato, Copernicus, Galileo, Spinoza, Goethe, Schiller, Shakespeare, Byron, Humboldt, Volney, Paine, Franklin, Jefferson, Lincoln, and all such men, than to be numbered with the priests, the zealots, the murderers, the bigots and the hypocrites, which make up the other crowd. We fear not to trust ourselves with thee and thy company.

We would not deceive thee in the least; we have grave doubts of thy existence as a person, but believe in it just as firmly as we do the existence of thy antagonist. Both stand on an equality in this respect. We regard you both as figments of the brains of ignorant superstitious nations, which intelligence and reason will ultimately drive from the earth. Prince Lucifer, thou spirit of the air, we say then, speed the day—hasten on the time when truth and knowledge will rule supreme in all the earth; when popes, cardinals, bishops, priests, pastors and elders can be dispensed with; when the ignorance they have fastened on the race will give way; when all men can exclaim in truth, "we have knowledge, we have light, we are our own priests, we walk in Nature's lovely path, and none can make us afraid." AMEN.

A THOUSAND flashes of lightning were counted in an hour during the great storm on the 7th of July at Geneva, Switzerland.

Prayer to our Readers.

AUGUST AND REVERED ADVOCATES OF THE RIGHT: Feeling in an unusually prayerful mood at this time, and wishing to direct our prayers where there is a possibility of their being heard and answered, we appeal to you.

Two years have now elapsed since, with slight acquaintance, slight experience, slight financial ability, but with much trepidation and misgiving, we first addressed you in the columns of this paper. We felt uncertain how our little sheet would be received, whether it would be taken by the hand and into your good graces, or whether it would be suffered to die an untimely death like other abortive attempts in the same direction. But you have been kind to us and have sustained us like brothers. You have borne with our mistakes and short comings, and you have become endeared to us. We have aimed to fearlessly discharge our duty and to speak what seemed to us true and just. We trust our efforts have met your approbation, and that you will still accompany us and aid us in the future course we wish to pursue.

We have a common cause; we are all interested in the triumph of Truth and Reason in our fair land and in the world. We are an unpopular minority among our fellow men; our opponents are numerous, well organized, and powerful, but we know they are groping in error, and that their minds are so blinded with the mistaken theories of the past dark ages that they cannot comprehend the superior inculcations of reason as it is in Nature. We should stand shoulder to shoulder in the conflict with error in which we are engaged, and ultimately we shall triumph.

Priestcraft and false theology will struggle hard to parry our blows. They will make their strongest efforts to overthrow us and drive us from the field, but armed with the truth and animated by the love of humanity in our hearts, we assuredly in good time will reach the goal of victory. The sky may be partially overcast now, but the glorious sun of truth will shine forth; the mists and fogs of ignorance and superstition will be dissipated, and a calm, clear sky will meet our view.

Dear readers, we propose to continue on in the work in which we have been engaged for the past two years. We wish you to continue on with us, and render us what aid you can. We need more patrons and those that we have to come promptly to our aid.

It takes money to print a paper in this city, and this now seems to be "the one thing needful." Up to this time our incomes have not equalled our outgoes, and during the past unprecedented hard times we have been compelled to strain our credit. We are in debt. We ask you, friends, whose time has expired, to renew promptly. Send us fifty cents to pay the balance of this year, and those of you who can, please send us $2.25 and pay up to January, 1877; in that case we throw off twenty-five cents. Remember, after January, 1876, THE TRUTH SEEKER becomes a Weekly at two dollars a year. Is there a Liberal in all our land who knows the paper that is not willing to spare two dollars a year to sustain in? Some, of course, will fall away, but we hope it will be those only who feel indifferent in the cause of truth, and are willing that priestcraft, superstition and bigotry shall still rule our country.

Those who will send us seventy-five cents, will be credited to Jan. 1st, 1876, and will receive forty cent's worth of tracts. Those who will send us three dollars shall be credited from Sept. 1st, '75, to Jan. 1st, '77, and shall have sent to them, post-paid, $1.25 worth of tracts.

We ask, once more, those in arrears to remit us what they owe us. We are needing it now, and hope you will not longer withhold it. Those who are in arrears for Vol. II., and will remit us our dues before the close of August, shall receive our thanks and twenty-five cents' worth of our tracts by mail.

Those who do not wish to read the paper any longer, and do not feel willing to contribute the small sum we ask towards its support, will confer a favor upon us by informing us without delay. But please, friends, let this number be as small as possible. If you knew how it dampens and saddens our feelings to receive, "Stop my paper," we hardly think many would thus afflict us. Don't say "stop," but let on—

WARD be the motto and the watchword. Let there be none so apathetic and indifferent as to be unwilling to spare the small sum of two dollars yearly, to sustain a sheet pledged to do all within its power to oppose and expose the great evils of our time and age.

Friends of mental liberty, those of you who have the ability and the inclination, at any time, to donate a small sum to help us along in the work we are pursuing, hold not back, if it is not more than five dollars, two dollars, or one dollar, it will do good, and we promise we will faithfully use it in the diffusion of truth. We ask not to make money; we seek not big profits, but we must have money to meet our current expenses, or of course we must go to the wall.

Within the last few months one thousand papers have gone by the board; the heaviest houses have failed; Beecher's publishing house with its large capital has had to succumb; his Life of Christ has "gone higher than a kite."

Shall THE TRUTH SEEKER be counted among the failures? Not if our friends stand by us. We fear not the Church, we fear not the priests, we fear not the devils, we fear not the gods, we fear only the poverty, the apathy and indifference of friends, or those who should be friends. If they answer not our prayer, none will.

Many of our friends are prompt and always on time; would that all were so; if they were, we would not complain or urge; but many are behind and seem very willing to be so. We know times are hard and money scarce, and we acutely feel the effects thereof. It, however, takes but a small sum from each of you to pay our yearly price, and we hope the amount will break no one.

We need new subscribers. Some will fall by the wayside; some will refuse to remit, and the ranks should be kept full. Let every sympathizing friend send a new subscriber, or half a dozen of them, who can. Many should read this paper who do not. Let the light of truth shine far and wide. Let every person whose eyes fall upon these lines and who are not patrons, resolve at once to become so. Remit for a year, remit for six months or remit for three months. There are none of you, surely, but what can do that. Stand by us and we will stand by you, and the truth shall spread in our land.

Hear our prayer and grant our request. We ask it for truth's sake—we ask it for humanity's sake. Answer our entreaty, and ours will be the honor, the power and the glory, now and evermore. AMEN.

MR. JAMES MCCARROLL of this city—a well-known litterateur, and one of the lecturers of last season before the Polytechnic Society—has become a professor and lecturer of the Grand Conservatory of Music, Fifth Ave.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is kept for sale by JAMES A. BLISS, Circle Hall, No 402 Vine st., Philadelphia, who has at that place opened a library of Liberal and Spiritualistic books. We recommend progressive people in that locality to patronize him.

THE Literary Miscellany, for August, James McCarroll, editor, contains the following complimentary notice of our effort at the Liberal Club. The commendation may be somewhat overdrawn, but it is nevertheless agreeable, and we duly return thanks:

"D. M. BENNETT of THE TRUTH SEEKER recently read a very clever and exhaustive paper upon 'the Gods of Superstition and the God of the Universe,' before the Liberal Club of this city. Although the paper was fiercely assailed by some of the ablest members present, it was generally conceded that Mr. Bennett's arguments were not met effectually, and that he acquitted himself with rare knowledge and ability."

WE HAVE RECEIVED numerous responses to the proposition in our last, in reference to the work, "LIVES AND DEATH-BED INCIDENTS OF NOTED INFIDELS," but not enough yet to justify the undertaking of a work so expensive. We trust many others will feel like sending us their names. At the suggestion of some friends, we may decide to use type a size smaller, and make the book a large 12 mo, in place of octavo; omitting most of the portraits and thus get up a work of 800 pages for three dollars. It will contain a great amount of valuable and instructive reading matter for the money. It has been suggested also, that there be added to it a Family Record as many of the large Bibles contain; would that be advisable? Friends, suggestions are in order; let us hear from you.

Underwood's Debate.

B. F. UNDERWOOD's debate with the Rev. John Marples, Presbyterian, came off at Napanee, Ont., on the evenings of July 20, 21, 22, and 23. It was largely attended, many persons from a distance putting in an appearance. We see by the Napanee Express that while Mr. Marples excelled in declamation and sound, Mr. Underwood in clear, logical and forcible argument, bore away the palm. It says he showed sure indications of great research and investigation, and that the impression he made upon the listeners was greatly in his favor. The inclination to free enquiry and free thought is on the increase in that vicinity.

In a former number we mentioned the possibility of our publishing in pamphlet form, Underwood and Burgess' recent debate at Aylmer, Ont. We shall not do so for the present. Those who wish to procure it can do so by writing to J. C. Pankhurst, Publisher of "Both Sides," (Aylmer, Ont.,) in which paper the discussion is reported in full.

Sectarian Intolerance.

Mr. Anthony Comstock has caused the arrest of John A. Lant, publisher of the Toledo Sun, on the ground of obscenity. His preliminary examination before the commissioner has taken place, and he has been in $3,000 bail to appear at the next regular term of the U. S. Court in this city, which bail not being forthcoming he was remanded to Ludlow street jail. This, to make the best of it, is a piece of petty Christian tyranny, in this boasted land of freedom, and in view of the far greater obscenity of the Beecher adultery case, which for months filled most of the papers in the country, is simply contemptible. The United States authorities must have little to occupy their attention, and the pious Mr. Comstock must be spoiling for a fight to meddle with such small fry. Why does he not attack the Herald, the Sun, or the Graphic? Are they too powerful, and is it safer to pounce upon a defenceless, impoverished, struggling little sheet? Are the morals of the people, the welfare of society or the peace of the government endangered by the existence of such a paper?

New Books.

THE WORLD'S SIXTEEN CRUCIFIED SAVIORS.—We have received a copy of Mr. Kersey Graves' book by this title, and we are free to say it is an important acquisition to Liberal literature. It contains not only the account of sixteen different saviors of man who were crucified hundreds of years before the existence of Christianity, but it is an exhaustive examination of the entire subject of Christianity, showing conclusively its pagan origin. The work is a very interesting one, and should be in the hands of every truth seeker. Price $2. Sent by mail, postage free. We will be glad to supply all who want a copy.

STARTLING FACTS OF MODERN SPIRITUALISM, by N. B. WOLFE, M.D., second edition. A fine copy has been placed upon our table. It contains faithful accounts of the author's investigations in the different phases of Spiritualism. It gives many facts, indeed "startling" and wonderful, with letters from distinguished individuals bearing upon the subject. Those seeking proofs and descriptions of the various Spiritual phenomena, cannot do better than read this highly interesting work. From the author's character and reputation, his statements can be received with confidence.

The work contains four fine steel plate portraits and many other illustrations, and is gotten up in fine style. Price, $2.00. Postage 25 cents. We are prepared to fill orders for it.

THE MYSTERIES OF THE HEAD AND HEART, explained by J. STANLEY GRIMES, 12 mo, 360 pp. Published by W. B. Keen, Cooke & Co., Chicago. Freely illustrated.

The author of this new work has for a third of a century been a popular lecturer upon Phrenology, and Mesmerism. Many thousands of the American public have with interest listened to his lectures, his examinations, &c.

The work is divided into three parts.

PART I, is the author's improved system of Phrenology, containing new names for several organs, and attributing offices and uses to several organs not hitherto recognized by other Phrenologists. He groups the organs into three classes, the Intellectual in the front head; the Ipseals, or self-preserving in the middle portion, and the Social in the back and basilar portions of the brain.

PART II consists of his theory of the physiology of the emotions and the relations of body and mind.

PART III contains the author's opinions of trance, clairvoyance, hallucination, mind-reading, mesmeric sleep, &c. He attributes these conditions to the over action of certain organs of the mind, or the decreased action of other organs. He is an unbeliever in the claims of Spiritualism, and in connection with his philosophy upon the subject gives many incidents coming under his own observation. He is an able writer and a clear thinker. The work is an interesting one to all classes of readers. Price $2.00 by mail, post paid. We have it for sale.

DARWIN'S DESCENT OF MAN. We were in error in a previous number as to the price of the new edition of this work of near 700 pages and many illustrations, containing the entire matter embraced in the two volumes as originally published, with additions. The price is $3.00, postage 25 cts. We are sending many copies away, and will be glad to send many more.

Dry Goods Price-List.

Thousands in the country are constantly debating the question of prices in dry goods. They go to the most popular store in the neighborhood, and fail there to learn for a certainty whether fair prices are charged or not. Other thousands are not only seeking honest and fair prices, but they want also reliable information in regard to the styles of goods most in demand. Now, all such persons should send a letter to the highly respectable and reliable firm of M. Altman & Co., and ask for their new Price-list. This enterprising and well-known dry goods firm have taken this method of popularizing their business in every section of country. This Price-list, containing thirty-two pages of closely printed matter, gives a minute description of a $250,000 stock of Dry Goods, Fancy Goods, Millinery Goods, Ladies' and Gents' Furnishing Goods, Ladies' and Children's Undergarments, Costumes, Cloaks, Basques, Hosiery, Gloves, Jewelry, Laces, Trimmings, Parasols, Umbrellas, Notions and the thousand and one articles usually sold in first-class city houses. It will be sent, free of cost, to any one sending address and postage stamp for mailing the same.

We have examined this Price-list, and find that it teaches its readers how to order goods. The description it gives of every article is so perfect and complete as to make the selection extremely easy and certain of giving satisfaction. This firm will give their best attention to the execution of all orders, and they agree to refund the money in every case where the goods turn out different from their representations. The standing of the house is such that we cheerfully vouch for the truth of whatever they say. Address M. ALTMAN & Co., corner 6th avenue and 19th street, New York.—EDITOR INDEPENDENT.

[We know and have known Mr. Altman and his manner of doing business for some time, and are fully enabled to endorse the views of our contemporary, and although we seldom agree in matters theological, we are pleased to accord our hearty concurrence with its judgment in reference to our friend MORRIS ALTMAN. He is just getting out his new Fall and Winter Price-list, containing accurate descriptions and the lowest price of House-furnishing Goods, such as Sheetings, Towels, Blankets, Quilts, etc., as well as his full assortment of Ladies' Suits, made up in the latest styles in Alpaca, Poplins, Repps, Merinos, Cashmere Silks, Camel's Hair Goods, etc., etc., as low as $10 each, and as high up as $300.

This Price-list is sent free to all our readers who may send a stamp and their address, and those hesitating to send stamp, together with those finding themselves unable to furnish stamp, he will send the Price-list to by sending address. Mr. Altman is also anxious that Liberals who may send for his Price-list should distribute them freely in their towns and villages.—ED. T. S.]

THE Rev. Edward Calvin, a preacher at Brighton, Mass., is accused of cruelly treating his little son, and an official investigation is being made.

[THREE HUNDRED AND THIRD MEETING.]

A paper was read upon

The Gods of Superstition and the God of the Universe,

BY D. M. BENNETT.

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN:

For thousands of years the world has abounded in gods, and these gods have been the handiwork of man.

As far back in the early history of our race as we are able to penetrate, we find that men have been engaged in inventing and manufacturing gods.

We find, too, that these gods, in point of intellect, culture, refinement, and morality, have always been a reflex of their makers. The more degraded a nation or people, the more crude and coarse their gods. If the god-makers were but little advanced in intelligence, if their reasoning powers were but feebly developed, their gods partook of the same characteristics, and were monstrosities, often having two or more heads, many eyes, distorted visages, numerous arms, and other deformities. If the nation was warlike and aggressive in disposition, and if they were inclined to brigandage and bloodshed, their gods invariably possessed the same characteristics, and they often commanded their worshippers to engage in wars and carnage, and to despoil the neighboring nations of their wealth and their lives. Without mercy they authorized the most relentless cruelty, debauchery and murder, sparing neither the nursing mother nor the infant at her breast.

If, on the other hand, the nations were peaceful and harmless, if they preferred a domestic, quiet life, if they esteemed rest and indolence, their gods were sure to possess the same tastes and habits, and they did not direct their devotees to wars, carnage and butchery. These gods delighted in peace and tranquillity, and the best conception of happiness and bliss on the part of their makers and worshippers was quietness and rest. The ancient gods of India, Persia and China, are cases in point.

Thus we see that whatever characteristics, habits, and dispositions a tribe, race, or nation possessed, whatever was striking or peculiar in them, was invariably ascribed to their gods. If the character and attributes of the god of a people could be ascertained, there would be no difficulty in determining the nature, the literature, the intelligence, the habits, and the manners of its worshippers. If they were degraded, so were their gods; if they were beastly, so were their gods; if they were gluttonous, so were their gods; if they were cruel, so were their gods; if they were warlike, so were their gods; if they were murderous, so were their gods.

In view, then, of the great number of gods that men have made, and the very small portion of them that have been amiable, peaceful, benevolent, and honest, there is great truth and pertinency in the remark that,

'AN HONEST GOD IS THE NOBLEST WORK OF MAN.'

Applause.]

There are, perhaps, few stronger arguments in favor of the early degraded condition of the human race—few clearer proofs of the low and debased state of the primitive tribes of mankind—than the depraved character of the gods they made and worshiped; and we see that to this day among the crude and savage portions of the race, where the light of intelligence and civilization has but dimly shone, they are still making and worshiping the same class of ignorant and repulsive gods. Nothing but knowledge and science can dispel from the dark minds of these ignorant savages the crude and abhorrent notions of the gods which they still hug to their breasts. It is the same with all superstitions and errors: the light of science and positive knowledge will inevitably drive them back to the dark, noisome corners of obscurity and oblivion.

The earliest conception of an invisible power which primitive man, as he slowly emerged from the plane of mere animal life, entertained, was, doubtless, that it was an enemy—that it annoyed and injured him. The storm, the tempest, the tornado, the burning rays of the summer sun, the killing frosts of winter, he looked upon as enemies; they caused him discomfort and pain, and in the infantile stage of his intellect and experience he imagined that these simple operations of Nature were evil powers that delighted to afflict him, and in the unprogressed state of his mind he fancied he could placate them by bowing in the dust before them and offering them worship and sacrifice. As he gained his livelihood by capturing and slaying animals of various kinds he sought to appease those evil powers, and to propitiate them, by presenting them a portion of the animals he had slain.

Not being able to perceive these gods or demons with his visual organs, though he thought they must necessarily have an existence, he soon began to make crude images of clay, wood and stone to represent to his sight the demons or gods he wished to appease and keep in a friendly disposition towards himself. These images he soon came to regard as the real gods, and he feared and dreaded the same, and bowed to the earth before them.

He early began to imagine there were great numbers of these invisible powers, and he readily assigned separate gods or demons to the winds, the streams, the ravines, the oceans, the mountains, the storms, the thunder, the sun, the moon, the day, the night, the four seasons of the year, and so in many other directions. As these gods were multiplied, the fear, the worshipful feeling, the veneration and awe increased, becoming one of the leading traits of primitive man, but all growing out of his ignorance of the simple laws of nature. Could he have understood the causes which produce winds and storms—the conditions of heat and cold, expansion and contraction, light and electricity—he would not in the storm or tempest have felt the awe and fear which an imaginary power excited in his breast.

Thus, we see, ignorance was the cause of his devising imaginary gods and demons. Ignorance is the source, whence have proceeded demons, genii, gnomes, hobgoblins, furies, fairies, nymphs, naiads, sprites, witches and the like. Here was the origin of worship in the human breast. Ignorance and superstition were its parents, and for thousands of years these have been the elements that have fostered and sustained it. Worship is claimed to be a high and holy quality of man's spiritual organization, and inherent in his existence. This is a mistake. It was the result of his want of knowledge, and this want of knowledge has kept it alive. It degrades a man and makes him abject and cringing, and does not elevate him. As man has attained to a higher degree of intelligence, as he has been able to understand that every result which ever occurred in the Universe has been the effect of natural laws and causes, instead of being the work of an angry and fickle Deity, his fears and his tendency to worship have together taken their flight, and he has learned to view all the operations of nature with calmness and imperturbability.

Those who first invented and fashioned the gods, those who assumed to describe their character, their wills and wishes, naturally became their priests; and thus it was soon discovered that the gods must have mouthpieces, through whom to make known their will and pleasure. The gods were found to be of but little use without the priests to speak for them, to proclaim their will, to command for them homage and worship, and to receive for them such sacrifices, gifts and offerings as the priests decided must be forthcoming.

Here originated the order of PRIESTHOOD, which for thousands of years has been such a burden, such an incubus, such a curse to mankind. Gods have been increased by myriads, the crudest images of clay, stone, wood and metal; and animals of nearly all kinds have at one time or another been worshiped as gods, among which may be named cows, elephants, sheep, camels, dogs, cats, crocodiles, snakes, lizards, toads and many others of the most disgusting of the animal kingdom.

In the vegetable kingdom, trees, plants, flowers and even garlies and onions have by ignorant savages been elevated to be gods.

Rivers and fountains have been special objects of worship. We have only to look to the Ganges and the Nile, to see two streams before which untold millions have prostrated themselves in worship.

The sun, moon and stars have also been worshiped and deified by millions upon millions of the human race.

In this way nearly all the objects in the world, at some time or other, by some nation or other, have been blindly worshiped as gods. It would require all the numerals in our system of notation to give the number of objects that poor, benighted man has been induced to worship, and all this endless variety of gods have required priests.

The name of these priests is "legion." It is not in the power of man to compute the vast number of these leeches, these dead weights, these idle and worse than useless mortals the world has been compelled to support.

They have always been a privileged class, an aristocracy, exacting and expensive. They have never been producers but constant consumers, who have always managed to live upon the toils and labors of others. They have been shrewd enough, too, to secure the fat of the land, to obtain the finest linens, the richest silks, wools and furs which the world has produced. They have always claimed that the gods made known their will to them, and commanded them to convey the same to the ignorant multitudes.

It has not been the aim of priests to impart knowledge to their fellows, to teach them that this world and the entire Universe are governed solely by natural laws. If they have understood this themselves, they have purposely kept the masses in ignorance and subordination. They have pointed to their gods as being the governors and rulers of the world; they have purposely concealed the operation of the simple laws of nature, and have superseded them with the whims and caprices of the gods. They have also claimed to have great influences with these deities, and have pretended to be able, by prayers and sacrifices, by incantations and senseless ceremonies, to appease their anger, to remove their animosity, and to secure their gracious good-will. They have assumed, even, to advise and direct the gods, and to tell them, yes, to command them how to manage their affairs in this world.

For these very disinterested services—for their arduous labors in offering prayers and advice to the gods, and in detailing to the multitudes their will and requirements to them—they have, as we have seen, laid heavy exactions upon the people. They have required the first fruits of their land, the fattest of their flocks and herds, and a large percentage of all other wealth, omitting, in no case, that which has been termed "filthy lucre." [Applause.]

They have also exacted a measure of the worship for themselves, which they have demanded for the gods. They have maintained a power and control over the masses in the name of their deities truly marvelous, and more onerous to the people than the support of kings and standing armies.

From the multiplicity of gods and priests have grown the numberless forms of religion the world has had, and these have been more or less crude, according to the degree of development to which the race had attained. The lower grade of religious belief and worship is called fetichism or animism. We have glanced slightly at this form. Their gods were low, gross and beastly. Their devotees were full of blind ignorance, slavish fears, and abject superstitions. As mankind progressed in the scale of intelligence, these crudest ideas gradually gave way to a belief less offensive to reason.

In following the current of theological ideas and the development of human thought, we meet with an occasional oasis in the great desert of ignorance and superstition—we are pleased to see the prospect is not always dark and dreary. Though at no time can we find a nationality freed from errors, we gladly hail instances where these exist in a diminished degree. The sun-worshippers of Persia, for instance, were far less degraded than those who worshiped fetiches and images; they aspired above the low and groveling.

In the early ages of that country they had neither temples nor altars, and considered it impious to make images of divine beings. They ascended mountains and offered sacrifices, hymns and prayers to the whole expanse of the firmament, and more especially to their deity, which was the sun, the center, the source of light and heat in the solar system. They likewise worshiped the moon, the stars, the air, fire, earth, and water. In short, they may be said to have been worshippers of the Universe.

If worship they must, the objects to which they paid their pious devotions were probably the most suitable ones in nature that they could select. So far, however, as worship is concerned, it could be of no possible benefit to the objects worshiped, nor to themselves. If their devotions had consisted only in due admiration of the great Universe it would have been more commendable, but the sacrificing of animals and the prostration of their bodies upon the earth before their gods, showed they were so far under the same character of superstition that darkened the nations, which preceded them.

Much can be said complimentary of the gods they adored; they were not cruel, sanguinary, nor murderous, like most other gods; they did not incite wars nor bloodshed, and the retinue of priests which attended upon them, dealt far less in abominable absurdities and impositions. The people recognized in the sun the source of life and enjoyment in this world: without its genial, warming rays there could be no vegetable nor animal existence. It seemed a fitting object for their adoration, and their minds were correspondingly elevated.

Worship of the sun was, doubtless, greatly induced by the knowledge of astronomy which the Chaldeans, Egyptians and ancient Persians had acquired. They had watched and closely studied the motions of the planets and heavenly bodies, and had become well versed in many facts appertaining to them. This knowledge of the starry worlds was unquestionably the foundation for much of the theology which subsequent nations adopted, though in this they engrafted upon their system much which was absurd and unwarranted.

In addition to heavenly bodies the Persians had other gods—principally Ormuzd—whom they believed to be the creator of all existences. Compared with the great majority of gods that have ruled the children of men he was mild, amiable and harmless. The inculcations of his priests did not breathe terror, bloodshed, nor damnation. The Persian priests, who were called Magi, were, at first, few in number, and were required to be of good moral character, which condition has, unfortunately, not always since been enjoined. [Applause.] In process of time, the priesthood in that country became numerous and powerful, and laid the same exactions upon the people that they have done in other countries.

While Ormuzd was a good god, they also had an evil god, whom they called Arimanes, and who was their great enemy. In their theology, however, they managed to annihilate this evil god, or devil, which is more than our good friends in this country have yet succeeded in accomplishing. We are happy to announce, however, that the evil god of Christian theology, who has for many centuries been a terror to children of a small and larger growth, is rapidly being curtailed in his domain, and there are thousands of good Christians who will now dare to tell you that they hardly believe there is really such a person as "Old Nick," and they are half disposed to let the fables and legends concerning his Satanic Majesty relapse into forgetfulness, along with the witches, fairies, and gnomes of primitive times. [Applause.]

We are disposed, also, to comment favorably upon the gods of the Hindoos. They were chiefly mild and inoffensive, with the exception of Siva, who was the devil of their theology, and was doubtless the progenitor or pattern of the Persian devil, the Grecian devils, the Jewish devil, the Christian devil, the Mohammedan devil, and many other devils who have these many centuries so sadly frightened the poor be-deviled sons and daughters of humanity. [Applause.]

The Hindoos also believed in great numbers of evil spirits, called Rakshasas, with a prince at their head named Ravana.

Their principal gods were, Brahma, the creator; Vishnu, the preserver; and Siva, the destroyer. This was a trinity, thousands of years older than the trinity of Christian theology, and was undoubtedly the original from which the latter was copied.

Christna was also a god, or rather a demigod, in great favor with the Hindoos. They claimed that he was begotten of a virgin without a natural father, and that he had a small band of disciples who followed him from place to place, whose feet he washed; that he performed miracles, and that he was finally put to death upon the cross by his enemies. This mythology is now positively ascertained to be many hundreds of years older than our Christian system, leaving at least very strong grounds for suspicion that it was the source whence the later mythology was derived. [Applause.]

Much can be said in favor of the mythology of the Hindoos, while, of course, it is also open to criticism. Their gods were not warlike, revengeful, nor malicious. They did not institute bloody and protracted wars, nor did they prove themselves deadly foes to the human race. Their priests, called Brahmins, were full of metaphysics and mysticisms, rites and ceremonies. Although they were peaceful and non-aggressive in point of wars and robbery, they were extremely aristocratic, and great sticklers for caste and class. In this respect they were not friends to the best interests of human kind. They inaugurated inveterate notions of privileges and exclusiveness which the many years since elapsed have not obliterated, and which have done more to retard the real advancement of that country than any other cause.

Justice requires that India be credited as the parent of the literature and the theology of the world. The researches and investigations made within a few years, in the Sanscrit language, which was once spoken in that country, by such close students as Sir William Jones, Max Muller, and Jaccotiot, have found in the ancient records of India the strongest proofs that thence were drawn many or nearly all the favorite dogmas which later theologians have adopted, and of which such great capital has been made.

Want of time will prevent our doing more than mentioning Egypt and its gods, Osiris, Isis, and numerous others; or the Chinese and their god Fot, together with their great teacher, Confucius, who, five hundred years prior to him of Bethlehem, taught morals as pure, lived a life as spotless, and spent years far more in number, in enlightening his fellow-beings. It was Confucius who, so far as we know, first taught the grand sentiment known as "the Golden Rule." Yes, the maxim, "Do not unto others what you would not have others do unto you," is among the grandest ever enunciated, and was equally so, whether spoken by Confucius or Jesus. In matter of priority, however, the former has the advantage of several centuries.

We will next glance at the mythology of the Grecians and Romans. The priests of those countries were noted as god-makers. A thousand years before the dawn of the Christian era, Saturn, Jupiter, Mars, Mercury, Apollo, Pluto, Vulcan, Juno, Minerva, Venus, Ceres and numerous other gods and goddesses flourished on high Olympus in all their glory and majesty. The Grecians were gallant enough to admit goddesses into their category of divinities, and accorded them nearly equal rights with the sterner sex. For this magnanimity, they are entitled to a vote of thanks from every person who ever existed, and in that respect, at least, they stand immensely above that triune affair which was since devised, in which all are males—the female element not recognized at all. [Applause.]

The Grecians were an intellectual people; they brought literature, art and science to a point of perfection far in advance of where they found them. They were at times warlike and aggressive, and, as we said before, their gods were of the same disposition. Jupiter was a noted old warrior, and fond of hurling thunderbolts at the heads of the unfortunate wights who fretted or infuriated him. But he was also, when in good humor, a jovial old fellow, and addicted to pleasure of various kinds. Mars was distinctively a bloody god, and his principal pleasure seemed to consist in wars and carnage.

The sexual intercourse between the gods and goddesses, and between the gods and mortals, is a very noticeable feature of the Grecian mythology, and apparently was carried to excess. The begetting of gods and demigods seems to have been very lively, until Olympus, the residence of the gods and the heaven of the Grecians, was said to be peopled with over thirty thousand gods, little and big, and it may well be imagined they had a very godly time of it, all among themselves. [Sensation.]

This idea of the gods holding sexual intercourse, either among themselves or with mortals, appears to have been a favorite one in nearly all the ancient mythologies. Even the mythology which prevails in our own time has something of the same character, and, as in most other respects, it seems to have been compelled to take the idea second-hand—the cast-off clothing of older systems.

The Grecian gods, like those of other nations, had multitudes of priests, and, as ever they were an immense burden to the producing portion of the populace, and contributed largely to the subsequent demoralization and deterioration of the country.

When Socrates, Pythagoras, Plato and others of the old sages came upon the stage of action, they did not acknowledge the gods that were then in power, nor did they bow the pliant knee to the images which represented them. They were Infidels as really as are those called Infidels now, who also cannot accept as true another phase of mistaken mythology. Those philosophers taught a higher code of ethics, a purer system of morals, and a truer and more exalted object in life. What was the result? Socrates was arrested, tried, condemned to death, and was forced to drink the poison hemlock. But he died bravely and nobly as he had lived, perhaps the highest type of a brave, honest man that ever lived.

Pythagoras, after spending a useful life inculcating the highest morals and most exalted sentiments, was, at the instigation of priests and populace—whose god he could not accept—annoyed, persecuted, and finally put to death.

Plato, after the death of Socrates, felt constrained to leave his native country for a time, lest a similar fate should befall him.

We passed over Buddha and his system of theology, which, in most respects, is the least exceptionable of all the religious systems of the world; being democratic and peaceful in character, presenting a higher code of morals, being less aggressive than any other system, having fewer gods than others, and those so near no gods at all, as to be almost unobjectionable. (This paucity of gods obviated the necessity of hordes of priests.)

Buddhism has had the most extensive following of any religious system that ever existed, and fewer wrongs and crimes against the human race have been committed in its name than in any other important system. It is estimated that at the present day there are 400,000,000 of Buddhists on the earth, while counting all the unbelievers in Christian countries, they number but 200,000,000, and still Christian priests have the assurance to claim it as a mark of divine favor, that their religion has spread so widely over the earth. Unfortunately also for their claims to special favor of heaven, it must be stated that the Mohammedans, though starting six hundred years later, have outstripped them in numbers. It is safe to say that there have lived at least forty believers in Buddhism to one in Christianity.

Happy had it been for the world, if Europe, in place of the criminal theology it adopted, with the mongrel supplement attached to it, called Christianity, had chosen Buddhism as its religion. Many years of bloody warfare would have been saved the world; millions of lives would have been preserved, and rivers of human blood, instead of rushing in unnatural currents, would have been spared to course in the arteries and veins of men and women, until death in old age liberated them from the cares and toils of life.

We must pass over the ancient gods of Scandinavia, Germany, Britain, Gaul and other ancient European countries. Much could be said of them and of the ignorance and gross superstitions connected with them, but time is passing and we must hasten on.

There is an ancient god and an ancient theology to which we must give a passing notice, because the same, by the course of events, has become closely connected with our weal and our woe. We mean Jehovah, the tutelar deity of the Hebrews, and their pitiable theology. We have no desire to shock the sensitive feelings of any person who has a special reverence for this god or this system of theology; for ourselves, we have become so far emancipated from all the faiths of ignorance and error, and have so far withdrawn allegiance from all the gods of superstition that we can speak of this god with the same freedom and unconcern as of any others of the gods we have alluded to.

Our Christian friends can hear the pagan gods spoken of in the most severe and truthful language; they can hear the absurdities and falsities connected with them denounced in the plainest terms without feeling shocked or offended; but when the Jewish god is referred to, except in the most complimentary manner, they raise their hands in holy horror, and wonder in their simplicity why the "presumptuous wretch" who dare think, and say what he thinks, is not crushed into the earth. They have not yet learned that this favorite god of theirs possesses no more power to crush and damn fearless mortals who presume to think, than any of the other gods we have referred to. So we propose to speak of this special god with the same fairness and the same frankness as of any others.

The mere fact of the inhabitants of Europe and America having adopted this particular god makes not the slightest difference with the truth or falsity of his theology—the truth or falsity of the claims it so arrogantly sets up.

As a dispassionate observer, we claim to be able to draw just comparisons between Jehovah, and Brahma, Fot and Ormuzd; or Osiris, Jupiter and Thor, and all the rest of these old magnates, without the slightest favor or partiality.

We can see virtues where virtues are found, And discern vices where vices abound.

How, then, does Jehovah compare with the gods who were known before him? We fear an honest comparison of merits will not redound to his reputation. The characteristics attributed to him by those who claim to be his friends and admirers, are not such as to command the respect and esteem of an honest, unprejudiced jury.

We do not propose to get up a regular indictment against him, nor make out a "bill of particulars," but we cannot ignore the fickleness, cruelty, maliciousness, bloodthirstiness, ferocity, injustice and untruthfulness with which he is charged by those who proclaim themselves as his biographers by appointment extraordinary—the same priestly class we have spoken of.

It will hardly be deemed necessary here to adduce proof of these specifications, but if it is called for, or if these facts are denied, they can easily be substantiated by an abundance of evidence from the book that this same god is said to have written with his own finger, or at least to have dictated.

What are the characteristics of the god under consideration? He styles himself the "god of battles," and he has been emphatically a god of blood. From the earliest accounts of him down to a few centuries, only, ago, we find that he has been inciting one nation against another, and commanding one race to assail and exterminate an unoffending one. How many times men, women and children were cruelly slaughtered by his express commands! Human blood, in thousands of instances, has been made to flow in rivers by his authority, or in keeping with his instructions. He is also said in a fit of anger, and for very trivial provocation, on several occasions to have slain ten, twenty, forty, fifty, and even seventy thousands of the people he professed to regard with special favor. If such a deity is a "god of love and compassion," we say, most decidedly, let us have one of an opposite character.

It is painful to look at this picture, and we care not to dwell upon it. No sane person can deny the correctness of the statements made, if the Bible is to be taken as true.

As cruel, as murderous, and as bloodthirsty as many of the other gods of superstition have shown themselves to be, and as much as they and their religions have done in the past to deluge the world in blood, this Jewish god and his followers have, in this respect, far transcended them all.

It is carefully estimated that in the name of the Christian religion alone, sixty millions of human beings have been made to bite the dust. Enough of the blood of men, women and children has been shed in the name of this religion to float all the navies and all the shipping of the world!

These sixty millions of hapless victims put to death in Christian wars, are exclusive of the great numbers of still more wretched human beings who have been tortured, racked, pulled, thumb-screwed, drawn and quartered, and burned at the stake, both with slow fires and fast fires, by that invention of all that is vile and demoniacal in human nature—"the holy Inquisition"—which, for over five hundred years, was industriously used both by day and by night, as an engine of relentless torture, cruelty and death, upon those who had the temerity to entertain an independent thought, or who dared to dissent from the theological dogmas to which holy (?) priests demanded they should bow.

Human language is inadequate to express with sufficient force the damnable wrongs which, in the name of "holiness," and the "love of God," were, during those five hundred years of more than midnight blackness, poured upon the defenseless heads of thousands of wretched and hopeless men and women.

If there is a God in heaven, whose watchful eye of kindness and love is ever upon his creatures amid all the dangers and vicissitudes of life; if there is a being of benevolence and sympathy who holds this world in the hollow of his hand, who has full cognizance of every act and event that takes place on the globe—if he orders and directs all things, and has power equal to his will, to hold the hand of cruelty here, or stay the arm of oppression there—if this is so, we ask in the name of all that is good, benevolent, high and holy, why did not this kind Providence interfere once in that long five hundred years to suspend, for a short time, even, this infernal reign of terror? What is the benefit of having a beneficent deity, if he never lifts a finger to stay oppression and wrong, and does nothing to succor the helpless and defenseless? The stereotyped reply to inquiries of this kind, that "God's ways are not as man's ways," and that he "takes his own good time to act," utterly fail to meet the case. A being who has the power to protect the defenseless, to relieve the needy and shield the oppressed, and refuses to do so, deserves the execration of every human being.

In addition to the sixty millions which were slain in Christian wars; in addition to the unknown thousands who have, at the secret hour of midnight, and at all other hours, been tortured to death in the Inquisition; in addition to the relentless warfare and persecutions that were persistently visited for hundreds of years upon the peaceful Albigenses, Waldenses, Vaudois, Piedmontese and Huguenots, as well as the unfortunate Moors of Spain; in addition to all these, the endless wars of the Jews, in which for hundreds of years they were almost constantly engaged, and in which most bloody wars, hundreds of thousands, yes, millions, were needlessly put to death—putting all these together, affords some faint conception of the blood and life that have been poured out in the name of Jehovah and the religions instituted in his service.

As warlike as the Mohammedans were, as aggressive as other nations have been, the wars of the Jews and the Christians, which were emphatically the wars of Jehovah, have surpassed them all. They have excelled the crimes of all other gods and their ignorant devotees, and have thrown far into the shade all other crimes of the world.

From this unpleasant retrospect, we are inevitably forced to the conclusion, that in counting up the thousands of the gods of superstition and ignorance, Jehovah of the Jews and the Christians most assuredly cannot be left out; for we have seen that in bloodshed cruelty and crime, he outranks and overtops them all!

If it were possible to make a correct estimate of the cost in life and blood, treasure and happiness, of all the religious wars of the world which have been waged in the name of the gods (especially the god last mentioned), what would be the grand aggregate? No man can tell! But enough of life and strength and treasure have been worse than wasted in this way, to make a paradise of the whole earth; to fill every swamp on the face of the globe; to construct railroads in parallel lines within twenty-five miles each, and crossing at right angles, over each continent of the globe; to endow a school of science on every three miles square of the earth, and an industrial institution in every township of six miles square, where remunerative labor could be provided for all who were otherwise unable to procure it. All this and much more could be accomplished with the life and treasure that have been wickedly wasted in fighting for gods and priests.

Think also of the mental agony, terror and forebodings, the fear of infuriated gods and vindictive devils, which have destroyed the peace and happiness of millions of our race, who have been driven to melancholy, gloom and despair, by the groundless fears which priests have instilled into their superstitious minds, built up on these gods and devils. What a dreary waste of misery and woe to look back upon in the centuries of the past, and to view what the gods, the priests and religion have done for this world! In surveying the field of horror, the beholder is impelled to cry out in anguish: there is no God who rules on high, or all this iniquity would never have been allowed!

Our Christian friends readily admit the enormities of Pagan religions; and in fact all religions but their own, while for it they claim all the divinity, and all the excellence of which the mind can conceive. We deny the truth of this claim. We agree with them that Paganism was wrong; but insist they are equally wrong, for they are themselves perpetuating Pagan dogmas and errors. We have seen that the idea of Jesus being a person who had God for a father and a little Jew girl for a mother, was not an original one, it was borrowed from the heathen who taught it from five hundred to twelve hundred years before the advent of the Nazarene carpenter. The story of his life and adventures presents the same marks of being copied from old legends. The tale of a crucifixion of a savior is by no means original with Christians. MR. KERSEY GRAVES, in an elaborate work, recently published in Boston, proves conclusively from history, that no less than sixteen saviors were said to have been put to death on the cross, and all hundreds of years prior to the time when the legend was attached to the story of Jesus. We will append the names of these saviors, and the dates of their crucifixion:

I. CHRISTNA, of India,	1200 years, B.C.
II. SAKIA, " "	600 " "
III. THAMMUZ, of Syria,	800 " "
IV. WITROBA, of the Telingonese,	550 " "
V. IAO, of Nepaul,	620 " "
VI. HESUS, of the Celtic Druids,	834 " "
VII. QUEXALCOTE, of Mexico,,	327 " "
VIII. QUIRINUS, of Rome,	406 " "
IX. PROMETHEUS, of Greece,	547 " "
X. THULIS, of Egypt,	1700 " "
XI. INDRA, of Thibet,	725 " "
XII. ALCESTON, of Greece,	600 " "
XIII. ATYS, of Phrygia,	600 " "
XIV. CRITE, of CHALDEA,	1200 " "
XV. BALI, of Orrisa,	725 " "
XVI. MITHERA, of Persia,	1200 " "

In addition to these, DEVATAT, of Siam, IXTON, of Rome, APOLONIUS, of Tyana in Cappadocia, are all reported in history as having died the death of the cross.

Thus we see in many nations, and long before the Christian Era, the belief in a crucified Savior had an existence. Then is it not easy to see whence the idea was derived?

It is singular how little of the Christian theology was original with those who founded it, and that their minds were not fertile enough to invent some new idea!

The Trinity we have shown was of heathen origin.

The Holy-Ghost-idea came from India.

The belief in a Devil, first existed in heathen lands.

Crucifixion we have just seen was borrowed from Pagans.

The cross as a symbol was used hundreds of years before Christianity, in India, Egypt, Thibet and other countries.

The personalized idea of "the word" or Logos, the creator of the world, as made use of by St. John, was borrowed from the East.

The confession and absolution of sin were of heathen origin.

Baptism by water originated in India and Persia.

The sacrament called the Eucharist, was derived from the Pagans.

Anointing with oil was practiced in Pagan countries from time immemorial.

The worship of the Son of God came from the heathen.

A virgin for the mother of God, was first recognized by Pagans.

Monasteries and monks existed in Central Asia hundreds of years before the dawn of Christianity.

The doctrine of miracles came from the Pagans.

The belief in devils is much older than Christianity.

Immortality of the soul was taught by Heathen philosophers long before the time of Jesus.

In short, if we take from Christianity all that was borrowed from Pagan nations and heathen religions, there is literally nothing left of it save its persecutions, wars and bloodshed, which they did not borrow and were able to originate themselves.

Now if these things are so, where is the good of our shutting our eyes to the facts? The clergy of our land and the most of their adherents, claim great virtue for simply believing their mythological rubbish, and that without question or cavil. This is wrong: if their claims are unfounded, they should not be believed. If their system is made up of borrowed legends it is time the world knew it.

Christians, we repeat, readily condemn all gods but their own. We can see no more reason in believing in their gods than in the balance of the gods of superstition. We set them down in one class, and count them all a "bad lot."

The belief in these gods, and that they have revealed their will to a few favored individuals, who are commissioned to convey these godly secrets to the ignorant multitudes, who on pain of hell and damnation are compelled to receive them, has been of incalculable injury to the world. It was the origin of priestcraft and the multifarious creeds which have been such a curse to mankind. It is quite time the world outgrew all this. It is time the race discarded all the gods of superstition, the belief in all the old systems and fables that have blinded and misled the world for forty centuries.

Some of the old fallacies may have answered for unprogressed minds in olden times, but now we require something better. Belief in the salvation of the race by blood, whether of rams, bullocks, or he-goats or even of the son of a god, may have served a purpose in certain eras of the world, but we of to-day require something higher. We no longer can be benefited by a senseless belief in myths, superstitions and blind conjectures; we demand truth, science, and positive knowledge. These are the great needs of the world at this hour.

We must no longer look to bleeding gods and crucified saviors for aid. We need to understand the laws of the Universe, and of our being. We must be our own saviors. We must develop and increase our intelligence, and throw away absurd creeds which darken the mind.

We shall find far more benefit in increasing our knowledge of all that has a real existence than in religion and its countless fallacies. Science and practical education are of more importance to the world even than moral ethics. There has been little or no advance made in morals for thousands of years. In India, and Persia, and China, morals as pure, were taught four thousand years ago as the world has today.

The highest morality we can exercise is honestly to do our duty to our fellow beings, and to ourselves. It is not in our power to benefit, or harm, any god, and we have no moral duty in that direction. We can do much in helping or injuring our fellow men, and equally we can do good or ill to ourselves. And herein lie our duty and our moral obligations. The attainment of positive and scientific knowledge will assist in discharging the duties of life, and in conferring good upon our brothers and sisters of humanity. Here is indicated the path we should pursue—to reverence the Universe and its laws; to respect science and its teachers, and to bid farewell forever to priests and the gods they have invented.

"But how about God? If you discard the gods of superstition and include Jehovah in the number, what God have we left?"

WE HAVE THE GOD OF THE UNIVERSE.

"Define what we are to understand by the God of the Universe. Is he a person or being?"

Not at all. A being or person can only occupy a certain location at a time. He cannot be every-where at the same time. The deity which pervades the Universe, extending forever and forever, without limit or bound, is as much in the most distant world which the telescope has brought to our view—and millions of times further away—as on this small sphere. THE GOD OF THE UNIVERSE FILLS IMMENSITY!

It is amusing, so to speak, to observe the various and absurd ideas which different persons entertain respecting God. Many imagine him much as the old German painters represented him—a grave-looking old man with grey beard and hair, with a stern countenance, seated upon a throne, dispensing blessings or curses, according to the mood he may chance to be in. They invest him with all the bodily organs that we have, the same impulses, passions, and emotions. They believed him liable to anger, pleasure, sorrow, love and hatred, the same as themselves.

Although they locate him on his throne, or assign him to a single point somewhere in the sky, they affect to believe his vision extends not only to every part of this globe, but to the countless other worlds that float in space. Just how they are able to believe a person can be in thousands of worlds, trillions of miles apart, we cannot comprehend. Probably it is done with the same facility, and by the same process, with which they can believe that the one god is composed of three distinct persons, father, son and ghost, all of the same age and sex, the one being three and the three one. How they can manage this labyrinth of difficulty is, to us, an enigma worse than a Chinese puzzle.

This class of believers probably can easily give their assent to the description of deity found in the Bible—that "smoke came out of his nostrils, and fire out of his mouth so that coals were kindled by it"; that "he dwelleth in temples not made with hands"; that "he rides upon horses"; that "he had horns coming out of his hands"; that "he roareth from on high"; that "he laughs in scorn"; that "he cried and roared"; that "he awakened like a man drunken with wine"; that "the Lord is a man of war"; that "in his anger he persecuted and slew without mercy"; that "his fury is poured out like fire, and that the rocks are thrown down by him"; that "his arrows shall be drunken with blood"; that "he became angry and swore"; that "he is angry with the wicked every day"; that "the fire of his anger shall burn to the lowest hell"; that "he burns with anger, his lips are full of indignation, and his tongue as a devouring fire."

This is a Bible-picture of Jehovah; let those admire it who can. We confess that, to our taste, it is not altogether lovely.

There are other persons, who, while they deprive God of a body, organs of sight, etc., still believe him a being omnipresent and omniscient; that he is present in all other worlds the same as in this, but still that he has a mind, will or purpose, and that he cogitates, plans, designs. They think he attends personally to the movements of the spheres; that he guides the earth in its yearly circuit round the sun; that he causes it to revolve on its own axis; that he sends storm and tempest; that he attends to the entire animal and vegetable kingdoms, and to all other movements and operations in the Universe.

There is another class who look upon God as the totality of the unseen powers and forces which permeate the Universe; the source of all life and motion, possessing no local habitation; having no organs, and consequently no thoughts and no intelligence.

To our mind this latter view is the most rational. We cannot conceive of a personality filling immensity. We cannot conceive of a deity, who manipulates the Universe and is extraneous to it. The Universe embraces all that exists, including all the forms of Matter and the powers and forces that pertain to it. It is self-existent and eternal, IT NEVER HAD A BEGINNING AND NEVER CAN HAVE AN END. It is equally impossible to reduce a particle of Matter in any form to non-existence, or to bring from non-existence a particle of Matter. The Universe is composed of particles or atoms. It could not have been made, it cannot be unmade. It may change forms continually; but it cannot go out of existence, as it never came into existence.

It is the opinion of learned philosophers, that the earth and the entire solar system once evolved from a nebulous condition, so highly attenuated that some cubic miles were required to constitute a grain of solid Matter. That through interminable ages, by gradual condensations and aggregations, spheres and suns and planets were formed and developed, until in the lapse of time the present state was reached, to remain, perhaps, through innumerable epochs, and then to relapse again into the nebulous condition. The Universe may have gone through this and similar processes an infinite number of times, and this may be forever repeated; but no beginning can be conceived of, a time when there was nothing and when the entire cosmos was produced from non-entity. It seems much easier to comprehend that the Universe always existed and always must exist, than to imagine it all came from nothing and must again return to nothing.

To say that a fly created the eagle which soars highest in the azure blue, that a mouse was the maker of the elephant, the largest beast that roams the Asiatic forests, or that a minnow designed the whale, the leviathan of the great deep, is quite as true, quite as sensible as to assert that Jehovah the fickle and malicious tutelar god of the Jews—who confessed on a certain occasion that "he could not drive out the inhabitants of the valley, because they had chariots of iron;" that this god of limited power who ruled one small nation, fashioned, designed and created from absolute nothing the vast, boundless Universe, filling immensity; whose height, depth, length and breadth is without beginning or end; upon whose waves of ether, float and roll millions and trillions of suns, systems and constellations of worlds, so numerous and vast, that all the numerals in existence could not express them; which for countless ages have rolled on in their trackless course through the ocean of space shedding their clear, persistent light for incomputable periods down the never ending vistas of immensity;—to say this was all made only six thousand years ago by a being of only limited powers and knowledge—how preposterous, indeed! When will the sons of men drop such idle vagaries? When will they gain more exalted views of the boundless Universe of which our earth and our solar system are but infinitesimal parts?

The idea of a creation and a creator, is an outgrowth of the ignorance and superstition of which we have spoken. In the infancy of the race, man's mind was not developed and intelligent enough to comprehend that the Universe could as easily be eternal as God, and that it needed a creator no more than God needed one. With their circumscribed views they supposed everything they saw in existence required a maker; but they seemed not to think that a God, so powerful as to make a Universe from nothing, also required a creator. By parity of reasoning it would appear, if the Universe needed a creator, God also would need one.

As scientific investigation has advanced in the world, as it has been found the Universe is governed by laws; as men have learned the heavenly bodies move in harmony with those laws; since they have found that the recurrence of eclipses can be calculated and foretold to a minute; that the earth revolves on its axis and in its course round the sun in obedience to the same unvarying laws; that summer and winter regularly succeed each other without supervision; that storms and tornadoes, earthquakes and volcanoes are not the spasmodic actions of an angry God, but the direct product of natural causes; that the tides of the ocean ebb and flow without extraneous assistance; that rains and sunshine, winds and calm, are not controlled by any being; that vegetable and animal life is produced and governed by laws; that health and disease depend solely upon causes and conditions; and in short that every operation in the Universe is regulated by universal laws, which are as eternal as the Universe itself—as this is understood and it is comprehended, that the Universe is self-existent and required no maker, it is perceived THERE IS NO NECESSITY FOR A GOD, AND THAT THERE IS NOTHING FOR A GOD TO DO. Everything and every part of the Universe, moves with more precision than the most perfect machine man ever made, and no being is needed to superintend it.

It surely requires no God to make twice two to be four, nor to keep it so. Twice two ever did make four, and ever will. This is a simple proposition it is true; but everything in Nature is equally simple, if equally well understood; and it illustrates all other propositions, laws and conditions which make up the laws of the Universe. They require no urging; they require no checking; they require no supervision.

Many think this view is an impious one, and that it detracts from the honor of the Deity. This is not the case; the real impiety consists in denying to the glorious Universe the credit it is entitled to. It is immensely more perfect, more immutable, more competent to run, itself than any or all the gods of superstition combined.

The world has so long been schooled in the old theory that a god is necessary, back or behind, above or below the material world, to make it in the first place, and to keep it in the traces afterwards, that it is most difficult for men to divest themselves of the error. They cling to this god-idea as a great necessity, even when they become convinced that a god is not needed to conduct any of the endless operations of Nature. Although they are unable to point to a single place in the vast Universe where a god for a moment is required; although they cannot name a single piece of workmanship that God ever performed; they think nevertheless, we must have a god to hold on to, and to trust to in case the "breaching breaks," to prevent things from going to "eternal smash." [Applause.]

Some designate God "the soul of the world;" "the spirit of the Universe;" or "the ghost of all existences;" and assign an undefinable existence to him difficult to describe; but this soul, spirit or ghost, cannot possibly have an organization or location, and though it can hardly be supposed to have thought or intelligence, they still cling to the idea and must have some substitute for the old gods of superstition which have been palmed upon the world from the early ages of ignorance. But, little by little, this relic of antiquity is forced to give back, and take its departure from progressed minds, along with the belief in devils, sprites, witches and fairies. The Universe needs no soul, it requires no spirit, it has no want of a ghost; equally it needs no god. Indeed it were better to drop the use of all these appellations, in connection with the Universe. It is in itself all in all, and the use of these other terms tends to mislead the mind. The name God is fitted only to the superstitions of the past and is applicable to no portion of the Universe. Let men learn, then, to drop the use of the word. UNIVERSE is vastly better.

All the subtle powers and forces of Nature which exist, whether attraction, repulsion, gravitation, affinity, light, heat, electricity or magnetism—these and all others of the forces of Nature, whether known or unknown, are in the Universe and a part of it, as much as the crudest form of Matter. They permeate the Universe through and through, and cannot be separated from it.

It was the great mistake of the earlier philosophers—we mean Kepler, Galileo, Newton and others of their times, that Matter in its native state is dead. The doctrine of "inertia" which was espoused for several centuries, and is not yet obsolete, is a huge fallacy. Every atom of Matter in existence is charged with life, force and motion, and it is not within the range of possibility to divest it of these inherent qualities. There can be no such thing as dead Matter; there is no inertia.

The idea is entertained by many that there must be a grand central INTELLIGENCE in Nature, which is the fountain and source whence all human intelligence is drawn. We know, as we said on a former occasion, of no intelligence nor mind where there is no organization to produce it, any more than we know of sight without the optic nerves and organs of vision, or of hearing without the tympanum and organs of the ear, or of muscular strength without the muscles and connecting apparatus to produce it. Intellect, thought, or mind, is not a promiscuous substance floating through space; it is not a primitive element, a separate entity, independent of the forces and material of the Universe, but is, as we said, the result of organization—an outgrowth of matter—a motion, so to speak, of an organ and its connected nervous system.

We find intellect existing in all grades and degrees from the lowest to the highest form, and in all varieties as regards quality and quantity, but nowhere without a suitable organization to give it existence. In the vegetable kingdom we perceive the lowest indications of intellect, though that there is not a measure of it in simple substances when brought into contact, as in the cases of acids and alkalies, metals and oxygen, hydrogen and oxygen, and an infinite number similar chemical combinations, we will not pretend to say. That there is intelligence in the vegetable kingdom cannot be doubted. It is indicated in the general reaching towards light, as with the potato sprout in a dark cellar in the Spring of the year. If a little sunlight steals through a hole or crevice, how the delicate shoot reaches towards it! How constantly many flowers keep their faces towards the sun. Who has not witnessed the tendrils of a vine reaching for a limb or cord, or something to cling to and support the growing plant? If there is a support within reach it will find it. This appears to be a low order of intelligence, but commensurate with the conditions calling it forth.

In the animal kingdom we find varying degrees of intelligence, but always in keeping with organs and conditions. An oyster has some intelligence, a fly more, an ant more, a honey-bee more, a hog still more, a dog still more, a horse still more, an elephant more still, and man more than all. He is truly said to be an epitome of all animal existences below him, and the highest expression of divinity in the Universe. In these and numerous other gradations of intellect, or mind, the difference arises from the varied organizations, from the quantity and quality of brain and the character of the nervous system, a part of the connecting apparatus for producing and conveying thought and sensation.

In man great diversity of intellect exists. If each individuality is a spark from a great central intellect, it would hardly be so; but when we realize the interminable differences in organizations, conditions, quality and quantity of brain, together with the ever-varying character of nervous systems, the reason for the great variety of intellects can be partially understood.

The production of intellect depends on several conditions. In the first place a healthy body is most essential. A good brain, a good nervous system, a good stomach, a good digestive apparatus, circulation of good blood are all indispensable in the production of mind. Proper food, pure air and pure water are of the highest importance in this intricate process, and without them mind cannot exist. As the fuel and water are to the engine; as hay and oats are to the muscular strength of the horse, so is meat, bread and potatoes to the intellect of man. The combustion of the fuel converts the water into steam, whose confined force acting upon the piston causes the engine to move rapidly, and convey with it hundred of tons in weight. The digestion of the hay and oats imparts to the horse muscular strength sufficient to move bodies ten times his own weight, and what also of intellect he possesses. So the meat, bread and potatoes which man eats and assimilates impart to him the powers and forces he possesses, including the intellect or mind. Deprive the engine of fuel, and it must stop; deny the horse his hay and oats, and he cannot haul heavy loads, he must stop; deprive man of his necessary food and he soon becomes exhausted. Starve him and he has no muscular strength and equally no mind; before the spark of life flickers out his mind is gone, he is an idiot or a maniac; he has no intellect. It is well known the labors of the mind are as exhaustive as physical labor, and equally necessitate material food and repose.

Thus we see food produces mind in the same way it produces muscular strength, and that one is the product of matter and organization as really as the other, and that we must look for the best intellect where we find the best organizations and the best conditions.

The views here advanced upon the Deity and the mind, essentially materialistic, or Universe-alistic, as they are, do not militate against the belief in a future existence in spirit life. That belief is based on the theory that, in the economy of nature, while we are developing our physical bodies in this earthly stage of existence, we are also perfecting another finer body or counterpart, of rare and subtle forms of matter, comprising all the organs and parts our cruder organizations do, and that at the dissolution of this coarser, rudimentary body, the finer organization is liberated, and commences its independent existence, but is really composed of matter, and pertains and belongs to the Universe just as much as our coarser bodies do.

Our Spiritualistic friends believe our former companions who have departed from our sight are able to return to us, to see us and hold communication with us, by means of natural laws and forces.

Thousands of persons, and among them some of the most brilliant minds of the age, have been paying great attention to this subject, and have become fully satisfied that all human beings have a continued, conscious, individual existence. Men of Science have devoted years of patient, earnest investigation to this subject, and feel as thoroughly convinced that we have a spiritual existence as that we have a physical.

Our own personal opportunities of investigation in this direction, have not been extensive; but we are free to admit that we have received proofs of an intelligence disconnected with physical bodies, which we cannot ignore; and until some more rational theory, explaining this class of phenomena is advanced, we are compelled to be believe in a continued existence after death. The concurrent testimony of numerous personal friends of intelligence and honesty, of the proofs they have received of a similar character, commands our candid consideration, and we feel no disposition to pooch-pooch it away. On the other hand we hope it is true, and are glad if it is. The belief is a happy one, and greatly enlarges our estimate of the grandeur of the glorious Universe, of which we are all infinitesimal parts.

We by no means accept all the claims set forth by those styling themselves spiritual mediums. A large proportion—perhaps nineteen twentieths of them—are charlatans and frauds, wholly unworthy our confidence; but that among all this chaff there are many grains of the real wheat we fully believe.

Spiritualism is justly entitled to the credit of demonstrating to mankind, that they have a dual or continued existence after this rudimentary life, as well as for great aid rendered in demolishing the errors of superstition; and despite all the shams and deceptions that have been connected with it, we must concede it great merit for what it has accomplished.

We would not discourage those from investigating the proofs of a future life and the various forms of spirit-phenomena, who feel an inclination to do so; but we believe a great waste of time, labor and treasure has been and is being made in that direction. Our motto is, ONE WORLD AT A TIME. While we are in this state of existence, our duties are here. There is ample scope and need here, for all our efforts; all our talents and all our aspirations. This is a good sort of world, but it is not near what it ought to be, or may be. Ignorance and superstition have so retarded the progress of the human race, that much needs to be done before it can reach the point of perfection and happiness possible for it. So let us not spend our time in running after mediums and pretenders; let us not strain our eyes in vainly trying to see and learn all about the future life. Let us occupy all our strength and attention with this life, doing all the good we can to ourselves and those around us, and leave the mysteries of the other world till our duties in this are accomplished.

If it is demonstrated to a certainty that spirits exist in spirit land, it does not follow we should look to them for instruction or advice in the performance of our duties here. OUR REASON IS THE HIGHEST GUIDE and the highest authority we can possibly have, and it is wrong to supercede it by looking to invisible spirits for counsel and aid. Let us then, cultivate our reason; let us develop it to the highest extent possible, by scientific studies and investigations, and not resign our own judgment and individuality in preference to any person here or else where.

A belief in a continued existence does not imply a belief in immortality. Immortality means an endless existence. That ours had one end—a beginning—is pretty clear. That it extends no farther back than the time we were begotten, is most reasonable. That our mentality partakes of the characteristics of our

A NEW BOOK. THE Doctrine of Descent AND DARWINISM.

By PROF. OSCAR SCHMIDT, of the University of Strasburgh.

This is No. 13 of Appleton's International Scientific Series, and is not excelled by any one of its fellows, and is richly worthy the perusal of every enquiring mind. It is a work of 334 pages, 12 mo., and contains twenty-six illustrations. It is an elaborate review and survey of the whole subject of Evolution and Darwin's special philosophy, giving in clear language a comprehensive view of the subject.

It is eminently a whole library in one volume, and we recommend it in the highest terms. Sent by mail. Price, $1.50; postage, 15 cts. Address,

THE Boston Investigator!

THE OLDEST REFORM JOURNAL
IN THE UNITED STATES

Will commence its 45th year April 18, 1875
PUBLISHED EVERY WEDNESDAY
at 84 Washington street, Boston, Mass., by JOSIAH P. MENDUM.

HORACE SEAVER, Editor.

PRICE: $3.50 per annum. Single copies, 7 cents. Specimen copies sent on receipt of a Two-Cent Stamp to pay the postage.

The Investigator is devoted to the Liberal cause in religion; or, in other words, to Universal Mental Liberty. Independent in all its discussions, discarding superstitious theories of what never can be known it devotes its columns to things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who have entered its unknown shores. Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interest of this world, it confines itself to things of this life entirely. It will soon commence its FORTY-FIFTH year and asks for support from those who are fond of sound reasoning, good reading, reliable news, anecdotes, science, art, and a useful Family Journal. Reader, please send your subscriptions for six months or one year; and if you are not satisfied with the way the Investigator is conducted, we won't ask you to continue with us any longer. Now is the time to subscribe.

THE CLOCK STRUCK ONE

AND

CHRISTIAN SPIRITUALIST

EMBELLISHED WITH A FINE STEEL PORTRAIT OF THE AUTHOR.
THE REV. SAMUEL WATSON,

Of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Being a synopsis of the investigations of spirit intercourse by an Episcopal Bishop, three ministers, five doctors and others at Memphis, Tenn., in 1855; also, the opinion of many eminent divines, living and dead, on the subject, and communications received from a number of persons recently.

"TRUTH IS MIGHTY AND WILL PREVAIL."

The "CLOCK STRUCK ONE" is an intensely interesting work in itself, and derives great additional interest from the high standing of its author in the Methodist Episcopal Church in which he has been a bright and shining light for a quarter of a century. A man who is personally known to nearly all the clergy of the South and to a wide circle in the North and wherever known is held in the highest esteem. These circumstances cause the book to be eagerly sought for. This anxiety is heightened by the action of the Methodist Conference of which the author is a member in disciplining him for publishing the book, thus attracting the attention of thousands of all sects who are anxious to read and judge for themselves the "Clock Struck One."

JESUS OF NAZARETH,

OR A TRUE HISTORY OF THE MAN CALLED JESUS CHRIST

EMBRACING

His parentage, his youth, his original doctrines and works, his career as a public teacher and physician of the people. Also, the nature of the great conspiracy against him; with all the incidents of his tragical death, given on spiritual authority, from spirits who were contemporary mortals with Jesus while on the earth.

By PAUL and JUDAS, through ALEXANDER SMYTH, Medium, of Philadelphia, by the spirits taking possession of him about one hour in every twenty-four, usurping all his powers, giving a continued series of well connected scenes, presenting scenery, characters and personages, dialogues and actions in their regular order and succession, embracing all the most important personages and the incidents which occurred during the sojourn of Jesus upon earth. There was probably no book ever written in which such perfect life-pictures occur; every city and country village, every river, brook and mountain, and scenery in general, is so vividly portrayed that an actual journey through the country could hardly be more interesting. The characters in this unexampled drama are so faithfully portrayed that, as you are introduced to each in turn, you seem well acquainted and delighted with your company, and the many points of interest you are called to visit. The book is replete with interest from beginning to end and had already passed through several editions when the plates were entirely destroyed in the great fire, since then we have had a very great demand for the work from our subscribers and the trade. The edition about to be issued will be far superior in mechanical appearance to any of its predecessors, and we shall print a large edition to enable us to supply standing orders and all new demands. 12mo., 356 pages, cloth bound.

CIRCULATE TRUTHFUL DOCUMENTS! PASS AROUND THE TRUTH SEEKER TRACTS and other Liberal publications to do missionary work and to help in opening THE EYES OF THE BLIND!

THE TRUTH SEEKER TRACTS

are furnished at prices very low, so that Societies and generous individuals can buy them for gratuitous distribution.

LARGE DISCOUNTS

to those who purchase by the quantity. Probably a few dollars can be expended in spreading TRUTH and LIGHT in no way so effectually as in dispensing broadcast.

THE TRUTH SEEKER TRACTS.

Let Liberals exercise liberality enough to give away thousands and tens of thousands of these tracts. They are well designed to do missionary work and in spreading the glad tidings of truth. If a proper enthusiasm is enkindled in the breasts of the lovers of Free Thought and Mental Liberty, much good can be accomplished. Prices range from one cent to ten. From one to one hundred may be ordered of any of the various numbers, and a heavy discount made to those who buy by the quantity.

Friends, invest $5 or $10 in this way, and see how much good it will do. We certainly ought to be as zealous in promulgating truths as our adversaries are in disseminating error.

THE WORD,

A Monthly Journal of Reform.

E. H. HEYWOOD, Editor.

Regarding the subjection of Labor, of Woman, and the prevalence of War as unnatural evils, induced by false claims to obedience and service; favors the Abolition of the State, of property in land and its kindred resources, of speculative income and all other means whereby intrusion acquires wealth and power at the expense of useful people. Since labor is the source of wealth, and creates all values equitable vendible, the Word (not by restrictive methods, but through liberation and reciprocity) seeks the extinction of interest, rent, dividends and profit, except as they represent the work done: the abolition of railway, telegraphic, banking, trades union and other corporations charging more than actual cost for values furnished, and the repudiation of all so-called debts, the principal whereof has been paid in the form of interest.

Terms 75c. annually. Address The Word, Princeton, Mass.

MONEY:

Its Relation to Property and Usury.

The disastrous effects of Financial Panics, and the imperative needs of Productive Enterprise, should induce all classes of people to carefully study the money question, with which underlie it. Both "contractionists" and "expansionists" are mistaken in their methods to secure honest money: for Justice demands the extinction of Monopoly and the entire abolition of Usury. In order to help business to what it should unconditionally claim, Free Currency; and that the ominous feud between Labor and Capital may be settled on the sure basis of Equity, we have published the following works:

THE LAWS OF VALUE

Yours or Mine:

An essay to show the true basis of Property, and the causes of its inequitable distribution. Twenty-fifth thousand. By E. H. Heywood. Price, postpaid, 15 cts.

Mutual Banking:

Showing the Radical Deficiency of existing circulating mediums, and how interest on money can be abolished by free competition. Sixth thousand. By Wm. B. Greene. Price, postpaid, 25 cts.

Hard Cash:

An essay to show that Financial Monopolies hinder Enterprise, and defraud both Labor and Capital: that Panics and Business reversions will be effectually prevented only through Free Money. By E. H. Heywood. Tenth thousand. Price, postpaid, 15 cts.

parents and ancestors, as fully as our bodies do, cannot be successively denied. The peculiar traits and mental similarities running in nations, tribes and families can have no other explanation. The theory of re-incarnation, or the eternal existence of mortals, as individuals, in the past and in the future, therefore appears untenable. Human beings have their beginning as individualities, when they are begotten, precisely as with the lower orders of animal life, and vegetable life also. Having then, settled the fact that we had one end—a beginning—we are forced to the logical conclusion, that at some time in the future we must come to the other—the close of individual existence. We cannot conceive of anything in the Universe having a beginning, but what must also have an end. How far in the future the close of our individual existence may be, cannot be known, but we trust it may be thousands of years.

As we remarked, it is our present existence that demands our immediate and undivided attention. The needs of the race are great and urgent. Much has been done in the acquirement of scientific knowledge; but far more remains to be accomplished. Science is yet in its infancy. In Physiology, Hygiene, Psychology, Sociology, in short all the studies which make up the science of life, as well as in all the sciences not here named, the world has yet a great deal to learn. It is not enough that we have a few learned professors who understand these subjects, the masses must also understand them. If not all professors, we should be learned men and women in all that pertains to life, health, longevity and the best good of the race. Every man and woman should feel that they have a mission to perform—that it is within their power to make this world better for their having lived in it, and they should not be satisfied with doing anything short of their whole duty.

IGNORANCE IS THE PRIME EVIL—THE GREAT DEVIL OF THE WORLD; AND KNOWLEDGE—SCIENCE, IS THE TRUE SAVIOR.

The more we drive the former from the earth; the more we study and encourage the latter, the better and happier will be our lives. In this labor we shall duly revere the true God of the Universe, and forever discard from our minds all belief in the gods of superstition. [Prolonged applause.]

A spirited discussion followed the lecture, but want of room precludes our laying it before our readers in this issue.

Odd and Ends.

A DARKEY'S STORY.—"Goodevenin', boss; is you de head man up heah?" said a coal black coatless mau and brother to one of the attaches of the Courier Journal. He stood on one leg in the doorway just as the reporters were settling down to the night's work, and he smiled familiarly upon the crowd of young men in the room.

"I am not the head boss," replied the particular one addressed; "but you'll find a man in the little room to the left who will attend to your business."

"Much obleeged to you, sar," and the dark shade hobbled toward the room indicated. He was lame of a leg, but he looked like he could whip many a bigger man, nevertheless. He had a big quid in his mouth, which he shifted from one side to the other as he halted again in the second doorway.

"Is you de head boss?" he repeated to the person sitting at the desk within.

"No; but what do you want?"

"Ise after de head boss, sah."

It was at a moment when two or three hours of hard work made a little relaxation agreeable to the young man addressed, who replied that while not the head boss, yet he might be depended on to render any service to his visitor. "What can I do for you?" he said.

"Well, boss, Ise got some pō'try heah dat I jectured you might put in yer paper," at the same time extending a roll of manuscript, wrapt in a suspiciously greasy piece of paper.

"Poetry!" and the newspaper man wheeled around. "What's your name?"

"Sam, sah."

"Where do you work?"

"At de terbaccer warehouse, sah. I coopers de barrels."

"And you have found time during the absorbing duties of your humble but honorable occupation to write poetry?"

"Well, not d'zackly, boss; you see I found dat paper, and some o' de gen'lemen down at de house said it was love pō'try, and tole me to bring it up heah."

"Sam, are you in love?"

Sam sat down, turned his quid and settled himself for a talk. Meanwhile the boys began to gather from the other room. Sam addressed each one of them familiarly, and then smiled on the questioner.

"Not now, sah; I was once in dat very fix, sah, but Ise quit dat now."

"What could have thus driven the tender sentiment from your heart, Sam?"

"Well, sah, you see, when I was a boy down in Green county, I belonged to Henry Smith yer didn't know him, did yer, boss? No, I didn't spect you knowed him, 'cause that's some time ago. Well, as I tole you, I was a boy, like 'bout seventeen, and I loved a gal named Susan, and she had a brother, and he didn't like me."

"That was unfortunate for you, but it only proves that true love never does run smooth."

"Dar wasn't nothin' about it to run, sah, but blood," returned the dark man and brother.

"Blood in a love match, Sam? You surprise me. How was it?"

"I killed dat nigger, sah."

"The devil you did. What for?"

"I juss killed him, boss, else he'd killed me."

Sam spit on the floor, gave his tobacco another turn, and quietly gazed on the ceiling as his audience stopped to take breath.

"Killed your sweetheart's brother, Sam?" after a while said the managing man; "wasn't that a curious way of conducting a courtship?"

"Sah?"

"Wasn't that rather a strange way to get a wife?"

"May look dat way to you, boss, but I felt called on to do somethin' to dat nigger very sudden, and I done it. You see I was a cour in' like, and I was settin' down by her on a log out in de yard wid my arm restin' round her waist sorter lovin' like, as de white folks do, when dat nigger cum out dar, and begin to cuss and 'rar round and skeering Susan, which I thought I orter take keer of her, bein' as I was sorter protectin' her like, when he cum out."

"That was commendable in you and highly reprehensible in the brother."

"Sah?"

"You were right, Sam, and the brother was wrong."

"Oh, yas, sir, dat's what you mean. Well, he kep' on a swearin' and cuttin' up around dar, and Susan she got pale and shaky like, and I got mad den, and tole dat nigger to go long way from dar and let me lone, else I gwine to injure him. Den he cussed and tore, and pulled out a big butcher knife and started to me, and said he gwine to give my insides some air."

"Did you retreat, Sam, in the very presence of your adorable?"

"Who's dat?"

"Why Susan, your sweetheart; did you run away and thus depreciate your standing for courage in her eyes?"

"Oh, yes, now I know what you mean. Run away? Boss, I wish you'd a been dar."

"Why so, Sam?"

"Well, sah, dat nigger cum at me wid dat knife, and I know dat my time was come if I didn't do somethin', powerful quick, so I jest drap my han' down in de pocket of my coat, and dat nigger stopped right whar he was."

"I suppose he had some apprehensions that you meant to draw a weapon?"

"Weepin'! Dar wasn't no use to draw no weepin', for dat nigger was dead as if lightnin' had struck him. When I drapped my han' down in dat pocket it fell right on a pistol, and de pistol 'sploded, and dar wasn't no more tarin, round dun by dat young nigger."

"You astound me. Can it be possible that you thus forever destroyed all hope of your future felicity in the society of your beloved by thus ruthlessly slaying her brother?"

"What did you say, boss?"

"You certainly were not rash enough to become the murderer of your sweetheart's brother and your own hopes at one moment?"

"Well, boss, if you'd seen dis nigger lay in jail for nigh on to a year, and comin' mity nigh bein' hung, and if it hadn't been for ole Marster I would, den you'd a thought some one had been killed."

"You escaped punishment for your crime then, Sam?"

"Yes, sah; ole Massa stood by me like a mity good friend, and after de lawyers palavered over me for a whole day, de jury sot me free."

"Did you go back to your sweetheart then?"

"No, sah, I hain't seen dat gal from dat day to dis, and some how or oder I was taught a lesson by dat thing, and I don't want nothing at all about marryin' any of dem, and course I has fun wid de gals like ebry body else, sah, but you see dat's different from bein' married to 'em, and I hain't had no 'tention of marryin' sence den. Gwine to put dat pō'try in de paper for me, dough, ain't you now, boss, bein' as I done tole you all 'bout killin' dat 'fernal nigger?"

"I am sorry that I cannot publish it, but the same poem came to me last week, and I threw it into the waste-paper basket."

"Yas? but can't you put it in for me, boss? You see Ise lame, but I walked all de way up heah to get it in de paper."

"I regret very much, Sam, that I can't publish it for you, particularly in view of the charming frankness and naivete with which you have narrated the thrilling chapter of your life."

"What did I understand you to say, boss?"

"I can't publish your poem, and regret it."

Well, boss, I'll lebe it wid you, and any time you want to put it in de—," and just then a shrill signal came from the counting room through the speaking tube, and Sam's eyes nearly started from his head as he leaped from his seat.

"What's dat, boss?"

"That's a policeman's whistle, Sam."

"Good night, boss; I ain't got no more time to stay," and he hobbled out of the room and down the stairs and out of sight.

And Sam's poetry was gently laid in the waste basket with a dozen or more of the same sort received that night. In its stead one of Sam's audience writes the story of the dusky visitor's one romance.

A LADY entered a drug store and asked for a bottle of "Jane's experience." The clerk informed her that Jane hadn't bottled her experience yet, but they could urnish 'Jayne's Expectorant."

A MR. FROST, now languishing in prison, is advised to thaw himself out before cold weather comes on.

It was a bibulous old Frenchman who wouldn't drink water because it tasted so much of sinners since the flood.

BESSIE TURNER is said to be writing a Romance. This is very proper. If she cannot draw upon the imagination and tell a fine tale, we don't know who can. Her book will sell.

AN ADVENTURER recently assumed the costume of a bishop at Marseilles, and ere his career was brought to a close by the police, succeeded in making many dupes. Probably in this case the counterfeit was nearly equal to the genuine.

AN UNSOPHISTICATED old farmer, when asked by the paying-teller of a bank what denomination he would have his bills in, replied, "You may give me a sprinklin' of Presbyterian, but the heft on 'em I'll take in good old Hard-shell Baptist."

AN OLD farmer became seriously ill, and was urged by his neighbors, who thought he was going to die, to call a minister to pray for him. "To pray for me! No, sir; I am an original Granger, and do not want any middleman between me and Almighty God!"

PEACHES are now being shipped in immense quantities to this city from Delaware and New Jersey. Some days the receipts are reported as high as 40,000 and 50,000 crates and baskets. The market sometimes is over-supplied. One day we saw at least fifty cart loads of this fruit rotted and worthless—a certain loss to shippers.

ONE of the Siamese Ambassadors, on returning home from Europe, gave the following description of a pianoforte, or, as he called it, "a great trunk set upon legs." He said: "A woman sits in front of this, and, tickling a sort of tail it has with her toe, produces a variety of pleasant sounds."

REV. RICHARD HARCOURT, Methodist, has been summoned to a trial by the brethren of his church at Elizabeth, N. J., on the grounds of heresy and lack of veracity. The heresy consists in his believing and preaching that babes and infants are regarded with favor by heaven, and that they are not entirely reprobate and unregenerate. They claim he has departed from the true faith.

ANOTHER FALLEN CLERGYMAN.—Rev. G. W. Porter, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, has recently had a church trial at Danbyborough, Vt., for adultery with Miss Hattie Allen. The young lady was on the stand nine hours, and made a clean breast of the affair, and made the Reverend gentleman's guilt apparent to all present. He was arrested, also, on a State warrant, and held in $1,000 bail for an early trial. His friends are much chagrined by his conduct.

THE REV. C. HAMBLIN, who has for many years been a missionary among the Mohammedans, declares that the rose-colored accounts of the progress of Christianity in the Islamic States are false. "The delightful picture," he says, "of the success of Arab missionaries in winning whole African tribes, elevating, refining and civilizing them with wondrous success, is not very much more exaggerated than the tales of the Arab story-tellers in the Turkish coffee shops."

IT HAS NOT BEEN a very favorable time for camp-meetings. The weather for the last month has not been run in that special interest. No matter how fervid in prayer, or eloquent in sermon a preacher may become, a lively shower right in the midst of it acts decidedly as a dampener, and cuts it short. New converts are not numerous. Well, wait till Moody and Sankey get rested a little, and then the way in which "brands will be snatched from the burning" will be a caution to firemen. All, then, can "come to Jesus" and get their passports to heaven, unless the Devil sets up a stronger claim.

PROFANE, YET NOT IMPIOUS.—A Sunday-school picnic at Kingston was recently held in a grove near town. A pompous man, who was an ex-sheriff, and who seemed to be a sort of "king bee" among the people, superintended all the arrangements. Large tables were spread and loaded with abundance of good things. As soon as everything was nearly ready for the feast, a number of children grabbed up knives and forks and "went in," when the ex-sheriff howled out, "Hold on, you d—d hogs, will you?" Then in a milder tone he said to one of the ministers present, "Brother —, will you ask blessing?"

MR. BEECHER'S confidential attorney, T. G. Shearman, has been saying hard things about our worthy American clergymen in a recent speech in London, in defense of his pastor. He said it was a very common thing for them to kiss the wives and daughters of their congregation whenever they met, and that Mr. Beecher's operations in this line were far less than the average, and that he is more exemplary and more self-denying in this, than most clergymen. This bids fair to raise a breeze among the black-coated gentry upon Mr. Shearman's return. While they admit he is very pious, very tender-hearted and very gifted in prayer, they will not, even in the fulness of his affection for Mr. Beecher, allow him to thus misrepresent them. There may be considerable truth in Mr. Shearman's representations of the clergy, but it is hardly probable that his favorite is as self-denying and diffident with the sisters as he would have our English cousins believe.

A SAD CASE where Christianity failed to keep an old man from crime. A mournful state of things has come to light in Battle Creek, Mich. A man nearly seventy years of age, a life-long member of the Methodist church, and for fifteen years superintendent of the Sunday-school, and regarded from his youth up as an excellent and consistent Christian, has been found guilty of criminal and disgraceful conduct with several little girls of the place, who were enticed into his shop where he was in the habit of taking improper liberties with their persons. The pastor and leaders of the church have been examining the case, and the old man with bowed head confessed his crime, and wished he was dead. It was said to him that if he had only denied the charges and protested his innocence everybody would have believed him; but he said he could not think of adding lying and perjury to the other crimes he had committed, and in this respect he does not follow the illustrious example with which the country is so familiar. The old man has gone to California, leaving his stricken wife and son behind. The church did not pay his expenses even.

THE GREAT DIFFERENCE in the administration of justice in England and this country is vividly portrayed in a recent Sun editorial. Col. Baker, a brilliant and popular English military officer, and a special friend of the Prince of Wales, was arrested for attempting, while partly intoxicated, improper liberties with a lady on a railway train. His trial followed very soon, and lasted four hours, upon which sentence of imprisonment for one year and a fine of $2,500 was passed upon him, and he is now paying the penalty of his mistake. How unlike the trial of Mr. Beecher. Four years after he had committed a greater offense, he was brought to trial, which lasted six months, and though he was proved guilty by his own confessions, corroborated by the testimony of several respectable persons, he got clear, simply by his own denial, and, instead of serving a term in prison, as Col. Baker is doing, he was voted a bonus of $80,000, apparently for what he had done, and he is now holding forth weekly, as a living curiosity in a huge tent on the White Mountains to four or five thousand idle, gaping, rural curiosity-seekers who come from miles around to see the show. It is said his hotel keeper gives him his board, lodging and carriage rides for the large patronage the pastor's presence and preaching bring him. If Beecher would take his big tent and travel with Barnum's show, he would beat the giraffe in drawing crowds. We charge Barnum nothing for this hint.

ANOTHER FRAIL CLERGYMAN.—The Rev. John W. Hanner, Presiding Elder, one of the most prominent Methodist preachers in the State of Tennessee, and one of the ablest and most intellectual in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, has recently, at Murfreesboro, Tenn., had a trial before an investigating committee, consisting of Bishop McTyeire and five distinguished clergymen of the denomination, for gross immorality in writing a lascivious letter to Miss Paralee Nailor and making propositions of a very improper character to her, with a view of inducing her to depart from the path of virtue and to yield herself to his lascivious embrace. In his amorous suit he directed the attention of the young lady to that delectable part of the Bible—the seventh chapter of the Song of Solomon. The letter was unfortunately intercepted by a brother of the young lady, by which means the clerical Lothario, past sixty years of age, was brought to the light. His letter was read before the committee; the young lady was examined, and the Reverend sinner in shame and sadness, and hanging of the head, confessed his guilt. The committee could not do otherwise than find him guilty, and ordered him to step down and out, and relinquish the position of preacher. They did not follow the example of Plymouth church, or they would have presented him with $20,000 and expressed their entire confidence in his saintly virtue. It is a saddening thought that the Christian religion, of which so much is boasted, should prove inadequate to preserve a life-long, eminent preacher from committing such folly. We are every day more and more forced to the conviction that, instead of clergymen being better than other men, they are more fallible, more carnal-minded and sensual than the average of mankind.

COL. HENRY S. OLCOTT, in a recent four column letter to the Sun, details at length an astonishing recital of the mediumship of Mrs. Thayer in Boston, in whose presence many kinds of exotic and native flowers, plants, fruit, etc., were on many occasions brought fresh and dripping with dew into a room with closed doors and window-shutters, previous thorough search having been made, and nothing of the kind being present. On one occasion the medium was fastened in a sack of tarlatan, and while thus confined the table was fairly loaded with a great variety of flowers and fruits. Canaries and doves were also produced in the same way. On one occasion, he states, a sprig of heather was brought, (in accordance with a promise that had previously been privately made to a Scotchman,) and was said to have been brought from Scotland. Col. Olcott spent five weeks testing Mrs. Thayer's mediumship, and is fully convinced of her truth and honesty, and also adduces the testimony of Wm. Lloyd Garrison and other prominent citizens of Boston, who know the lady and have been present at her seances. Truly this is getting to be a remarkable world and wonders will never cease. These things, if so, set our old notions of possibilities entirely aside. We would like to have it explained how plants and earth, fruits and birds can be conveyed by spirit power through the walls of a closed room. It seems Col. Olcott, Mrs. Thayer and others are soon going to St. Petersburg, Russia, to meet with remarkable mediums from other countries, at the instance of the Imperial University and Professors Wagner and Boutlerow of that institution. It is proposed to test the mediums by most thorough and scientific tests of various kinds. It is possible something in due time may be heard from these investigations.

The Pro and Con of Supernatural Religion; or,

An Answer to the Question: Have We a Supernaturally Revealed, Infallibly Inspired and Miraculously Attested Religion in the World?

BY E. E. GUILD.

If we scrutinize the accounts of miracles contained in the New Testament, we find most of the important ones attended by the same or similar difficulties.

1. Miraculous birth of Christ. Not only are the accounts of it inconsistent with themselves, but self-contradictory. Besides, if they were true, and generally believed by those who were acquainted with him, he must have started out on his mission with the prestige of a miraculous origin in his favor. But throughout his career he is generally spoken of as the son of Joseph, or the "carpenter's son." Although frequently reproached on account of his low birth and origin, he does not reply by asserting his birth of a virgin. No retrospective allusion to it is made either by himself or his disciples. No hint of it is given in the epistles of either Paul, Peter, James, Jude, or John. His townsmen were the most stubborn unbelievers in him. Even his own brothers and sisters, who ought to have known all about it, did not accept him as the Messiah, and on one occasion were about to arrest him on the ground that he was a "lunatic" and was "mad." It is evident they had never heard of his miraculous birth.

2. Flight into Egypt. Matthew relates that immediately after his birth, his parents fled with him into Egypt, where they remained until the death of Herod. Matthew is the only New Testament writer who says anything about it, and he is contradicted by Luke, who says that eight days after his birth he was circumcised, and after the purification of his mother, he was presented to the Lord in the temple at Jerusalem, from which place they went to their own city, Nazareth, and dwelt there.

3. Temptation. Mark says, that "immediately" after his baptism, the "spirit" drove him into the wilderness, where he was forty days tempted of Satan. John wholly ignores the temptation, and says that the third day after his baptism he attended a wedding in Cana of Galilee. From Cana he went to Capernum, where he remained some days and then went to Jerusalem.

4. Turning water into wine. If this miracle really occurred, it is strange that John is the only Evangelist who has recorded it, especially, as it is said to have been the first, and certainly not the least wonderful. Is it credible that God should work a miracle in order to change one hundred and thirty-five gallons of water into wine for the accommodation of men who had already drunk all that had been provided for the occasion, by their host? All the circumstances go to show that the account is a mere legend.

5. The transfiguration. This is related by Matthew, Mark and Luke, neither of whom were present to witness it, but wholly omitted by John, who is said to have been an eye-witness. It is barely alluded to once, or is supposed to be, by Peter, but not mentioned by James, both of whom, it is said, were present.

6. Commission of the Apostles. We are told that Christ, just before his ascension, imparted the "Holy Ghost" to the Apostles, and commissioned them to "go into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature." And yet we find that Peter had to be convinced of the propriety of preaching to the Gentiles by a special revelation; and that he was called to account for so doing by his fellow-disciples, who subsequently, however, became convinced that he was right.

7. Conversion of Paul. We have four different accounts of this. One historical by Luke, in Acts 9th; two reported by Luke; one in Acts 22d, the other in Acts 26th, as having been given by Paul; and the fourth by Paul himself, in Galatians, 1st chapter. In the narrative of it by Luke—he does not say whether the men who were with Paul saw the "great light" witnessed by Paul or not. But he says they heard the "voice." He also says, that although Paul was stricken to the ground, the men "stood speechless." In his report of Paul's speech to the Jews in Jerusalem, he makes him contradict the first statement by saying that the men "saw indeed the light but heard not the voice." And in his speech to Agrippa, he contradicts the other, by affirming that not only he, but all the men who were with him were prostrated. In Acts xxii. 10, it is said that the heavenly voice directed Paul to Damascus, where he would be told what was required of him. But in his speech to Agrippa, he says this same "voice" gave him his commission as an apostle at the very time when the "light was seen, and the voice heard." Again, in his address to Agrippa, he says, that immediately after receiving his commission he commenced preaching "unto them of Damascus, and at Jerusalem, and throughout all the coasts of Judea, and then to the Gentiles." But in Galatians, 1st chap., he affirms that he did not confer with any of the other apostles; did not learn the gospel from them; did not go up to Jerusalem; but "went to Arabia, and returned again unto Damascus. Then after three years he went to Jerusalem to see Peter.

Finally, these writers state some things, which, if true, we should expect would be corroborated by other testimony; but they are not.

1. The taxing of the Jews by Caesar Augustus. No Roman, or any other historian has mentioned any such tax. Judea was not a Roman province when Jesus was born; nor was Cyrenius Governor of Syria until ten or twelve years after that event.

2. The slaughter of the innocents by Herod. The account of this is not confirmed by any historian; not even by Josephus, who gives a full history of the life and reign of Herod, and an enumeration of his crimes.

3. The darkness, the quaking of the earth; the rending the rocks, and veil of the temple, at the crucifixion; and the earthquake at the resurrection. Not only is most of these phenomena unmentioned by all of the Evangelists except Matthew, but no allusion is made to these occurrences anywhere else in the New Testament; nor in the annals of any nation in the world.

In view of these facts, to what other conclusion can we arrive, but that the theory of infallible inspiration has no foundation in truth? Nor is it probable that the testimony we have been reviewing is that of eye and ear witnesses. If it is, their memory must have been very defective. That the New Testament writers were mistaken about some things we know. Paul and Barnabas did not agree, but contended "sharply" with each other. Peter and Paul differed in opinion, and Paul rebuked Peter publicly, charging him with dissimulation: both could not be right. Infallible men could not but agree. Doubtless, most of the events recorded by the writers of the gospels had some foundation in truth; but they were not recorded as they actually occurred, but as they were believed to have occurred. It is one thing to see an angel, it is quite another to believe that somebody else has. It is one thing for a phenomenon to occur, it is a very different thing to believe that it was produced by a special interposition of divine power. A record of the phenomena, a history of which we have in the gospels, was not made at the time they occurred, but long after, and at a time when the original facts had become greatly exaggerated. Undoubtedly the New Testament contains much valuable truth; but it also contains mistakes and errors. It is not therefore the ultimate standard of truth, nor only rule of faith and practice. It is ours to separate the truth from the error; to sift the wheat from the chaff, and to conserve the one and burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire.

WERE THE GOSPELS AS WE NOW HAVE THEM WRITTEN BY THE PERSONS WHOSE NAMES THEY BEAR?

It is often asserted in more than a thousand pulpits and reiterated and repeated again and again in the most positive terms, that the proof of the genuineness of our present four gospels is so conclusive and overwhelming, that whoever denies it must be either very ignorant, imbecile or dishonest. In order to show upon what a weak foundation this sweeping assertion is made to rest, it is only necessary to examine the alleged evidence.

We are told that the history of these gospels can be traced up to the very time of the apostles and evangelists, and that the authorship of them by the writers to whom they are attributed is proved by the testimony of the immediate successors of the apostles. Now what are the facts? The immediate successors of the apostles are called "apostolic fathers," and those who succeeded them are called "Christian fathers." The testimony of the first named and those of the last named who lived before the New Testament collection was made, is all that is of any value. The apostolic fathers are Clemens, Ignatius, Polycarp, Papius, Barnabas, and Hermas. The first Christian fathers are Justin Martyr, Tatian, Irenæus, and Theophilus. The last father named, lived at about the time when the gospels were collected and compiled with the other books of the New Testament. The New Testament, however, was not declared to be the standard of truth by authority of the Church until after this. Now what do these witnesses say on the point in question?

These fathers all lived in the first century of the Christian era. If during that century there existed four different biographers of the life and teachings of Christ with which they were acquainted, and which they accepted as authoritative, we should expect them to make frequent use of them as authority for their own teachings. But what are the facts? In their writings which have come down to us, we find some express citations of some of the epistles of the New Testament and some allusions to the same and also citations of apocryphal gospels, yet we do not find either of the four gospels cited, alluded to or referred to by name. We find a few passages in their writings attributed by them to Christ, corresponding in part to passages in the gospels; but whether these passages were mere traditional sayings which had been handed down orally, or were contained in writings older than our gospels, they do not inform us. That the latter is the fact we will now show to be probable.

The first mention of Matthew's gospel by name is by Papias, the first Christian father. He was bishop of Hierapolis, and lived in the fore part of the second century. He says that Matthew wrote a gospel in Hebrew, and in the time of Origen towards the middle of the third century it was the universal belief of the Church that such was the fact. At an early period that gospel was lost, and what became of it no one has told us. If our present gospel of Matthew is a translation of it, when, where or by whom it was translated no one knows. It is a very well authenticated fact, that in very early times there did exist a gospel called the gospel of the Nazarenes. Origen had a copy of it, and Jerome translated it; but neither the original nor the translation has come down to us. It is generally believed, however, that it was not the lost gospel of Matthew, although it somewhat resembled it. Papias then gives us no certain testimony in regard to our present gospel of Matthew.

Respecting the gospel of Mark, the historical evidence of its genuineness is more meager still. Papias says that Mark went with Peter to Rome, and while there acted as interpreter for Peter; he wrote down what he could remember of what Peter told him, or what he heard him say. Clement of Alexandria, says, that Mark, at the request of the Church at Rome, wrote a gospel, and Peter, when informed of it, hesitated about giving it his sanction; but finally did so in obedience to a vision. Irenæus says, that it was after the death of Peter that Mark wrote his gospel. Chrysostom says, that after writing it he went to Egypt. Epiphanius says he went to Egypt by the direction of Peter. Here now the testimony is so conflicting and inconsistent with itself as to be totally valueless.

As for Luke's gospel, we find no mention of it by any of the apostolic fathers, nor by any of the Christian fathers before the last of the second century. The same is true of the gospel of John. The first Christian writer who mentions the four gospels by name and attributes their authorship to Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, was Irenæus who lived near the end of the second century. The history of these gospels can be traced with certainty up to the year 368, at which time the Council of Laodicea included them in a catalogue of the New Testament books omitting the book of Revelations. From that time they may be traced with tolerable certainty up to the time of Irenæus. From that time upward their history is involved in obscurity if not in total darkness.

It appears then, that in the writings of the apostolic and Christian fathers, there are passages which resemble passages in our four gospels, but in only a few instances are they verbatim resemblances. Second, they also contain passages which are not found in the gospels. Third, there are quotations in them from what were afterwards deemed apocryphal gospels. Fourth, in none of the early writers are our gospels cited or referred to by name. From all which it appears that the first fathers might have denied all the passages contained in their writings which resembled passages in our gospels from writings which existed before our gospels were written, and there is no proof that they ever saw the gospels as we now have them.

But suppose we had the unequivocal testimony of the apostolic and Christian fathers to the genuineness of the gospels, what would be the value of their testimony? The weight of evidence must be estimated by the intelligence and veracity of the witnesses. What then is the reputation of these fathers for intelligence and veracity? On this point we have the testimony of the great ecclesiastical historian, Mosheim, who wrote in the interest of Christianity, that the "apostolic fathers and the other writers, who, in the infancy of the Church, employed their pens in the cause of Christianity, were neither remarkable for their learning nor for their eloquence. On the contrary, they express the most pious and admirable sentiments in the plainest and most illiterate style." The writings of these men show, conclusively, that many of them were weak men; that all of them were extremely credulous; that they endorsed not only all the marvelous stories in circulation in their day about Christ and his apostles, but all the extravagant fictions of the Greek and Roman mythology. They sometimes employed known falsehood in support of their cause; and forged books to prove their doctrines. Mosheim says, the Christian fathers adopted and acted upon the maxim, that "it is lawful to lie for the truth." Whatever weight we attach to their testimony it is equally good for the apocryphal writings and for the Pagan mythology.

In the absence of any historical proof of the genuineness of the gospels we are led to the inquiry, is there any internal evidence which is sufficient to establish them as genuine? Here the evidence is all the other way, as the following considerations go to show. First, the gospels of Matthew, Mark, and Luke, so far as they relate to the addresses, parables and miracles of Christ, bear a remarkable resemblance to each other. Not only do they relate the same things, but in many instances they relate them in the same or nearly the same words. Now this resemblance is in the Greek gospels, whereas, Christ spoke in the language in use in Palestine, and his words, therefore, had to be translated into Greek by his biographers. Now it is incredible that three independent writers should report the sayings of Christ, and translate his words into a different language from that in which he spake, and that there should be this verbal agreement in their report. Second, in the introduction to Luke's gospel, he addresses himself to a personage whom he calls "most excellent Theophilus." In those times this title belonged only to persons of rank and distinction. It is remarkable that in all the writings of the early Christians, we find no other mention of such a personage until the time of Theophilus, bishop of Antioch, who lived near the close of the second century. He is said to have been a principal actor in collecting and arranging the books of the New Testament and putting them in their present form. It is highly probable that the four gospels were compiled from previously existing writings about that time, and if so, they could not have been written by the Evangelists in their present form. Of John's gospel, it may be said it is quite unlike either of the others. This unlikeness may be seen in the following particulars. 1. In the fourth gospel there is no record of the numerous parables found in the other three, nor any intimation that Christ adopted that mode of instruction. 2. The discourses attributed to Christ in the one, are entirely different from those in the others. In John's gospel they are lengthy, systematic, enigmatical, dogmatic, and abound in self-assertion. In the others they are fragmentary, plain, practical, and exhibit a spirit of meekness and humility. 3. The style of the discourses in John is entirely different from those in Matthew, Mark, and Luke. This difference is so great as to justify us in saying that if Christ spoke as the three first gospels represent him, he could not have spoken as John represents him, and visa versa. 4. John omits all mention of the miraculous cures of demons, to which the other writers seem to have attached so much importance. There are other differences which might be pointed out, but those above are sufficient for our present purpose. There is but one clue to the authorship of John's gospel, and that is the fact that a comparison of the gospel with the first of the three epistles attributed to John in the New Testament, shows that the style and often the very ideas and words attributed to John the Baptist and Christ in the gospel, correspond exactly with the style, ideas and words of that epistle. From this fact we infer that whoever was the author of the epistle was the author of the gospel also. Now, although the second and third epistles of John were considered doubtful for a long time by the Church; the first was always received as genuine. This points to John as the author of the fourth gospel. But if John was the author of it, was it originally written in the form in which we now have it? We know that an unknown writer added to it, (see John xxi. 24-25), and to what extent he might have further tampered with it no one knows.

But suppose that each of the gospels could be proved to have been written by their reputed authors, could we implicitly rely on their testimony? A few considerations will lead us to see that we could not. 1. The reputed authors were ignorant and superstitious, predisposed to believe in the marvelous, and regarded all the phenomena of nature as produced by a special divine providence. 2. They were not eye and ear witnesses of all that they record. They relate occurrences which took place when they could not have been present. For example, the remarkable circumstances attendant on the birth of Christ, both before and after the event. The temptation of Christ, the transfiguration of Christ, related by Matthew, Mark, and Luke, who were not present, and wholly omitted by John who is said to have witnessed it. The marvelous circumstances connected with the birth of John the Baptist; the report of the preaching of the Baptist; the prayer of Christ in Gethsemane; Peter's denial of Christ; the dream of Pilate's wife; the conversation between Pilate and the priests; that between Judas and the priests, and that between the soldiers and priests; and finally the alleged fact of the resurrection of Christ. 3. The gospels were written in the interest of a cause which the writers had espoused and which they were desirous to promote. Now we cannot rely implicitly on the statements of historians, who, we know, were biased and prejudiced in their minds, and who derived their information not from personal observation, but received it from common report. We are all of us acquainted with men whose intelligence and honesty we would not question; but whose statements in relation to an extraordinary occurrence made under the circumstances in which the writers of the gospels were placed, we could not accept. Unless these writers were more than human, they certainly were liable to be mistaken. They constantly misunderstood and misapprehended Christ's words while he was living, and what assurance have we that they did not do the same thing after he was dead?

It may be said that these writers were infallibly inspired, and thus preserved from all liability to err.

The question whether they were or not, will be next considered.

Hybridization.

As the effect of amalgamation is to establish a decreasing vitality in the mongrels, it becomes a matter of importance with farmers to know how much the vitality of mongrel plants and animals are effected. This subject probably has never been investigated to the extent which the importance of it demands. It seems, however, that some mongrels can propagate only one or two generations, while others can propagate three or four. Others, again, can perhaps continue propagation some twenty generations, more or less; but the power of reproduction in all kinds of mongrels is more or less affected.

There are various kinds of mongrels. Some are merely the offspring of two species, or varieties, evenly united, while in others the two kinds are mixed in various proportions. Again, the mixture may be of more than two species or varieties. One gardener claims to have produced a mongrel from a dozen varieties of the muskmelon. There are many species or varieties of maize or Indian corn, and farmers generally prefer keeping the several sorts apart, having a dread of mixing the different varieties. I suppose that the combining of several kinds of this grain enfeebles the growth and lessens the productiveness of the vegetable, and of course is the cause of the dread of the mixed kinds.

The disease which attacked the peach tree some years since, called the "yellows," and which threatened to almost annihilate that delicious fruit, was caused, I apprehend, by the cross-fertilization of the peach with the nectarine. The peach and the nectarine are two very distinct species. The fruit of one has the skin smooth like the apple, while the other is rough and covered with a downy substance. It is very doubtful whether a pure species of either the peach or nectarine can be found, at least in this country, and consequently the disease must very frequently be breaking out. As these two species are propagated mostly by buds, they perhaps may be kept in existence a longer period than if they could be only propagated from seed. Much might be said respecting the hybridity of the peach and nectarine, but I am compelled to give way to other subjects.

With respect to the honey bee, there has been but one species propagated, as a general rule, for many years in this country; but a few years since a new species was introduced, called the Italian honey bee. As this bee was recommended as having qualities in some respects superior to the common honey bee, while on the other hand, the common bee was said to have qualities in other respects superior to the Italian, it was recommended to get up a cross between them, and thus get a kind that had the good qualities of both. What has been the effect of this crossing, I have never ascertained, but am inclined to think that it has been or will be unfavorable. As there are specific differences between the Italian and common bee, the mongrels must deteriorate and finally die out, leaving mongrel hives destitute of inhabitants.

Among cattle some varieties are appreciated for their fattening qualities, while others are valued for giving milk in abundance and of good quality. It has been an object with cattle breeders to combine the good qualities of both in one animal. With what success, I leave to breeders to say.

Mongrels, in their generation, possess great capacity for variation. This is observed with respect to the apple. The seed of almost any variety of this fruit will produce various kinds of apples; some sour, some sweet, some large, some small, some of one color and some of another. The reason of this variation is in the mongrel character which the apple acquired years ago.

There is a species of the dog called the pointer, which stands and points at the game with his nose, and is made considerable use of by sportsmen for this purpose. There is another species of dog called the fox-hound, which will chase a fox and bring it to his master. Now the impropriety of mixing these two kinds is thus declared by a sportsman:

"Now how far it is possible to convert one of these races into the other, that is, to train the fox hound to point a bird, or the pointer to follow the fox, we know not. But whoever has had an opportunity of noticing the facts, knows that the fox-hound takes no notice of birds, nor can the pointer be made to pay the least regard to the scent of a fox, however strong, and that if we mix these races, the result becomes utterly useless, either for the field or the chase. These facts go to prove that no such thing exists as new species, formed of varieties, as some French savans have endeavored to show; for if the useless products above mentioned be continued, they never would form new species, but would remain mongrels or varieties of the two races from which they originated, and if either side predominated, the result would be either a fox-hound or a pointer."

It has been laid down as a law of nature, that, in order to prevent great confusion in the vegetable and animal kingdoms, the offspring of different species or hybrids are incapable of reproducing their kind, thus making hybridity a test of specific character. This has been denied by many naturalists, and it seems with good reason; as, for example, the African negro and the Caucasian man show characters of a specific difference, yet it is known that the two species will propagate fertile hybrids. It is, however, asserted that a hybrid from the two species cannot continue propagation beyond the fourth generation, and that a family of pure mulattoes (hybrids in the first degree) of the fifth generation do not anywhere exist. Can any of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER give us any information on the subject?

I do not wish to be understood to say that there is no advantage to be derived from mixing two species, in some respects, as it regards the vegetable kingdom, and also perhaps the animal. On the contrary, in some cases it may be advantageous. J. B. POOL.

Are All Things Possible with God?

BY H. M. R.

"All things are possible with God," the Christian cries. But if we but a moment think, we find he lies; For in the outset God did make, as Moses tells, The earth; and made it round, excepting that it swells A very little at the equatorial line, And at the poles is slightly flattened, which, in fine, Makes it an oblate spheroid, (so scientists say.) Not Moses, that most learned of all Jews of his day.) Of course it has a surface and a center too, And I would like to ask if God could make it new, Or one exactly like it, which devoid should be Of surface, center, or the oblate form we see. Can he make strings and sticks with just one end apiece? Or add an inch to miles, and not their length increase? Can he make man immortal, yet without a soul? Make each part equal to or greater than the whole? Or can he make two hills without a vale between? Or make an object visible yet not be seen? Make two things occupy the same space at one time? Or doing good and loving mercy a foul crime? O, God! if these things all are possible with thee, Thou canst bound space, stop time and end eternity?

CLEARFIELD, PA.

Clearfield is a lovely village on the western slope of the Alleghenies. Most of the people are yet in the bonds of the old faith, and many of those who have some glimpse of the new, and cherish it in their hearts, do not dare to show their preference. But the outspoken Liberals are of the most staunch and progressive sort, of which George Thorn is the able and earnest pioneer. The work is slow, but sure. Christianity is making a hard fight, and needs but the sword of authority to crush. Its greatest ally at present is Mrs. Grundy. This old lady is fearfully orthodox. She hates innovation, and lifts her eyes in holy horror at a radical lecturer. He must be frowned down, as one good Methodist sister remarked, "He believes in neither hell nor heaven," and so of course must be worse than the heathen. But Mrs. Grundy must abdicate her throne one of these days. She must take her portion with all old fogies. Her lack-lustre eyes will be closed in death, and these poor weak mortals can take a whiff of the fresh air of Radicalism without losing caste. Indeed, I am almost afraid that Mrs. Grundy herself will be a Radical. I hope not. She belongs to the dead past, and ought to be buried with it. S. P. PUTNAM.

The All Atoning Sacrifice.

We—meaning our honorable self—hold, in sacred respect, the right of individual opinion, on the subject of religion, and on all other subjects.

Regarding the religious element, in our composite formation, as the "oil and the wine," we are specially careful to hurt not the "oil and the wine."

When, by slow and toilsome progress, humanity ascends to higher forms of thought—to more elevated plane of being—if any individual—man, woman, boy, or girl catch a ray of increasing light—if, by such light, the woman, man, girl, or boy make the sublime discovery, that any act, word, or thought, heretofore indulged, is not in strict accord with the increased light—let such fortunate man, woman, boy, or girl, straightway sin no more, in such action, word, or thought. That is the all-atoning sacrifice, for such transgression of the eternal law of right—the only sacrifice heaven requires or will accept—the only sacrifice that will do any good.

The woman, girl, man, or boy, so atoning as aforesaid, is a conqueror—prepared to go forth, "conquering and to conquer," till every enemy is under his or her feet—till every obstacle is removed from the track—the straight way, leading from lowest planes of humanity's formation, to ever increasing sublime elevations.

Here is a field opened, opened to our vision, for our loftiest ambition—our divinest aspiring—for most approved effort. The distant view, of ever increasing beauties and glories, is too sublime for our unpracticed vision.

After the mere glimpse, of such practical—attainable sublimities, what, to us, are all speculative theological abstractions? PRENTISS.

ELIJAH THE TISHBITE.

Among the extraordinary characters of the Bible, and the extraordinary stories of great feats and performances, we cannot, of course, forget Elijah the Tishbite, a "mighty prophet of the Lord." The recital of what he did and what befel him taxes our credulity to the utmost; and if we cannot believe it all to be strictly true, we hope our Christian friends will not blame us. The story, at best, only purports to narrate certain events that transpired some three thousand years ago, in a certain country in Asia, and as it was extremely common in that age of the world for writers of all countries to blend so much fable and fiction with their facts, we are compelled to take these marvelous statements with a great deal of allowance; and such parts as are wholly at variance with the known laws of nature, we are very safe in disbelieving. It does not follow that we must believe the whole of a story simply because it is told in some manuscript or book. We have too many proofs that, in thousands of cases, falsehoods have been palmed off as truth; and this was attempted in olden times as much as now.

Elijah, it seems, was born and raised in Gilead. This was probably nothing to his discredit, as, for ought we know, Gilead was a very good country to grow up in. He is introduced to us as making a visit to Ahab, king of Israel, and prophesied there would be no rain or dew for these years. The account does not state how far this remarkable drouth should extend, whether just over that particular country or all adjoining countries; but as no limit is given, we can only suppose it meant the entire earth. "These years" is slightly indefinite, also, as to time; it might mean two, or it might mean twenty. Less than two it could not be, to be years, and as the third year of the drouth is subsequently spoken of, it is usually admitted that there was no rain or dew for three years.

This account, to look at it squarely, is a most improbable one, and utterly opposed to nature's laws. The moisture from the surface of the earth is constantly being evaporated and carried into the air. The air can hold up a certain quantity and no more. When its capacity is filled, and when by the low temperature of the upper air the vapor is condensed again to water, in the form of dew or rain, it is bound to descend to the earth. This is inevitable. The moisture that rises in one section may be borne off by the winds in the vapory state for hundreds of miles, perhaps, but it must in a short time descend. We see, then, it is utterly impossible that there should be no rain or dew for three years nor two years. The atmosphere could not sustain the hundredth part of the moisture that would rise from the earth in that time.

Think, also, for a moment, the results that would follow on the earth, or in any portion of the earth's surface, were there to be no rain nor dew upon it for three years. The entire surface of the ground would become "as dry as an ash heap" several feet in depth; not a plant nor a tree could live, and the entire earth's surface would become as barren of vegetable life, and consequently of animal life too, as the vast desert of Sahara. Every spring, every rill, every creek and every river would become dry, and the lakes and the ocean itself would be greatly exhausted. Constant evaporation, with no returns of moisture, would produce this precise result. Not a human being and not an animal could survive such a drouth.

The story is so entirely impossible that no person under the control of reason and good sense can believe it for a moment. It is certainly a fabrication entire, or a great exaggeration; and both being so easy of accomplishment, it can well be understood how much more probable it is that it is one or the other than that such an impossible event as is here narrated could have occurred.

To return to our story. After the Tishbite had delivered this remarkable prediction to Ahab, God told him to "get hence," and contrary to Greeley's advice to the young men to "go West," God advised this man to go East and hide himself by the brook Cherith, where he could get plenty of water to drink, and assured him he had arranged with the ravens to supply him regularly morning and evening with flesh and with bread. The necessity of hiding himself is not apparent unless it was to afford God an opportunity of showing with what ease he could furnish him with what he needed to eat. In view, however, of the thousands of deserving and unfortunate individuals, shipwrecked on the ocean, cast away on desolate islands, lost in the wilderness, separated from the haunts of men, imprisoned under various circumstances, and through poverty, destitution and want—in cities and in country—yes, in view of the hundreds of thousands of hapless mortals who, under all these conditions and many others, have been left to perish, starve and die without a thing being done by God in their behalf, or a single raven being sent to their relief, it looks as though God is partial and does not treat all alike. That ravens, too, should be the medium of relief, is a little out of the natural course of things. Ravens, rooks and crows are not usually regarded as friends to man. They are mischievous and troublesome in various ways. If, however, in this case they were angels of mercy, they were, at all events, black angels.

In a short time the brook Cherith dried up, and it is to be inferred the ravens became remiss in their duties, for Elijah got very hungry, and he was forced to change his boarding house. It may be supposed that God and the ravens together could still have managed to procure water and bread for the prophet, but God, of course, knew best how to carry on his own work. He now directed the Tishbite to Zarephath, where he had engaged a widow woman to attend to him. That was a good change. Commend us always, to a widow woman for a companion and to prepare our daily food, rather than ravens and crows. We would sooner pay double price for a home with the widow, and have the benefit of her ministrations, than to hide by the side of a brook, run dry, with none but treacherous ravens to take care of us. Doubtless the good man wished he had been directed to the widow at first.

He found the widow, however, in very straitened circumstances, and when the prophet importuned her to prepare him something to eat, she protested in the name of heaven that all she had in the world to eat was a handful of meal and a small quantity of oil in a cruse—a small stock of provisions, truly, for three persons at the commencement of a three year's drouth and famine. Elijah, not having had a "square meal" for some time, was eloquent and ardent, and he bade her not to fear, but to make him a cake at once. She said she was just about gathering two sticks to make a little fire to cook the small amount of meal left, for herself and son, and then, she had made up her mind she and he would lay down and die. Elijah was a good persuader; upon the strength of his promise that her barrel of meal should not waste away, and that the cruse of oil should not be exhausted until the dry weather was over, he induced her to get him a dinner. And here comes in the best part of the story; though she and he did eat together many days, and many months, the barrel of wheat wasted not, neither did the cruse of oil fail. There was nothing bad about that; in short, it was an excellent arrangement.

It probably was not much trouble for God to do that little favor, and it was so much better that they should have enough to eat than to be left to starve. The main thing to be regretted is that the practice has not been more common. How many poor widows have famished with hunger day after day, and have seen their little babes waste away and die for the want of food, and not a spoonful of meal nor a drop of oil was provided for them. There are thousands this moment in this great city, and in all other great cities, and all over the world, that know not where to get anything for supper, and will throw themselves upon their wretched beds without a mouthful in their stomachs. No ravens will minister to them—no meal or oil will be provided for them. It seems, truly, that this good God, which the priests tell us of, is partial; he treats some, so much better than others. He is very apt to neglect the widows and their little babes, (who, of all others, should have his special care,) and leave them to famish, while his priests and prophets are well provided for. Even the widow woman in this story, would doubtless have been left to starve, and nothing would have been done for her had not Elijah come along as he did. It squints very much of partiality, say what you will.

Well, Elijah and the widow got along well together, till a little mishap befel the boy. Either from eating too much, or some other cause, his breath went out of him, and the widow blamed Elijah about it and upbraided him so much, that he took the lad in an upper room (probably it was a three-story house), and brought him to. It is usually supposed that the boy had died, but this is a mistake. If he were dead he would have remained so in spite of any ceremonies Elijah could have performed over him. When once a human being, or an animal, is dead; when their life has fully passed out of them, that is the end of it; no more living again for them, and whenever you hear a story about some one being raised from the dead, don't believe a word of it—the thing is utterly impossible. You might as well talk of raising men from logs and rocks. A body that is absolutely dead must remain so and must hasten to decay, its elements soon to be absorbed in other organizations. Whatever class of men, or whatever book teaches to the contrary of this, teaches what is false. "Baron Munchausen," "The Arabian Nights," or "Gulliver's Travels" make statements as wonderful, but nothing more untrue.

It was afterwards said of Joseph's son—or rather his wife's son—that he raised one from the dead, but the remarks just made, apply to his case. It is altogether easier for the assertion to be false than to be true.

In the case of the widow's son, however, the narrative does not say that he died, but that there was no breath left in him. That might easily be. The breath has gone out of many a one, and they lived years afterwards. In catalepsy, swooning, syncope and trance, the breath often leaves the body, sometimes for days, and yet the patient is not dead, and after a time revives again. This might have been the case with the widow's son; respiration might have been temporarily suspended, and Elijah, by his manipulations, might have revived him. If this was the case, it was nothing wonderful, and no stranger than frequently occurs, and hardly deserves a place in the "word of God."

In the third year of the drouth the Lord sent Elijah unto Ahab, again to make another prophecy and to predict rain upon the earth. It was the very thing that Ahab and all others wanted, for the famine was very sore in the land. The king and his governor, Obadiah, were out looking for water to save the king's mules and cattle. Elijah met the latter, and wished him to convey intelligence to the king that he was there. Obadiah was a good man, and had preserved a hundred prophets in caves, and had daily sent them food. It is presumable that he was at least as trustworthy in carrying food as the ravens had been. He objected to taking that message to Ahab, fearing the latter would put him to death, inasmuch as Ahab had sought in every nation and kingdom, to find Elijah, and had sworn every nation that they knew not where the prophet was. Ahab probably deemed Elijah the cause of the drouth, and wished to put him to death, but being snugly ensconced with the widow, living on meal and oil, the king was not able to find him. This searching every nation and kingdom must have been a heavy contract for Ahab, if there were as many nations in existence then, as now. Obadiah feared that if he told the king Elijah had returned, and then Elijah should secrete himself again, and Ahab be unable to find him, that he, Obadiah, would be slain. Elijah, however, by a promise, overcame Obadiah's objections, and he conveyed the desired message to the king, and a meeting between Ahab and Elijah was effected.

The king upbraided the prophet for causing all the trouble that had occurred, whereupon the prophet told him it was all his own fault, in consequence of his going after the false god, Baalim, and this was the reason given why there had been no rain upon the earth for three years, and in consequence of which men, beasts and vegetation had suffered so severely—a bit of jealousy on the part of the good God of the Jews, that was all.

It was arranged, however, between the prophet and the king, that the matter should be tested and the power of the two gods thoroughly proved, that it might be known who was God and who was not. Elijah proposed that the four hundred and fifty prophets of Baal whom Jezebel was daily feeding at her table, should meet him at Mount Carmel and match their god against his. This was done. Altars were erected and bullocks prepared and laid upon them ready for sacrifice, but no fire put under. Which ever god was able to cause fire upon their respective altar should be regarded as the real God. The four hundred and fifty priests of Baal called upon their god from morn till noon to manifest himself, but he failed to answer their wish, whereupon Elijah mocked them and told them to cry louder; that perhaps their god was talking or pursuing, or on a journey, or possibly asleep and required awaking. Then they cried louder, and even cut themselves with knives and lancets, and let their blood flow freely upon the ground, but all of no avail; their cries, continued the whole day, nor the shedding of blood answered the purpose. [Query. When the God of the Jews and Christians fails to answer the thousands of prayers offered unto him, which is the rule, would there be anything amiss, after the illustrious example of Elijah, for their opponents to mock them and ridicule them, and say their god must be talking, journeying or asleep?]

Elijah constructed an altar of twelve stones—a holy number—upon which he placed wood and a bullock, but no fire. He ordered four barrels of water to be poured upon the altar, which was done; then he said, “do it the second time,” and it was done; then he said, “do it the third time,” and the third time four barrels of water were thus poured upon the altar. The question naturally arises, when there had been no rain for three years, and when the king and his governor had themselves been compelled to search the whole country over for water, where it could be found in such quantities as to uselessly throw away twelve barrels; but questions are scarcely in order; we must take the story as it is. Suffice it to say, at the proper moment Elijah called upon his God to let himself be known; the fire from the Lord fell upon the altar, burned up the sacrifice, and even licked up the twelve barrels of water. Upon this astonishing performance, the people fell upon their faces and had no further doubts which was the God. Then the good man, Elijah, took the four hundred and fifty priests of Baal down to the brook Kishon (it seems this brook had not gone dry) and then put them all to death. Who can doubt Elijah being a man of God after this wholesale slaughter? The query might arise what those four hundred and fifty prophets were doing while Elijah, single-handed, put them all to death? Possibly his God assisted him; it would be much in keeping with the killing he did on other occasions. Again, if they were as sincere in their allegiance as Elijah was, was it not rather severe and un-godlike to put them to death for it?

The production of fire in the midst of the water that was poured so freely upon the altar, has been attempted to be accounted for by the possibility of the prophet having some potassium and placing it upon the altar, as it is well known that that mineral, in its native state, readily takes fire while floating upon water, and burns with great brilliance and persistency. Others have suggested phosphorus, which takes fire spontaneously at a certain temperature, but we do not believe he knew enough about chemistry to understand the nature of either potassium or phosphorus. It is altogether more probable the whole story is a fabrication, written by no one knows who, and wholly unworthy of credence. If there had been no rain or dew upon the earth for the space of three years, as we remarked, there could be no vegetable or animal life left, and consequently no bullocks, no water, no priests, no Ahab and no Elijah. If the trench that the prophet dug around the altar “held water,” the story will not.

The best part of that remarkable day's work on the part of Elijah was the fine rain he produced at the close of the day, thus ending the three years' drouth. He went upon the top of Mount Carmel and cast himself upon the ground, placed his face between his knees and kept his servant watching for the appearance of a cloud in the horizon. What occult powers he employed to produce the clouds and the rain are not known, and the secret is lost to the world, but at length the rain came and the earth was greatly refreshed.

It is difficult to see what had been gained by the “long dry spell,” and the intense suffering it must have caused, except it was the chance of making that fire test and slaying the four hundred and fifty prophets of Baal; and it would seem that could have been brought about at a far less cost.

If this story is true, Elijah must have been about the smartest man that ever lived. What he did in the evening of this one day—to burn up a bullock and twelve barrels of water without fire, to kill four hundred and fifty men, and then to produce a first-class rain, is more than any man that lives could do in a week. But this story will bear discounting very extensively.

It requires too much space to notice all of Elijah's remarkable performances in this issue, and we will have to defer the remainder till our next.

The Title of “Reverend.”

By an extract from a recent English paper, we notice a clergyman there, of the Established Church has brought a suit against a non-conformist minister to prevent him from using the affix Rev. before his name. The offending clergyman had lost a daughter, and on her tomb-stone he wished to state that she was the daughter of the Rev. —. To prevent his doing this, the motion named was made by the other clergyman. His position was, that it is the clergymen of the Established Church only that have the legal right to affix Rev. to their names, and that the other party being an “independent,” or a dissenter, had no right to use it.

This was a small piece of business, truly, but evinces the spirit of the Christian clergy. The Catholics, in the first place, hold that all without the pale of their Church are in error, and have not the genuine article of Christianity. The Church of England next follows on in the same path; it only, has the true faith. In its wake follow the hundreds of dissenting creeds which make up the Protestant denominations. They all claim that their special church has the real truth, and that all others are more or less in error. Every one virtually says, “I am right, the others are wrong.”

The fact is, they are all wrong; and many intelligent people are coming to this conclusion. They are upholding a system of faith composed of and built upon the superstitions of ancient heathen religions, which can be easily shown. We have prepared an article on the subject of the non-originality of Christianity, but its length precludes its appearance in this issue.

The term Reverend is a title of honor, which priests for many centuries have appropriated to themselves upon a false basis. It really means they are “men of God,” that they are in the special service of God, that they know more about the mind, will and mysteries of God than other men do; that they can approach nearer to his throne, and can wield more influence with him than other men, and that, therefore, they should be revered by the masses, looked up to with much veneration and be paid large salaries for living in idleness, save their weekly appeals to “the throne of grace.” But “even this shall pass away.” The world is fast finding out these Reverends are an expensive, a tyrannical, an aristocratic and a useless class. That they are giving their hearers and supporters no positive knowledge, but content themselves with dealing out the old superstitions that have existed for thousands of years. They tell the same stories and make the same appeals made centuries ago, and the world is tiring of it. Men no longer want old fables and antiquated errors, but knowledge, science and TRUTH.

For the immense sums the priesthood cost the world, they make very meagre returns, and large numbers are coming to this conclusion. This country alone, spends some two hundred millions of dollars annually for supporting its clergy and its churches. Christendom, entire, probably spends not less than five hundred millions of dollars. And what do they get in return? False theology, superstitious dogmas and darkening fables. Many are becoming fully convinced that priests know no more about God; no more about the Unseen; no more about the future than other men, and are gradually becoming convinced that they are not receiving from this privileged class the kind of teaching they require and are entitled to. That they are no better and no more moral than other men, proofs are piling up, day by day.

The world needs teachers, and always will, but they must be teachers of truth; teachers that can impart facts the world ought to know—the laws of nature, the great needs of the race—the truths of science and the path to usefulness and happiness. The Reverends, in a few more decades, can be dispensed with, but the teachers of science will ever be duly appreciated and rewarded.

WE EXTEND OUR WARMEST THANKS to those friends who have been prompt in complying with our request to renew. If the number is not as large as it should be, we are nevertheless grateful to those who have so promptly responded. We trust there are many more who will soon follow the good example. It is not pleasant for us to urge for money, and we do not suppose it is pleasant to our readers; but it is a matter of necessity. If we had funds of our own to keep the paper running we would not so often call for help, but our funds are used up and we need more. If we seem too urgent, our remarks are not for those who are prompt to come to our aid, but for those indifferent and negligent. We would be glad if all our readers were as interested in the mission of THE TRUTH SEEKER as a portion are; if so, we would scarcely ever need to say money.

Those who are still owing us for the last year, most excite our surprise and that so few of them are willing to remit us the trifling amount they owe us. As on every number of their paper is printed, on the tab, the date from whence they owe, it would seem they ought to be apprized that they are in arrears. Perhaps it will be necessary for us to print a list of the names of those who are either indifferent or unwilling to send us the price of the paper after taking it and reading it a year or more, that they themselves and others may know who we mean.

We would be glad if the feeling to support Liberal organs was more general among the Liberal public, and if it was not such an onerous task to spare two dollars a year to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER.

We again request those who do not want the paper longer, or are not willing to pay for it, to inform us at once or request their Post-Master to do so. We wish to send the paper to as many as possible, but cannot afford to do so, and pay postage too, without a slight remuneration.

As there are quite a number of sickly or faint-hearted friends that conclude they cannot longer support such an extravagance as THE TRUTH SEEKER, and order their paper stopped, we hope our live friends who take an interest in the continuance of the sheet, will try to send us as many new names as possible, that our list may not grow the wrong way. Those who may see these lines, and are not now subscribers, are requested to become so. Price, from Sept. 1st to Jan. 1st, fifty cents. After Jan. 1st it will be published weekly at two dollars a year. We will send it from Sept. 1st, 1875, to Jan. 1st, 1877, at $2.25. For three dollars we will send the paper for sixteen months and $1.25 worth of TRUTH SEEKER TRACTS. For seventy-five cents we will send the paper from Sept. 1st, 1875, to Jan. 1st, 1876 and forty cent's worth of Tracts. Friends, let us hear from you.

We are pleased to see friend Peterson, of Paris, Tex., is going to issue his Common Sense semi-monthly. That is right. Let us have plenty of good common sense.

The Reign of Law.

It is an accepted truth among scientific men of all nations, that the world of mind and world of matter, to the extent of their observations, is governed by inflexible law. This is the sentiment of the profoundest men of the age. Darwin, Leibeg, Huxley, Crookes, Dr. Carpenter, Dr. J. R. Buchanan, Prof. Agassiz, Prof. Winchell, and hosts of the ablest thinkers, accept this truth.

Even where perturbations exist, they are under the dominion of law. In the movements of planetary worlds, the gyrations of comets, oceanic and atmospheric currents, attractive repulsion, chemical combinations, electrical phenomena, at varied temperatures, in the production of storms, rain, snow, hail, &c., there is no dissent.

In the manifestation of mind, through the intellectual, moral, religious or spiritual, social, passionate or animal, and organic, the reign of law is absolute. The intellect receives ideas, weighs, analyzes, compares, and the will, or volition, decides according to the strength of the motive, or mental influence, in each individual mind. All minds will not be equally controlled by the same motives; and this depends upon the amount of general information and freedom from bias, in the pursuit of truth. Hence, the importance of thorough culture of reason—the highest powers and grandest light of the human soul. How can we reason but from what we know? And cultured reason demands demonstration, or self-evident truths. Hence, science is the palladium of reason, and proceeds, mathematically, from the known to the unknown quantities, truths, or principles, by induction.

Intellect arouses intellect, religion or spirituality—morality, begets its like. The region of health and energy, located in the superior posterior portion of the brain, induces healthful energy. Sociality excites sociality, passion, or animality awakens like emotions. Love, the master passion of the soul, enkindles love, throughout the entire range of mental activities. This influence is proportionate to the size, activity, and susceptibility of the organs addressed, and the strength of the influence applied. Uncultured minds swayed by the stale platitudes of bigots, become the dupes of dogmatic priests, and designing knaves, everywhere. The antidote is knowledge, and cultured reason.

Psychology, or soul-power, or influence of soul upon soul, or spirit upon spirit, is an accepted fact in Nature. The orator, with flashing eye and lofty mien, with his soul on fire with the truths he pours upon listening ears, moves them as the wind sways the forest. His power is psychologic, and may be used for evil or for good. Falschhood, held as truth, has had the baptism of psychology, and been christened holy ghost; and whether holy or unholy, depends upon the amount of positive truth involved.

Cursing a fig tree for not bearing fruit out of season, would not be very holy, though trumpeted with the zeal and psychologic energy of a Whitfield. The fall of man; total depravity; vicarious atonement; hell fire; miraculous conception; election and reprobation; punishing the innocent in place of the guilty, cannot be holy, because not true, in Nature, or fact, though taught under psychologic influence for eighteen centuries. I affirm the fact, that whatever is—is something, however sublimated or etheralized. Hence, this something that charms, magnetizes, controls, excites, psychologizes, sways mind, is imponderable, or spiritual, and as it is evolved by the brain and thrown off through the nerves, it is nervauric; and is not very dissimilar, whether emanating from the embodied or disembodied. There is a spiritual organization within the physical; counterparting every organ, gland and tissue; indestructible and individualized; so that identity cannot be lost. This is demonstrable by an array of facts, perfectly overwhelming to honest investigators, who will follow truth wherever it may lead, unbiased by any pet theories.

The eye does not see, nor the ear hear, but as medium of vibrations of light, and air, and the inner consciousness, or spirit cognizes the impression, and gets the idea. Thus, our senses which are as numerous as our organs—mental and corporeal—are entrapped with, and point to the object, sentiment, or principle to which the organ or sense is adapted, in the wide Universe. We cognize the sense, or sentiment of love and hate, harmony, discord, heat and cold, joy and sorrow, &c. The brain may be represented as a sphere, from which radiates in all directions—pathognomic lines, indicating the angle of manifestation of each faculty. Perceives, point forward; religious, upward; energetic, upward and backward; animal, downward and backward. Hence, we have the grand discovery first made by Dr. J. R. Buchanan, in 1841, and '2, and published in his Journal of Man, and in his Anthropology; that spheres of good and evil exist in man's original constitution; and in proportion as either preponderates, is he good or bad? As in the infant, the animal nature preponderates, so in the infancy of the race his animal organs were in the ascendant, and struggling up the battling centuries, his intellectual and moral, have expanded over the animal, until in this nineteenth century, his enlarged frontal and coronal brain, are sure prophecies of the coming man, in the golden age of the future.

Starting at a point, only one step in advance of the animal creation, one thousand centuries ago, his progress has been slow.

Only within this century has he arrived at knowledge by which his intellectual and moral powers may be advanced ten-fold, and in some cases one hundred-fold in one generation. And this is to be realized principally through the agency of mothers. How sublime are the possibilities of our race through this instrumentality? Educate the mothers! Educate the mothers, morally, spiritually, socially and physically. Give her freedom, love, and equal rights with man in the pursuit of happiness. Oh, man, how should thy soul bow in worship in the presence of pure, loving, and exalted woman, with all her god-like possibilities? Treat her not as a slave, menial or toy. I conjure you, take thy oppressive hand off her shoulders, and her sunshine—truth and love, she will reflect back on thee and thy posterity a thousand fold. Starve her soul, cripple her energies, blast her fairest hopes, poison her pure fountains of almost exhaustless love, bind her in maddening slavery to a life time of unrequited toil, and the very heavens will be hung in mourning, and our loved ones—now angels in spirit spheres—will weep over dwarfed, diseased, angular and demoralized humanity. As in individuals, so in nations, elevation is predicated upon the conditions of elevation. And so, of depression or degradation. Health is ours only, as we conform to the laws of health. Disease is the penalty of violated law. Every organic function of the body is controlled by corresponding organs in the inferior half of the brain. Each brain faculty secretes and discharges through its proper channels its own peculiar nervauric influence. Some are purifying to the blood, some tonic, some sedative, some exhilarating, some poisonous. Violent anger has so changed the mother's nurse, that death to her infant has sometimes been speedily produced. Some irritate, some produce chill, some heat. Increased action of muscle, or organ, augments the flow of blood, and hence gives more power and strength to it. The superior elevates the lower, in this rudimental state and in all the spirit circles and spheres, until evil, error, and angularity are displaced by harmonious spiritual natures, robed in light, love and truth. The laws of the Universe, emanating from the "great positive mind," are unchangeable in their bearings on the elevation and coronation of man. The conscious ignorance and weakness of man lead him to call for wisdom and strength. Hence he prays. Perceiving mighty forces about him whose object and influence he does not fully comprehend, he calls on God, Allah, Jove, or Lord, and peace calms his troubled breast, and he imagines the great power addressed, has directly answered his prayer; while it is only the action of his religious organs showering their benedictions upon his perturbed spirit. If he is a sensitive or medium, he may be entranced by spirit forces, and receive wisdom and guidance which he could not reach otherwise. This is his spirit birth. He is thence forward enraptured with minds of higher realms, and often ascends the mount of transfiguration, where light, truth, and love are poured upon his enraptured soul. God has established this order, working through all the spheres, including man in his rudimental state. This latter being lowest, is weakest in psychologic power. Men and women must prepare themselves for this holy ghost baptism. It is all natural, not miraculous—mankind must and will receive this. This divine afflatus is ready to descend upon souls prepared. Draw a line from the wing of the nose to where the hair radiates near self esteem. All organs anterior to it are elevating, purifying, health imparting, in vigorous action. All posterior are antagonistic, domineering, coarse, brutal, passionate and evil in excess. They are good servants, but hard masters—must be regulated by cultured intellect and strong moral organs. Earnest, frequent, enlightened prayer, changes the frontal and coronal brain with a large flow of blood and nervauric force; giving joy, peace, love, and heaven—irrespective of religious views, and if a strong medium ("the dear departed,") pour into the soul spiritual life and light; solving questions of immortality, science, love, business, health, physiology, geology, primitive man, and schools, colleges, laws, and society in spirit life. Mighty problems! absolutely beyond the natural ability of the petitioner; but answered, and blessed with the answer. Thus, the great positive mind planned the spheres, connected the lowest with the highest by inflexible law, which he never changes nor infringes, and in accord with which spirits help man—bring comfort in distress, and succor in peril.

Prayer brings happiness by coronal excitement of the moral group of organs, and superadded to this in sensitives is spirit afflatus—holy ghost baptism. But for this pishah height, the subject must be prepared. Where shall these artists be found, in a land of bigotry, superstition and spiritual darkness?

Mothers! we look to you as the divinely appointed mediums. Shall we look in vain? Here is deep water—the water of life—the ocean of maternity to which, all else for human weal should become tributary—on whose bosom the world may rest and grow strong. "An undevout philosopher is mad." Shall I say that of mothers? Not yet. She is only dwarfed, bound and helpless. Angels aid her; she needs it. Man prizes not her matchless wealth of love, affection and goodness as he should, which she would transmit to posterity, were conditions favorable. Statesman, moral heroes, musicians, philosophers, poets, might step upon the stage at her bidding, instead of undesired, angular and morally depraved beings. But she must be free. Free to think, to act; to choose her avocation and life partner.

Then study philosophy, music, physiology, phrenology, visit concerts, attend reform lectures, teach, or preach, and pray daily, travel and associate with the refined, pure and good. Do this in intense love of it. Fail not here. Subsist mainly on oat meal, unbolted wheat, rice, fruits, &c. Have plenty of active exercise, and at the inception of the new being, maintain total abstinence from sexual relations during embryotic development. This method will give to successors the supremacy of intellectual and moral powers, in perfect accord with benignant law; and man be translated from the hell of discord to the heaven of harmony. Thus, does prayer avail, refine, console, elevate, potentialize, and transform by a perfectly natural process; and mothers become the saviors, and redeemers of the race, instead of a crucified man. But prayer should be addressed to man; embodied and disembodied as our friends and allies, in the maintenance of divine harmony and the reign of law.

Charles Fourier.

BY SAMUEL LEAVITT.

Charles Fourier was born in 1772 (one hundred years ago you see) in Besancon, France. His father was President of the Tribunal of Commerce in that town. He inherited a small fortune, which the troops of the Revolution made way with; for investing his whole property in colonial produce, he saw his cotton bales taken for barricades and his sugar and rice to feed the patriots. But this did not set him against the people. His attention was first called to the necessity of social re-organization, by seeing some merchants throwing ship-loads of rice into the sea, to keep up the price during a famine.

In 1803 he published a scheme for the establishment of universal peace, which attracted the attention of Bonaparte. In 1808 he put out his first book, "The Theory of the Four Movements." His object was to display the identity of the four great departments—society, animal life, organic life and the material Universe. He claimed that, guided by analogy, he had discovered that the mechanism of society—no less than that of the heavenly bodies—is only in a normal condition when it is left to the influence of the law of gravitation; that, therefore, in order to restore harmony to society, it is only necessary to submit ourselves to the laws of attraction and repulsion that govern the human soul when left to itself. He had certainly struck upon a great and fruitful idea, but like most other specialists, he was so filled by it that he lost sight of many other equally important ideas, which must be equally heeded in any attempt to reform society. The fact so loomed up before him that, in a scientifically organized state of society, people could be good, and prosperous and happy without exercising the tenth part of the self-denial such people now find necessary, that he concluded that no self-denial at all was needed, and proceeded with prodigious skill and energy to construct a social system in which happiness and virtue should be produced by merely balancing all appetites and passions, impulses and aspirations against each other in one grand conglomeration of spontaneities.

The great books he wrote are a monument of human skill and labor, and he has said all that can be said on his side of the question, and indicated with marvelous minuteness and force how, by mere rearrangement of the external machinery of society, its jarring and friction can be reduced to a minimum. The one cause of his failure, and that of his stereotyped followers was, that they ignored and did not provide for this inevitable minimum. The cause of the success of so many of the religious socialists is, that they did provide for it.

Some fifteen years ago I waded through several big volumes of a French edition of his works, and became persuaded that, amid a great deal of rubbish, they contained the most valuable suggestions toward social reform ever put before the world. I will not enter, as his regular disciples do, into a rehearsal of all his curious doctrines about the twelve human passions. I think they have befogged a multitude of otherwise sensible people; just as the fanciful part of Swedenborg's works have befogged some of the finest minds of the world. I think also, that if nine-tenths of the writings of these two men had never got into print, the present age at least would have had much more for which to thank them. One great mistake Fourier made, is to be seen in his apparent supposition, that all mankind found it as difficult as the French do to be true to marriage vows. Seeing that the average French man and woman were apparently incapable of practical monogamy, he concluded that in a state of nature a sort of free-love would prevail, and so arranged his system to suit. He was wrong, I believe.

* The passions are a numerous crowd
Imperious, positive and loud
When they grow mutinous and rave.
They are thy masters—thou their slave."

Putting a modest estimate upon his services, he may be said to have shown once for all—How to make industry attractive; to nullify the cupidities by balancing them against each other; to make good use of emulation; to develop the best aptitudes of young and old; to cause a just and profitable division of labor; to give due work and remuneration to women and children; to bring agriculture and manufactures into right relations; to diminish the number of middlemen, and release commerce from the grip of trade; in short to reconcile capital and labor.

Said an eminent writer in the London Fortnightly Review: "Fourier has pointed out with admirable clearness, that the principle of the 'right of labor' is entirely incompatible with the existing civilization, for it depends, as he was shown, upon two conditions that are as yet far from being realized. It depends first upon industry being made so attractive in itself, that such a state as that of idleness becomes wholly unknown. Not till every human being of both sexes and of all ranks is engaged with the zeal of enthusiasts in labor, from the cradle to the grave, can the socialist dream of 'right of labor' be realized. It depends secondly upon great economy being introduced into all the relations of life." And this economy can only be effected by substituting association for the separate or individual system; by the increased industry and skill of laborers; by the abolition of many useless classes, and by the productiveness of the earth being largely augmented.

Fourier's system may be condensed thus: Many thousands of years have been spent, many millions of treatises written and sermons preached, in a fruitless endeavor to change the constitution of man's nature—to adopt it to the artificial constitution of society. The opposite task has now to be attempted. It is to alter the constitution of society—to suit the unalterable constitution of man.

Parke Godwin has pithily said: "Fourier alone has taken man for the unalterable term of the social problem."

As I wish to show rather what has been done practically to prove that the integral association of which Fourier is a chief apostle, does furnish a means of reconciling capital and labor, than to rehearse his programme, I will not particularize further here concerning his doctrines, but briefly touch the results of his teachings in France.

He made slow progress at first. When the press began to notice him, it was only to satirize. He waged war with the Saint Simonians and the Owenites; and at length in 1831 his labors began to tell in the conversion of many of the former to his doctrines, and they established a paper called La Phalanstère. Leading men of France now began to experiment in Fourierism, and by 1843 the doctrines were extensively professed throughout France. Many disciples had newspaper organs in England and America; they expounded the teachings in learned treatises in Germany and Spain, and sent out colonies to various parts of America. They excited great ferment in France. During the years preceding the Revolution, no writers depicted in darker colors the condition of the suffering poor, or denounced with greater eloquence and earnestness the injustice to which they were subjected.

Fourier died in 1837, before his views had become so popular. His birth-day was celebrated as an anniversary which drew pilgrims from all parts of the world. This festival is still maintained.

In 1843 the Phalange was published as a daily, and several newspapers in Paris and the provinces began to demand social revolution rather than political agitation. The cries of "organization of labor;" "the right to labor," that were now beginning to be heard so frequently in after-dinner toasts and in the mouths of the populace, were traced back to Fourier. The revolution came too soon for the Phalansterians, and Louis Napoleon suppressed their papers. The history of the introduction of the system in America, I have presented in the Phrenological Magazine.

The Lord's Wife.

In a late TRUTH SEEKER, Mr. Syphers shows a disposition to be unfair with the men who created the orthodox God and Devil, because they gave them no wives. Mr. S. is mistaken in part, perhaps in all. The Bible God was a married gentleman, as is plainly recorded in the 19th chapter of Genesis. The 24th verse says: "Then the Lord rained upon Sodom and upon Gomorrah, brimstone and fire from the Lord out of heaven."

25th. "And he overthrew those cities, and all the plain, and all the inhabitants of the cities, and that which grew upon the ground." 26th. "But his wife looked back from behind him, and she became a pillar of salt." If that doesn't say that the Lord's wife looked back, what does it say?

Since the Devil has improved so much since the Bible times, and been the first man in all works of progression, and is generally humane and intelligent, I am impressed with the idea that he has a wife who helps him in all this. I think he would become demoralized and idle, did not a Mrs. D. encourage him, and with her bright, womanly wit, make suggestions and plans for him to utilize. The old fellow would doze over the fire half the time but for her; and never would have discovered the uses of steam, electricity, etc., as he has. Depend upon it, he's married! EGYPT.

A Pious Letter and Reply.

WEST WINFIELD, July 2d, 1875.

TO MORGAN R. NICHOLS.

MY DEAR YOUNG FRIEND: The great enemy of souls has been permitted to assail your youthful heart by sore temptations, and your unstable mind by carnal reasonings. O return to the school of Christ! Do not longer grieve the spirit of the Lord by vain reasonings and subtle sophistries. Simply believe what the Lord has said unto you through the Bible. Call upon him to save a poor, weak wandering sinner from ruin's brink. And in after years it will be a wonder to you that a just God did not cut you off and cast you into hell—

"When through the flowery paths of youth, With heedless steps I ran."

I now address you in the sacred language of Scripture. "Remember thy Creator in the days of thy youth." It is my constant hope and prayer that the pious instructions you have received from teachers and friends, will yet make an abiding impression upon your mind—that a reconciled God in Jesus Christ will yet receive you, place a crown of glory upon your head, and fix your abode forever among the sons of light. But should you continue to follow Spiritualistic and Infidel companions, continually poisoning your intellect with vile trash, after all the prayers and efforts of your Christian friends, they will be forced to believe that God in his awful and mysterious purposes, has numbered you among those to whom he has sent strong delusions that they should believe a lie, that they might be damned. (2 Thes. ii. 11.) We shall regard it our Christian duty to guard our children from the corrupting influences which have led you astray, by timely withdrawing them from the society of one we regard as pernicious to the eternal welfare of their souls, and the baleful influences of his pestilent books and papers. Be warned in time. Return, and it will yet go well with you. Not only your future, but your present well being, depends upon your giving up your Infidel notions at once and forever. You have our prayers. When will you again come back to Christ's school?

Yours affectionately and prayerfully,

WELL-WISHER.

REPLY.—I fully understand the hidden threat implied in one of the closing clauses of the foregoing mixture of Christian cant and menace. "Your present well being depends upon your giving up your Infidel notions at once and forever." And if I do not, I am to be socially ostracized—am to have my reputation blackened by the hireling hypocrites of superstition, and even children will be taught to shun me in the streets as a walking pestilence. Unfortunately, I already know too well what the above guarded language implies. Robert G. Ingersoll, exactly states the matter thus: "Now and then somebody examines, and in spite of all keeps his manhood, and has the courage to follow where his reason leads. Then the pious get together and repeat wise saws, and exchange knowing nods and most prophetic winks. The stupidly wise sit owl-like on the dead limbs of the tree of knowledge, and solemnly hoot. Wealth sneers and fashion laughs, and respectability passes by on the other side, and scorn points with all her skinny fingers, and all the snakes of superstition writhe and hiss, and slander lends her tongue, and infamy her brand, and perjury her oath, and the law its power, and bigotry tortures, and the Church kills."

But thanks to the grand heroic Infidels who have secured to the race our sublime magna charta of civil and religious rights the Christian Church to-day is unable to kill the bodies of thinkers as it has in the ages gone. "You have our prayers," says this saintly sister. Has she never read that "if any two agree on earth, as touching anything that they should ask, it shall be done for them of my father which is in heaven?" And here in this small country village during the past winter, two orthodox churches have held revival meetings, deafening God with prayers for the conversion of sinners, and not one poor dying sinner's soul secured for Jesus. Two churches in full blast a whole season; nine or ten ranting ministers putting in their "best licks" for the help of the Lord against the mighty; three orthodox gods trying to pour their spirit into the hardened hearts of the people; and after all not a prayer answered—not one precious proselyte made ten-fold more the child of hell. What a prayer hearing and prayer answering God he must be! Why, I should suppose they would sour on such do-nothing deities.

My age is only nineteen years, but I already have had experience in two churches; that will suffice for me. I am already sufficiently sickened with Christian cant and twaddle, hate and hypocrisy.

"When will I come back again to Christ's school?" Well, I am reminded of Wm. Denton's reply to a Methodist minister, when asked a similar question: "Never, till the eagles go back to the eggs from which they were hatched." So say I. When will I go back? I do not mean to go backward, but forward. I have taken a through ticket on the grand car of progress, and that never goes back. No going back for me, if you please. That is all.

The True Saint.

BY S. P. PUTNAM.

Far in a desert cave a hermit stayed,
In pious solicitude, and daily prayed,
And did hard penances, and scourged his flesh;
And fasted oft; that so from out sin's mesh
He might arise, an angel of pure light,
And be the grandest on heaven's golden height;
Although indeed he never gave one bread.
Or cooled the thirsty lip, or offered bed
To weary traveler, or tilted the earth
That fruits and flowers might spring to fairest birth;
Such insignificant and common deeds
His holy saintship scorned; to count his beads
And moan, and bend his brow to dust, and call Himself a wretch, these were his duties, all.

His fame was spread abroad, the world admired
His useless life, as he himself desired;
For his humility was utmost pride,
To win men's praises he all worth denied.
If with good sense they had believed his word,
His soul with harshest anger had been stirred.

He wanted God to sound his praises too;
And so one day he begged with much ado
To know, who was the greatest saint on earth;
That he might find and initiate his worth;
Expecting that of course, God's voice would say,
"Thou art the greatest saint, the perfect ray Shines in thy soul; thou art most eminent."
For he was fishing for a compliment,
And bended low, that God might lift him high;
He crouched to earth; but meant to mount the sky.
To his surprise, God told him he must find
A strolling minstrel, who with careless mind
Went singing all the day from door to door.
If he would grow in virtue more and more,
He this poor player's life must reverence;
To be like him was saint-like excellence.

In great astonishment the hermit went
To see this wondrous saint pre-eminent;
He found him singing merrily away;
"Tell me," the hermit cried, "how thou dost pray;
What works perform; what penances endure.
That make thee in God's eyes so heavenly pure?"
The minstrel was amazed at such address,
And hung his head in shame and humbleness.
"O do not mock me father," he replied;
I never yet have prayed or even tried;
I've never done a single worthy deed;
I'm a poor sinner and for mercy plead;
I only go about from day to day,
To please the people as I sing and play."

"But," still the hermit, answered "in thy time
Thou must have done some holy deed sublime
To raise thy life so high in God's regard—Something deserving of a great reward."

"O no," the minstrel said with honest gaze,
I am not worthy of the slightest praise
From God or men; I never did a thing
That any honor to my life can bring."

"But hast thou always been so poor and low,
And led this idle life? The saint would know
What made thee such a beggar in the street;
With what strange mishaps did thy fortunes meet?
Sure vice hath never to this worthless trade
And aimless poverty, thy steps betrayed."

"O no," the minstrel said, "a simple tale,
The secret of my wanderings will unveil.
One day I saw a woman wild with fear,
Running from place to place, and villains near,
Who sought to take her forcibly away,
And make her beauty's wealth their helpless prey.
Her husband and her children had been sold
To slavery; she had no friends nor gold,
I took her to my cottage, gave her rest,
And kept her out of harm's reach as my guest.
I had a little money laid away—
I did not need it; 'twas enough to pay
The ransom—set her husband free,
And bring her children back to liberty,
And so I gave it to her—all I had,
Because 'twould make her heavy heart so glad.
This is the reason of my lowly plight,
A gift I had almost forgotten quite;
It was an act not worth remembering,
For many would have done the self-same thing."

Tears started to the aged hermit's eyes;
For a new gospel filled him with surprise.
"In all my long life I have never done
So good a work as this, or merit won
Like thine; and yet thou dost almost forget
The kindly deed that God in light will set
Above all prayer add fast and penance long,
Thou art the true saint with thy careless song."

RELIGION does not and cannot contemplate man as free. She accepts only the homage of the prostrate, and scorns the offerings of those who stand erect. She cannot tolerate the liberty of thought. The wide and sunny fields belong not to her domain.—Ingersoll.

Editor's Notes.

WE HAVE STILL ON HAND a few more "Patent Binders" for THE TRUTH SEEKER, a capital arrangement for holding the papers firm, and clean and convenient. Who wants one? Sent by mail, post-paid, for one dollar.

OUR FRIENDS will please excuse us for not acknowledging the receipt of money. We have no assistant and have hardly the time to write to all. We will credit each payment on our list and the next paper going out will show each subscriber when they are paid up to.

NAMES are daily coming in for our proposed work, "Lives of Noted Sages, Infidels and Thinkers," but we trust there are a large number who will want it who have not yet notified us. We now think we shall make the work of eight hundred pages, not to exceed three dollars in expense, but will be richly worth double the money. Those who feel like having a copy of the work will still please send in their names.

WE TRUST OUR READERS will remember we are still in the Book Trade. If you want books of any kind, please order them of us. We can make a little on them, and "every little helps" to grease the wheels. We shall soon have an assistant, when we will be able to fill orders for books with much greater promptness. When editor, proof-reader, general correspondent, book-keeper, errand-boy and outside-man are all combined in one person, it is not strange he should sometimes be slow in filling orders. We trust hereafter there will be much greater promptness on our part.

OUR FRIEND, D. H. CLARK, AND WIFE, recently called upon us while changing their residence from New Milford, Pa., to Florence, Mass. For some sixteen months. Mr. Clark has been regular speaker to a Liberal society at the former place, but now he has had "a call" to the Free Congregational Society of Florence, where a fine free hall has been erected and a goodly number of progressive, intellectual people have made a full escape from the meshes and bonds of theological superstition.

We had hoped Bro. Clark would decide to enter the Liberal lecture field, as he possesses abilities of a high order for that service; but undoubtedly it will be pleasanter for him and his family for him to be located. We wish Mr. and Mrs. Clark much happiness in their new home at Florence.

D. R. BURT. We intended in our last to have noticed a recent visit to this city, of our good friend, D. R. Burt, of Dunleith, Ill. He spent three weeks or more with us, and was kept very busy in ministering to the sick and afflicted. He possesses remarkable magnetic power, and by "laying one of hands" and other manipulations, he speedily removes the most severe pains and physical troubles. Many here can testify to the benefit received from him. Some cases came under our own notice that were quite remarkable. Friend Burt is a positive Materialist, and does not attribute the healing power he possesses to spirit influence, but simply to natural laws and forces. In psychology, animal or personal magnetism, powers of the mind and will, the world has much yet to learn.

The genial temper, kind sympathy and true friendship of Bro. Burt, make him a welcome visitor, and we hope many months will not pass away before he visits us again. He is a real friend to THE TRUTH SEEKER and wishes to see it prosper. May he live many years to enjoy life and the pleasure of doing good.

OUR PLIMPTON HALL SPEECH on "The Gods of Superstition and the God of the Universe," will in a few days be issued in pamphlet form, containing also the discussion which followed the lecture; there being some fifty pages of it. Single copies will be mailed for 8 cents; four for 25 cents; a dozen for 70 cents, or twenty for one dollar. We mean to furnish them at cost very near, to induce a wide circulation. We are receiving many very complimentary letters of the lecture, and the wish is often expressed that it may be widely circulated. It is believed it will be a very effective document for general distribution among enquiring minds. Many orders have been received for it and we trust a much greater number will still come.

"BENNETT'S PRAYER TO THE DEVIL." A tract of ten pages will be issued at the same time, at 2 cents each; 20 cents per dozen, or $1.25 per hundred, sent by mail. This little affair is thought to be new, and original, and is doubtless destined to be largely circulated. The two will be mailed for 10 cents.

THE TRUTH SEEKER TRACTS. These little evangels of truth and light are being ordered pretty largely. The enterprise promises quite as much success as we anticipated. If money was not so much like "hen's teeth," we doubt not the call for them would be still greater. The price at which we furnish them, really affords but small profit, but that is not the leading motive; we wish to spread the glad tidings of freedom and truth. Our object is to furnish them so cheaply that Liberal societies and individuals can afford to buy them freely, for gratuitous distribution.

We intend about the close of the present year to issue two volumes of THE TRUTH SEEKER TRACTS, put up both in paper and in cloth, containing some 400 pages or more, each. They will be furnished at very reasonable prices, and we hope all our friends will want at least one copy. How is it?

FLOATING HOSPITAL OF ST. JOHN'S GUILD. We would call attention to this most commendable enterprise. The Trustees of this Society have fitted up a large new barge which makes tri-weekly free excursions for the express benefit of destitute and sickly children of this city, without distinction of creed, race or nationality, and is under the special supervision of the Rev. Alvah Wiswall, master; William Thurman, M.D., Medical Adviser; Oswald Otten-dorfer, President, and J. P. Solomon, Secretary. The Trustees are twenty in number, and embrace many of our first citizens.

Donations of food from those able to contribute are respectfully solicited. The movement is a most deserving one. It gives the children of indigent parents an opportunity of having a pleasant ride upon our rivers and affords them the luxury of pure air three times a week. When it is known that 1,300 children died in this city in two weeks, the importance of the enterprise can be appreciated. The address of the Secretary is 319 Broadway.

Book Notices.

HOW TO LIVE LONG, or Health Maxims, Physical, Mental and Moral. We have received from the publishers, Hurd & Houghton, of this city, Dr. W. W. Hall's new book by this title. In its three hundred sixteen 12mo. pages, it contains over fourteen hundred valuable practical common sense maxims, regarding health, sickness, diet and regimen. It has been many a day since we have seen a work of the kind, containing such a fund of useful knowledge. Dr. Hall is the author of several valuable books, but none equal to the one before us. It would be well could every family have a copy of it, and thus save many dollars in doctor's bills and nauseous drugs. Sent, post-paid, by mail, for $1.50. We have it for sale.

REVIEW OF THE BEECHER TRIAL. Every one should send for a copy of this; published by the New York Times. It is admitted to be the ablest thing that has been written upon the subject. The entire evidence is examined in the most thorough manner, and the subject most partially reviewed. It is selling rapidly; the fourth edition has been called for in a short time. We will mail it to any one for twenty-five cents.

WE would call attention to our advertising columns to two pamphlets we have for sale. First, "THE DRAMA OF DECEIT," a sprightly, spicy, satirical poem on the Brooklyn Scandal. Second, "Religion and Science; or, Christianity, Religion and the Bible vs. Philosophy and Science," by Dr. J. Pilkington. It is an able little work, and well worth perusing. Price, twenty-five cents, or the two for thirty-five cents, sent by mail.

VICK'S FLORAL GUIDE. No. 4. for the present year of this charming Quarterly is upon our table. Our readers hardly require from us a description of this publication. The present number is the last for 1875. It is mainly devoted to hardy bulbs and house plants, with numerous beautiful illustrations. The first number of VICK'S FLORAL GUIDE for 1876 will be ready by Dec. 1st. It will be much enlarged from previous years, and costs only twenty-five cents per year, and is sent gratis to those who purchase one dollar's worth of his seeds. We know of no way in which twenty-five cents can be better employed. We advise every one of our readers to send twenty-five cents to James Vick, of Rochester, N. Y., for his Quarterly Floral Guide for 1876.

A Card from B. F. Underwood.

MR. EDITOR: My vacation ends this month. About September 1st, I enter upon another campaign. During the month of September I will be in New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio; during October, in Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, and Illinois. I have engagements to meet in Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, and Missouri, which States I shall again visit as soon as I can get to them. The next campaign will be the most active, and I trust, the most successful of my life.

Associations or individuals wishing my services in the States herein named, should address me at once, at the Investigator office, Boston, Mass.—my permanent address. Subjoined is a list of subjects on which I will speak. Respectfully yours,

B. F. UNDERWOOD.

Spiritism vs. Christianity.

Christianity would have been self-annihilated ere this day, if it had ever had a moiety of the internal discords and self-inflicted injuries to contend with, that have borne hard on Spiritualism. While Christianity has nothing but tradition and the dead past upon which to lean, Spiritualism has the living miracle of to-day, which renders this movement a live one, and it deserves well of humanity for what it has already done in freeing the human mind from the tyranny of Sectarianism.

LA ROY SUNDERLAND.

The Christian Faith.

This is such an intensification of credulity as creates "the evidence of the unseen" (Heb. xi. 1), or the unknown and unknowable, and upon which the mind implicitly relies. This faith is a trust that culminates in action, mental and nervous. It is a power in certain temperaments which induces the trance, and converts the sinner in revivals; and in certain cases it is sufficient to interfere with the vital forces, so as to cause the instant death of its victim, as in the case of the prisoner who was killed by being made to believe he was actually bleeding to death. And also in the two cases referred to in Acts v. 5. If that account be true, Ananias and his wife were killed by their faith as certainly as that any one is saved by it.

LA ROY SUNDERLAND.

Liberal Hall.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Dear Sir: I was much interested in friend Codman's letter in your issue of Aug. 1. I am one of those in favor of organization and unity of action among Liberals. I am also in favor of the "Temple of Reason" in New York. If the friends of truth were willing to make one-half the effort to propagate sound thinking, and rational, wholesome views of life, which is made by Christians in the propagation of pernicious and degrading superstitions, we might have very soon a building in New York, as fine as the Paine Memorial, and even as much more capacious and noble than the Boston Temple, as New York exceeds her sister city in wealth and population.

The importance of having a centre of reformatory influences in New York—a commodious place to be a home of the Liberal Club, THE TRUTH SEEKER, and a publishing house controlled in the interest of Free Thought literature, and a rallying point for all the activities of our growing party, can hardly be overestimated.

I am ready to do my share towards such an enterprise, and would not now throw a damper upon a serious effort in that direction. Unless I greatly mistake them—our Boston friends—including the editor, and the proprietor of the staunch old Investigator, would do all they could to help us in such an effort. However, if I may suggest a policy, I would say, let us first take hold with more vim and first help them pay off most of the indebtedness they were obliged to incur in their individual names for the final success of the Paine Hall.

Let us rally the Liberals of the country to the prompt lifting of that debt from the shoulders of those who assumed it, to the placing of such institutions as THE TRUTH SEEKER, and Sonnerby's Radical publishing house upon the road to substantial prosperity, and then we can commence our "Temple of Reason" with plenty of strong, generous and grateful friends to back us.

The Boston enterprise was first started—if I am not mistaken—by a writer in the Investigator, of Nov. 16th, 1870, and was followed in the paper of Dec. 7th, 1870, with "A Proposition to Lufidels," by Mr. Mendum, dated, Augusta, Ga., Nov. 23d, 1870. His proposition met with approval by many friends of that paper, and had the effect to draw together a meeting of Liberals to devise some measures to carry out that proposition.

At that meeting four men were appointed for the purpose, and at a subsequent meeting a fifth name was added.

From the commencement, the friends of the Investigator began to contribute and send in words of encouragement and promises to help, and the confidence in the ability, wisdom and integrity of Messrs. Mendum and Seaver was so great and widespread among Liberals, that contributions were sent upon their mere word that they would so receive and apply funds to the best of their ability.

A stock corporation was suggested, but sagacious heads advised otherwise. The history of Radicalism is strewn with the wrecks of unwieldy and incoherent corporations. Concentration of power has been found to be the only practical road to success. Some earnest friends wished that the number of managers be no more than actually necessary to carry out the plan suggested originally. The stock plan was therefore abandoned. Contributions came in slowly, but enough to encourage the movement. And in 1872, James Lick of California, an old subscriber to the Investigator, made his very liberal donation which gave the movement an impetus boding prompt success.

But this enterprise cannot be exactly repeated in New York, or elsewhere in America.

There are no Liberals in New York who have been known so long and well as Messrs. Seaver and Mendum. A cleaner hearted, whiter-souled man than Horace Seaver does not live. I never to this day heard his integrity called in question, and it certainly never was seriously questioned by any one who has seen and known him personally.

Mr. Mendum's character was equally above suspicion. The universality of this confidence in him was deeply impressed upon my mind a few days since in a conversation with the oldest Radical bookseller in New York—Dion Thomas, who had dealt with Mr. Mendum many times longer than I have, but held, even more firmly if possible, an absolute trust in his (Mr. Mendum's) honesty of purpose.

Mr. Mendum began as an apprentice in a printing office, and has held his way right steadily on, while some of us who thought ourselves wiser and abler have lost years and fortunes in the unsuccessful effort to rival him as Radical publishers.

For nearly forty years those now memorable men, have toiled on together—one with the pen, and the other with the types—the only untailing and unfaltering standard bearers of Free Thought in our land.

It was felt that they had earned the full and implicit confidence of all honorable and well-reasoning men. It was felt that whatever they did in this matter would be right. The person who could start a suspicion against them must be of a very unhappy disposition. Mr. Lick who became dissatisfied with trustees of his other benefactions, has expressed great satisfaction with the success of these. For my part, I consider their simple word combined with their past success as a stronger bond of confidence in their management, than that of a bushel of charters or other legal documents.

I intend to double my yearly contribution within this year, and would take this occasion to urge all others to pour in contributions and pay the debt, and put the future of the Boston enterprise beyond all reasonable doubt.

Now our own circumstances are quite different. We must of course have some different and more complex and cumbersome organization than that in Boston, notwithstanding its attending perils. Though for my part, I could give the same confidence to yourself, friend Bennett, and Mr. Codman, as to Messrs. Seaver and Mendum. I think Mr. Codman knows something about organization in London and Paris, such as Bradlaugh's "Hall of Science," society, the Positivist societies, and the Secularists. Will not he or some other brother tell us about them, and oblige, Yours sincerely,

ASA K. BUTTS.

Letter from D. R. Burt.

MR. EDITOR: In the last number of THE TRUTH SEEKER I noticed, with much pleasure, that our friend, M. Altman, made you a splendid donation of fifty dollars to aid in the cause of Free Thought. Honor to him for that act, from the Liberal Press, and a long and grateful anthem of thanksgiving from an enslaved and priest-ridden people. O! that I could plead with every Liberal to follow the noble example of our worthy friend, to aid in the deliverance of an enslaved world, to free them from the belief in the supernatural, to induce them to love truth and righteousness, to learn the forces and laws of Nature, to live in harmony with them, and to command them and be happy.

Let every man that loves the cause lend a helping hand in this time of great need, from the amount our friend gave, down to the smallest sum. Friends, let us see your generosity, your love and magnanimity for the suffering cause. Your reducing, Mr. Editor, your publishing and living expenses to the lowest mark, leaves still great need for aid.

With confidence in the Liberal public, and high hopes of speedy and generous relief, I remain, fraternally, Your obedient servant, D. R. BURT.

The Author Hero—Paine.

BY THOMAS CURTIS.

When buried heroes come to life,
And speak in memories of the past,
Columbia's army in the strife
For liberty, shall not be lost.
And nobly marching with the throng,
"Who fought and bled for freedom's reign."
Shall come the man of thought and song,
The "author hero," Thomas Paine.

When France shall lift her banners fair,
And brighter hopes shall dawn once more,
In counting up her jewels rare,
She'll not forget the days of yore.
For when the name of Lafayette
Shall summon others in its train,
There's one they never will forget,
"The author hero," Thomas Paine!

When England's pride shall be to sing
Of those who swell her grand array,
More noble yet than lord or king,
Great nature's aristocracy;
By meed of service fitly done,
By manhood raised in heart and brain;
Recalled shall be her outlawed son,
The "author hero," Thomas Paine.

When priestcraft dies amid the shouts
Of men who act with "common sense,"
And creeds their folly prove, in doubts
Which end in proving their pretence;
And when the "age of reason" brings
That better day, we'll ne'er complain.
And talk no more of priests and kings,
But of our hero, Thomas Paine!

And when the world shall learn the tale
So finely told by noble deed,
They'll from his memory lift the veil
Now resting on the mighty dead.
And in his place aloft he'll stand,
And priests may howl and curse in vain;
For truth and justice, hand in hand,
Shall keep our hero, Thomas Paine!

GEN. SPINNER's father was a German priest, his mother was a German nun; but somehow love slipped into the cloister and abbey and triumphed over monastic vows. Although the civil laws of their native country sanctioned their marriage, their church forbade it, so they emigrated to America, settling in Herkimer county, New York, where the General was born.

It is very creditable to the General that in the recent thorough examination of his accounts amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars, everything was found entirely correct.

Dry Goods Price-List.

Thousands in the country are constantly debating the question of prices in dry goods. They go to the most popular store in the neighborhood, and fail there to learn for a certainty whether fair prices are charged or not. Other thousands are not only seeking honest and fair prices, but they want also reliable information in regard to the styles of goods most in demand. Now, all such persons should send a letter to the highly respectable and reliable firm of M. Altman & Co., and ask for their new Price-list. This enterprising and well-known dry goods firm have taken this method of popularizing their business in every section of country. This Price-list, containing thirty-two pages of closely printed matter, gives a minute description of a $250,000 stock of Dry Goods, Fancy Goods, Millinery Goods, Ladies' and Gents' Furnishing Goods, Ladies' and Children's Undergarments, Costumes, Cloaks, Basques, Hosiery, Gloves, Jewelry, Laces, Trimmings, Parasols, Umbrellas, Notions and the thousand and one articles usually sold in first-class city houses. It will be sent, free of cost, to any one sending address and postage stamp for mailing the same.

We have examined this Price-list, and find that it teaches its readers how to order goods. The description it gives of every article is so perfect and complete as to make the selection extremely easy and certain of giving satisfaction. This firm will give their best attention to the execution of all orders, and they agree to refund the money in every case where the goods turn out different from their representations. The standing of the house is such that we cheerfully vouch for the truth of whatever they say. Address M. ALTMAN & Co., corner 6th avenue and 19th street, New York.—EDITOR INDEPENDENT.

[We know and have known Mr. Altman and his manner of doing business for some time, and are fully enabled to endorse the views of our contemporary, and although we seldom agree in matters theological, we are pleased to accord our hearty concurrence with its judgment in reference to our friend MORRIS ALTMAN. He is just getting out his new Fall and Winter Price-list, containing accurate descriptions and the lowest price of House-furnishing Goods, such as Sheetings, Towels, Blankets, Quilts, etc., as well as his full assortment of Ladies' Suits, made up in the latest styles in Alpaca, Poplins, Reps, Merinos, Cashmere Silks, Camel's Hair Goods, etc., etc., as low as $10 each, and as high up as $300.

This Price-list is sent free to all our readers who may send a stamp and their address, and those hesitating to send stamp, together with those finding themselves unable to furnish stamp, he will send the Price-list to by sending address. Mr. Altman is also anxious that Liberals who may send for his Price-list should distribute them freely in their towns and villages.—ED. T. S.]

The Great Iron Cyclops.

BY JAMES MC CARROLL.

The Great Iron Cyclops came down through the night

At a pace that seemed never to tire;
And the echoes around him cried out in affright
As he thundered along, in his terrible might,
With his plume of smoke spangled with fire.

And to rival the strides of the tempest he sought,
"Till it rode, like a footman behind;
For his swift, flashing limbs were mysteriously wrought
Of the thews and the sinews of ages of thought,
"Till they coped with the speed of the wind.

Through deep-cloven mountains, and valleys he flew,
And through sullen wastes rugged and bare,
While the cities in handfals behind him he threw,
And his breath in hot gusts through his nostrils he blew
As a whale blows the seas in the air.

But through regions of silence and coldness and gloom
Though he sped his miraculous way,
They burst forth anon into sunshine and bloom,
While the Spirit of Commerce leaped forth from their womb,
And shook out her young plumes to the day.

For the nations that long had lain buried in sleep,
Now awoke, with a start at his roar;
While the lone maiden-ships, that had toiled on the deep,
And had pined for a spouse, felt their white bosoms leap
As he called them in crowds to the shore.

And still onward he sweeps, toward far distant strands,
With his banner of progress unfurled,
Binding blue seas together and linking strange lands,
And urging the whole human race to strike hands
"Till one pulse shall pervade all the world!"

THERE has been more rain in July and August of this year than in the same two months in any year in half a century. Pluvius has been bountiful.

Bible of Nature vs. The Bible of Men.

BY JOHN SYPHERS.

These two great books—the one made by God, the other made by man—have each collected around them a party of friends and admirers. Those two parties are, from the very nature of things, antagonistic to each other. A perpetual war has been waged for centuries by those two parties. The party in the interests of the man-made book have always been the aggressive party. They open the battle by always making the first attack. They are the party of war, bloodshed and persecution. The other party is the party of peace. They never persecute; they never commence a quarrel. They all mind their own business; admire and study continually the great book of Nature; are all noted for possessing good mental powers, with cultivated reason, and of a scientific turn of mind.

Without these qualifications, none can belong to the said party of the first part. They are indispensable. Their religion is a natural religion, and very liberal. They are not particularly on the aggressive, but quiet and retiring. They wish no quarrel with the party who worship as an idol, a book made by art and composed of leather, rags, paper and lamp-black, but push along their investigations of nature quietly but boldly, following wherever her laws and principles may lead them, no matter if it chance to be directly across or contrary to the teachings of that other book. No book or bible can have precedence before the teachings of the great volume of Nature. If the world ever becomes wise unto salvation, they must do it by the patient study and application of the great principles of the only divine volume of inspiration—the Bible of Nature.

These naturalists are a very independent class of investigators, and in them the world, society and civilization have much hope and a great deal at stake. In following out established laws to their legitimate results, they never stop to inquire whether it will bring them into collision with that other party, or with that other Bible. Neither do they care. They strike down into the bowels of the earth, and there find the footprints of the Almighty, and the outlines of the only true history of creation laid down in the geological strata, full of the fossilized remains of former races of men and animals, some time during the countless ages of the long ago. They preserve and follow up this trail until they discover an abundance of material among the periods of fossiliferous remains to establish and build up a science, a history of the formation and evolution of the world. Their discoveries disclose the fact that this world has been incalculable periods of time going through its various formations, laying down strata after strata full of the petrified remains of organic bodies belonging to the animal and vegetable kingdoms.

The men of science are the world's only true benefactors. They point their telescopes upward, and their microscopes and drills downwards and then push things, no matter if they discover a thousand facts a day that squarely contradict the Bible. The Bible must square itself with science and nature, and where it fails to do so, then it must stand aside and out of the way. The Bible party have served many injunctions upon the men of science, trying to stop their operations, declaring that they themselves were the only true party—theirs the only true Bible, and its history the only true history of creation that would ever be vouchsafed to men.

Their Bible declares that God made the world mechanically, and in six days, and rested on the seventh, and that there was no use of fretting and worrying and turning the world upside down to hunt evidence to prove anything to the contrary. They declared it wicked and absolutely dangerous for any set of men to do so. He made the world in six days, and made it out of nothing too. But the party of the first part declare unto the party of the second part that there is no use talking, the thing won't do. God cannot be the author of both books, the discrepancies between them are too great. If God rested on the seventh day, he must have been tired, otherwise how could he rest? This is altogether too manish.

The great God of Nature never gets tired; it is only the god of theology whom men have created in their own image, who gets tired and has to lie by for rest and recuperation. Of course he slept a part of the time while he was taking his rest, and dreamed, no doubt. An outline of the career of man upon this newly made world, passed through the deific vision in dim historic shadows—no doubt. The testimony of the rocks and many other witnesses which geology now brings into court, and from whose testimony there can be no appeal, deposes, declares, and affirms that the time which has elapsed since this world beat her first notes to sound the march of time, cannot be computed by mathematical numbers. How are you, six thousand years? This will do for babies and feeble-minded people. The gentlemen of the Bible party talk, act and reason like little babies who are waiting for growth of mind; their bible is only a primer, designed only for children. A world made in six days—only one hundred and forty-four hours—think! Their book represents God as having had children! The child Jesus is said to be one of his sons. How manish, low and heathenish are all such ideas. There must be some mistake about these two books. They both cannot be from the same God. The marks of the manish origin of the Bible are too plain to be mistaken—they stick out all over it. If it had not been for that book the world would have been full of a race of philosophers by this time, instead of the batch of sects that we now see, each one blowing its own fog-horn, keyed upon different notes and playing different tunes. A house fearfully divided against itself, and of course it must tumble! Our book is the only true book, and our God the only true God of Nature. Gentlemen, let me beseech you to lay aside your book made by art; the money and learning which you are wasting upon it, and the brains which you are wearing out, should all be devoted to the study of our Bible, the great book of nature. It has no original to get lost, as you say that yours has. Ours needs no councils of drunken bishops to sit upon it, to pass upon it, to vote parts of it in and out of the sacred canon, in accordance with the caprice of an uninspired, self-appointed council. Ours needs no new translations nor revisions to correct its thousands and tens of thousands of mistakes and errors. Our Bible cannot be interpolated nor mis-stated. It is easily understood; its language is not theological, but pure, plain, easy and natural.

All civilization and progress have sprung from our book and from it alone. Your book teaches you that our earth has foundations and ends. Ours teaches us that it is round and has no foundations nor ends. Your book teaches you that the sun and the moon can be stopped in their course. Ours teaches us that it cannot be done without our solar system flying all to pieces! Astronomy is one of the most beautiful and astonishing of the natural sciences. It was discovered alone by the study of our book—the book of nature, which is the parent and mother of all the sciences. Our book is a divine revelation, divine, because it is natural, and consequently true. One of the divine revelations of our book outstrips all imagination. It is that all those little twinkling shining stars above us, are mighty orbs and ponderous worlds! Many of them hundreds of times larger in their magnitude, latitude and longitude, than the one on which we dwell. Your book regards them as but so many little shining points in the firmament, which God created in a few minutes on the fourth day. God, through Moses, came very near forgetting to mention them in his account of the creation. It is evidently an after-thought with him, which he put in as a postscript thus: "He made the stars also." The study of the book of nature reveals unto us that God is not half done making our world yet. Creation is still going on. Galileo was a faithful and indefatigable student, and minister of the bible of nature, and made astonishing discoveries in the upper stories of this Universe. But as his discoveries were altogether different from your book, your persecuting party went for the poor old philosopher like so many fiends, and caused him to spend fourteen years of his useful life in the dreary solitude of a loathsome prison. Yes, gentlemen, it was your party who went forth against him, with your bible in your hand, and in the name of your God, committed this foul and disgraceful deed. No difference whether you were called Catholics or Protestants, it was the bible party as arraigned against the men of science. You have fought science and progress, with your bible in your hand at every step they have taken, and persecuted their friends even unto death. What is more plain, than that science is the mother of art and invention, and that these alone have brought civilization to the world. You have always been in the past, and are to-day the strongest enemies that exist to progress and a higher civilization. Your superstitious and ignorant party thought, no doubt, that they were doing God service when they brought that poor old man, Galileo, to his knees, and for fear of death at your hands, made him eat his own words and stultify his own soul. If he had not done so, fanatical bible men would have caused his noble head to have been severed from his body, and the royal blood which flowed through his noble heart and veins to have spurted out upon the ground. All this and ten thousand times more, have you done, with your bible in your hands, in the name of your Church, your religion and your God. Gentlemen, the history of your party is a disgrace to the world. I wonder that you could ever look a man who knows your history, square in the face; yet you have the impudence and hardihood, after that our party and the influence of our bible have raised the world up to its present exalted plane of light, knowledge and civilization, to turn around and claim that it was all brought about by you and through the influence of your books! This caps the very climax of all the exhibitions of impudence and cheek that the history of the world affords. Gentlemen, we claim to be the party—we, the men of science, have brought learning and civilization to the world, and we did it in spite of you, for you fought us at every step. Whenever we proclaimed to the world that the great car of progress was about to receive an onward impulse by the discovery of some new principle, your party became greatly alarmed and rushed forward with your arms full of bibles and cast them under its wheels—being fools enough to think that by so doing you could either stop its progress, or throw it off the track. Behold your great mistake. The great car of progress moves right along, leaving you far in the rear. You are now, since you see our success and popularity, trying to hitch on to our train, but we shall put the cow-catcher on at the back end of the train to prevent you from making a raid upon us!

No, gentlemen, if I belonged to your party, knowing the record it has made in the history of the past, I would call for the rocks to fall upon me and hide me from the just indignation of a frowning world. Your doom is fixed—your fate is sealed—and you now plainly see that you cannot run institutions based on theology alone; hence you are mixing them up with that science which you have fought so unsuccessfully. You now desire to hitch on to our train, seeing plainly enough that theology by itself cannot stand. All our educational institutions are organized to teach science, and then you stealthily try to slip in your theology on the sly. Don't fool yourselves by thinking that we don't notice all your sly tricks.

Roll on thou mighty car of progress—roll,
Freighted with the world's only hope and destinies,
The ruthless hand of bigots, blind,
Shall never play upon the throttle valves
Of thy mighty engines!

Christians at Work.

BY WM. MC DONNELL.

There have been saints in all ages, and in all nations, Pagan as well as Christian. As boors without personal worth, or the least trace of natural nobility, can, even at the present day, be created temporal Lords, so the vilest of sinners, without a single ray of holiness can still be baptized or elevated into saints. The Church has ever been ready to canonize its favorites, no matter what the world might think of them or of their absurd or almost miraculous transition from fiends to spirits of light. If Pope or Prince recognized their services, from either a spiritual, political, or peculiar point, it was easy to cancel sins, venial or mortal, to pronounce absolution, and therefore with the sacred sponge of authority, to wipe out every stain. High Priests of all creeds have, for a consideration, generally been willing to transform hideousness into beauty, and to change the sordid, brutal character of some obsequious tyrant into one of meekness and purity deservings of a prominent position even in Paradise. It might not be easy to determine how much folly, how much virtue or how much vice would be sufficient to establish a claim for canonization, but it is well known that characters noted for great servility, for great inhumanity, or for great atrocities, have alike been elevated to the peerage of the celestial realm.

Now, without much seeking for illustrations as to why some have received such special spiritual distinction, we all know that in Hindostan the fanatic Brahmin who tore his flesh with iron hooks, or let his finger nails grow through the back of his hand, won the veneration of true believers, and was esteemed a saint; that the dervish or Mohomedan monk, whose life was spent in prayer and penury, and who was ready to destroy an unbeliever to secure celestial glory, was likewise a saint; and we also know that Christian fakirs, like their originals in India, were canonized by the Church; one, because he had doled out a miserable existence, squatted and squalled, on the top of a high pillar, as did Symon the stylite; another like St. Francis, because he has lived in a cave in rags and filth. One because he could periodically lash and persecute himself; another, because he could systematically lash and persecute somebody else.

Then, besides these, there is a curious tribe known as National Saints, whose annual worship is generally a grand debauch, and whose reputed exploits are mostly as mythical as the origin of the saints themselves. St. George is venerated in England, probably because he is said to have killed a fiery dragon, and a multitude of ignorant Christians actually believe that as a noted bare back rider, he performed that distinguished feat.

St. Patrick is almost adored in Ireland, partly because it is believed that he banished snakes from the emerald Isle, and partly because, by the convincing exhibition of a simple shamrock, he so impressed the minds of the Pagan Irish as to make them believe that there were three superior deities instead of one. And what St. Andrew did for Scotland, St. David for Wales, St. Dennis for France, Augustine for the Saxons, or Boniface for Germany, may be arrived at as correctly by a simple guess as by the perusal of any particular record in their behalf.

Among some of the latest worthies which the Roman Church has authoritatively added to the array of saints, we find the name of Peter D' Arbuss, who was Inquisitor General of Arragon in 1484, and an active persecutor of the heretics. Ignatius Loyola, the gloomy fanatic and founder of the crafty, unscrupulous order of Jesuits, was canonized by Pope Gregory XV. in 1663; and, centuries before that, the savage St. Dominic, who advocated and secured the establishment of the "Holy Inquisition," and who, as some assert, was the first Inquisitor General of that infamous tribunal, was officially included among the blessed by Pope Gregory IX in 1223. This very St. Dominic was he who instigated the Pope against the Albigenses, and who aided and encouraged the brutal Montfort in a further course of persecution.

After the slaughter at Beziers, Count Simon De Montfort, the beloved avenger of the Church, was now leader of the "Holy Army," and he followed up his atrocious proceedings in different places, some of which proceedings are thus recorded by Catholic authors. "He took several castles which resisted the Holy Church, and hanged of good right many of their inhabitants upon gibbets, which they had well merited." Relative to another place, the historian says: "The besieged, wearied out with a long siege, having fled during the night, were stopped by our guards, who cut the throats of as many as they could find." And of another place: "The Count Simon having taken the castle, caused the above named Aimeri, a notable nobleman, to be hanged upon a gibbet, also a small number of knights. The other nobles, with some who had mixed among them in the hope that the knights would be spared, to the number of about eighty, were put to the sword, and lastly, some three hundred heretics burnt in this world were thus given over by him to the eternal fire, and Guirande, the lady of the chateau, cast into a well, was there crushed down with stones."

After a series of butcheries during the first year of the crusade against the Albigenses, the "holy army," with its numerous reinforcements commenced its second year's campaign by taking, with other places, the castle of Brom, when about one hundred of its defenders were shockingly mutilated; their noses were cut off, and their eyes were torn out; but one individual was left one eye so that he might be able to conduct the Christian savages to the town of Carabat. All through their terrible course, the taking of several other castles and towns was followed by similar atrocities; prisoners were offered the choice of apostasy, or fire, or mutilation. When Montfort advanced to the attack of Toulouse, the peasants laboring in the field were slaughtered—men, women and children were butchered—villages, cottages, and farm-houses were burned to the ground, and the Pope's legate also ordered the destruction of the vines, and the whole of the standing crops. Thus, when town after town had surrendered, Montfort was sure to order the execution of the inhabitants, and thus for over twenty years were the Albigenses persecuted and slaughtered by the unmerciful hosts of the Head of the Church.

Among the mountains in the north of Italy there was another body of Christians known as the Waldenses; they were not identical with the Albigenses, but were different, doctrinally and otherwise. They were distinguished for the most irreproachable conduct, and a more inoffensive people could not be found in all Europe. Claudius, Archbishop of Turin, wrote: "Their heresy excepted, they generally live a purer life than other Christians." The charge of heresy was, however, brought against them, and for over the great period of five hundred years—from 1179 to 1689—these people were fearfully harassed by the "dominant church." The first edict against them was issued by Pope Alexander III., in which he said: "We therefore subject to a curse, both themselves and their defenders and harborers, and under a curse we prohibit all persons from admitting them into their houses—but if they die in their sins let them not receive Christian burial. . . . We likewise from the mercy of God, and relying on the authority of the blessed Apostles Peter and Paul, relax two years of enjoined penance to those faithful Christians who, by the counsel of the bishops and other prelates, shall take up arms to subdue them by fighting against them." Soon after numbers of these people were burned at Bingen and at Mentz, and many others hunted from place to place and scattered from country to country by an infuriated soldiery. Another edict was issued against them by Pope Lucius III. in 1181, and subsequently by other Popes and Rulers. Pope Innocent VIII. in 1487 directed his nuncio and the Inquisitor General Blasius, "To take up arms against the said Waldenses and other heretics, and to come to an understanding to crush them like venomous asps, and to contribute all their care to so holy and so necessary an extermination;" and afterwards Pope Pius IV., in 1560, authorized another brutal crusade against them, and the most terrible cruelties were again almost unceasingly perpetrated down to the year 1655, when, by the interposition of Oliver Cromwell, of England, they were partially discontinued, but were soon again renewed and continued until 1689.

A Catholic writer furnishes a narrative of one of the atrocities committed against the Waldenses in 1560, and states: "Having written you from time to time what has been done here in the affair of heresy, I have now to inform you of the dreadful justice which began to be executed on these Lutherans this morning, being the 11th of June, and to tell you the truth, I can compare it to nothing but the slaughter of so many sheep. They were shut up in one house, as in a sheep-fold. The executioner went, and bringing out one of them, covered his face with a napkin, or benda as we call it, led him out to a field near the house, and causing him to kneel down, cut his throat with a knife. Then taking off the bloody napkin, he went and brought out another, whom he put to death after the same manner. In this way the whole number of eighty-eight men were butchered. I still shudder when I think of the executioner with his bloody knife between his teeth, the dripping napkin in his hand, his arm besmeared with gore, going to the house and taking out one victim after another, just as a butcher does sheep he means to kill." Tommaso Costo, a Catholic historian, also wrote concerning the cruelties to the Waldenses: "Some had their throats cut, others were sawn through the middle, and others were thrown from the top of a high cliff; all were cruelly but deservedly put to death." The Waldenses, though subjected to such woful persecution, were not after all exterminated; they contended for liberty of opinion with extraordinary pertinacity; but it was not until the reign of Victor Emanuel, the present king of Italy, that they received the same privileges as others.

When we recall these historical facts of religious persecution, a feeling of anguish and indignation arises in our breasts. In addition to these cruelties, one has to remember the terrible Inquisition with its dread "familiars," its "Holy Office," its dungeons, its racks, screws, pulleys, weights, and other horrid instruments for producing the most agonizing torment. In imagination one can enter the gloomy "hall of torture," and in the dim light see the malignant judges of that infernal court; see the rack and the waiting executioner. Look again, and oh! the fearful scene! See one of the softer sex, a woman, young, and once beautiful, but now naked—yes, actually naked—stretched out in dire agony, with dislocated limbs, bleeding and fainting before men! Men? No! but before fiends in human shape, called—Inquisitors. There they sit, or recline, with their books and crosses, and with the stolid indifference of the veriest savages. Alas! alas! no soothing voice can ever more be heard, no word of comfort spoken in that dolorous hour, no tender human heart throbs with sympathy for that poor victim, no eye is dimmed with pity for so much human suffering, no ear is pained to hear the death groans of that delicate girl, guilty most likely of no offense, save that of having perhaps spoken lightly of some suspicious priest, or of some absurd rite of the Church. The dew of death is upon her brow, her parted lips are reddened with her own life blood, her clotted hair, her bruised body, and her broken limbs elicit no word of remorse for her agony. Alone, and unresisting she is in the hands of her brutal persecutors; the muffled walls conduct no sound of her distress to the outward world, it is shut out to her forever. The icy hand of the last deliverer is now upon her, but the actual stare of death is less terrible to her closing eyes and fading vision, than the sound of the accursed monsters who sit before her—the clerical monsters of the holy order of St. Dominic.

Fearful reminiscence! one shudders as if an actual witness of that scene of horror: soon another view is presented. It is a gala day in Madrid; it is the Christian Sabbath. The pious who have attended church are moving toward the massive, gloomy building of the Inquisition. The Spanish King and his courtiers are sitting on an elevated stage which is richly carpeted, and the royal person is shaded by a silken canopy. There are also to be seen familiars and grandees from Cordova, and from other cities. Bishops in rich robes are in conspicuous positions, and great numbers of priests, monks and friars attest that there is to be a ceremony of some kind in which the Church is greatly interested. The sunbeams flash upon the mitres and crosses of the ecclesiastics, and upon the swords and spears and other military weapons of the armed missionaries of the "True Faith." All present seem to be in a state of excited expectation. But hark! a bell tolls—it has been tolling at intervals since the early dawn. It cannot be the call for an imposing or brilliant religious ceremony; no, 'tis a death knell, the knell for another dread act of religious persecution. See! There is now a movement in the vast crowd in front of the Inquisition; its heavy gates—like the gates of hell—yawn wide, and a procession, as if intended to represent an egress of the spirits of the damned, moves slowly out. Dominican friars—called pious men—are in advance, bearing the repulsive banner of the "Holy Inquisition," penitents, or those who had been terrified into compliance, follow; and then follow the bare-footed, sad, and long array of those who are destined for the flames. Some with pallid faces are wounded and limping; some are too weak and emaciated to walk, and these, with others whose bones have been broken, and whose flesh has been mangled by the torture, are rudely born toward the guarded space in front of the majesty, the episcopacy and the nobility of Spain; and in the midst of the fanatical crowd whose eyes are hungry for a fresh scene of torture. The condemned are clad in the yellow Sanbenito, disfigured with infernal effigies, each wears the coroza or pointed cap of infamy, and holds an extinguished torch; and each is attended by a Jesuit who hurls reproaches, instead of offering a word of pity or a prayer for mercy. They have now reached the great cross erected in the field of the Cruz del Quemadero, the place of execution; the sentence is read, a blow is given to each of the condemned by one of the clerical officers of the Inquisition, and the accused are delivered over to the secular power. A feeble, formal, hypocritical plea in their behalf is muttered by a priest—a vile deceit, for stakes are fixed, and fuel is ready, and the condemned are chained and weeping. There is no offering of mercy in reply to that plea, for the Christian king ostentatiously sends his gilded and adorned fagot to be added to the pile. Oh horror! The flames ascend, a hundred human beings are shrieking, and groaning, and writhing in torture. The surrounding multitude are delighted, and thanks to God are given by the king, by the priests, and by the people, for this triumph of the True Faith, for the extirpation of so much heresy; and for the terrible spectacle of another Auto da fee.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

The Devil's Decency.

I heard, a few days since, a divine dotard, in regular Orthodox Billingsgate, denounce the "author of evil," as he termed the devil. I wanted to ask him who created the devil, and how he would get his bread and butter but for the belief in that mystical and much slandered being? Accepting the Bible account of his origin and conduct at different times, is not the Christians' devil much more worthy of our confidence than their god (please spell him with a small g)?

As to the origin of the devil: It seems that god was not really supreme, even in his own dominions, and that the devil—then an angel, and of course possessed of all their virtues—headed a revolution and set all the he-angels in his Sunday-school class to pulling their harps in pieces to use in prying up the golden pavement for projectiles to hurl at the head of this creator. Well, it seems there was quite a row, and the devil was so nearly successful that god was willing to compromise with him, and having previously created hell, and finding no opportunity to rent it, on account of the insalubrity of the climate, he offered to set him up in business down there, which offer was accepted, with the stipulation that our loving father was to send him all the customers he could accommodate, and furnish him an inexhaustible supply of brimstone.

We nowhere find it recorded that the devil ever drowned the population of an entire planet because they, impelled by the passions he had implanted in them, had transgressed some of his absurd laws. Nor did he ever feed little children to bears because they were having a little innocent fun at the expense of an old bald-headed preacher. But one turns with disgust from such absurdities, and is compelled to seek intelligence and decency in the devil's dominions. Who would not prefer a hell peopled with men and women of intelligence, and who are free from superstition and bigotry, to a heaven of angelic idiots? Salinas, May 29, 1875. A. W. P.

Upheavals.

MR. EDITOR: I was pleased that you closed your queer argument with that Elder Shelton, for it was time and space thrown away to occupy the valuable columns of your paper in an argument with a man like a one-handed basket, and who has no reason, and in fact don't know when he is used up, or if he does, will not "own up."

His statement that no upheavals have ever taken place since the flood, shows the greatest kind of ignorance. I wonder if he ever read Humboldt's travels in South America and Mexico? How about the volcano Jorullo? In July, 1838, Capt. John Corrao, on the passage from Tropani to Girgenti, in Sicily, witnessed an island rise in the ocean, and named it after himself, Corrao; and the Gulf of Santorin, in the Grecian Archipelago, nearly encloses several small islands which have emerged from the deep within the period of authentic history.

Similar instances have repeatedly taken place, one mentioned by Kircher in 1538, another in 1720, a third in 1787, when an earthquake shook the island of St. George, and eighteen considerable islands rose in the ocean. The most celebrated, occurred in 1811, when the island of Sabrina rose from the deep, off the coast of St. Michael. I could give statements of many such occurrences, but probably they would occupy too much of your space, which ought to be used for other purposes.

I will mention the Allentian chain; the island of St. Eustatia; West Indies; and the Ascension Isles; the island of St. Matthew, 1450 miles from Africa, 685 from St. Helena, and 520 from the nearest particle of visible land. Its shores exhibit black nitrous lava, its surface presents rugged conical hills of different kinds of lava. Not a shrub was seen on it when it was discovered on Ascension day, in the year 1501, by Joan de Novo Galego. Thousands of other similar upheavals both by sea and on land, have occurred at various times.

All of the Elder's arguments compare favorably with his upheaval nonsense. In fact he made no argument, and you partially lost the time spent with him; though perhaps it amused and instructed your numerous readers. It is thought in this vicinity he would make a valuable addition to Barnum's show.

Yours sincerely,
East Wallingford, Vt.

AFRICAN elephants appear to be liable to a fault from which a still nobler animal is not exempt. There is a fruit of which they are passionately fond which makes them tipsy, and after eating it they stagger about, screaming so as to be heard miles off, and not seldom having tremendous fights. This is vouched for by the Hon. W. H. Drummond in his new work on the large game of South Africa.

New-York Liberal Club.

[As considerable space has been occupied latterly, in this department, and as there is a good deal of pressure of other matter, we will, in this issue give but, little space to the Liberal Club.]

On Friday evening, July 30th, Mr. D. E. DE LARA read an interesting paper on POPE SIXTUS THE FIFTH as Statesman, Ruler, and Philosopher.

One the evening of Aug. 6th, Mr. CHARLES SOTHERAN read an elaborate and interesting paper on PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY as Philosopher, Statesman and Reformer.

On the evening of Aug. 13th, Mr. R. M. K. Willcox gave a lecture and reading from HANS CHRISTIAN ANDERSON, the Danish writer recently deceased.

Each lecture was followed by the usual spirited discussions.

On the evening of Aug. 20th, the regular lecture was omitted, and a memorial meeting of the Club was held in honor of the memory of NICHOLAS MULLER, a member, and one of the founders of the organization, recently deceased.

Plymouth Church Gems.

[Brother Beecher is undoubtedly a great man. He has given utterance to many brilliant thoughts. It is pleasant to read his sparkling gems, and we herewith place a few of them before our readers. True, their beatitudes are not exactly in the same vein, but it must be remembered they were uttered under different circumstances. Mr. Beecher is human, and is therefore subject to surrounding conditions. But he is great in many things, and especially in "gush."]

From the Prayer-Meeting Talk while the Jury were out.

I have a right to stand up and say that God has tried me for five long years, as he has not tried you; but, by the grace of God, I have been kept in peace. I have not been tried so that I have given up courage, and so that I may not say I have many things to be thankful for.

I bear you this witness, for I have been with Jesus Christ; because I have studied the body and the life of Jesus Christ; because it is the sovereign ambition of my life to be a manly fellow, and I mean by a manly fellow, a man in Christ, as with a perfectly calm courage and a regard for the future which is in man when he is in God.

From the Ragged-Edge Letter to Moulton.

If I had not gone through this great year of sorrow, I would not have believed that any one could pass through my experience and be alive or sane. During all this time you were literally my stay and comfort. I should have fallen by the way but for the courage you inspired and the hope which you breathed.

From the Prayer-Meeting Talk.

Do you believe that God is nearer to you than your father, your mother, or your sister? I do. I bear that witness before you, my brethren. God is real. He is my God, and I am his child, and I feel his aid day by day and hour by hour. I know it; I feel it. It tingles at my fingers' ends, and, whether living or dying, I am the Lord's. [Loud and long applause.] And in that there is everlasting truth. There is in it joy and peace; for if God be for you, and you know it, you know perfectly well that no man can successfully be against you. "If God be for you, who can be against you?" You are victorious.

From the Ragged-Edge Letter.

No man can see the difficulties that environ me unless he stands where I do. To say that I have a church on my hands is simple enough, but to have the hundreds and thousands of men pressing me, each with his keen suspicion, or anxiety, or zeal; to see tendencies which, if not stopped, would break out into a ruinous defence of me; to stop them without seeming to see it; to prevent any one questioning me; to meet and allay prejudices against T. which had their beginning years before this; to keep serene as if I was not alarmed or disturbed; to be cheerful at times and among friends when I was suffering the torments of the damned; to pass sleepless nights often, and yet to come up fresh and full for Sunday—all this may be talked about, but the real thing cannot be understood from the outside, nor its wearing and grinding on the nervous system.

From the Prayer-Meeting Talk.

The moment that a man feels that he has God's grace, that God is his, and he is God's, he is three times a man. How strong a man is who is strong in the Lord, when he is strong in the Lord. Think of those things which are eternal. I have thought of it all the afternoon, lying in my bed, sitting on my front steps. They seem to me like dreams and things almost unreal. I am ashamed, I should be ashamed in my innermost soul, of the unmanliness of being disturbed by these little things or little eddies that are in the river of life.

From the Ragged-Edge Letter.

Life would be pleasant if I could see that rebuilt which is shattered. But to live on the ragged edge of anxiety, remorse, fear, despair, and yet to put on an appearance of serenity and happiness, cannot be endured much longer.

Prayer-Meeting Talk.

Whatever men may think, this world is so large, there are so many sides to it, that it don't lie with you or anybody on the face of the earth to determine my future. That is a matter that lies with me and God; and God and I against the world. [Applause, with cries of "Amen" from various parts of the room.] I don't propose to be put down in any other sense than the sense in which wheat is put down in the soil. However pressed I am, however I am put down, I will come up again. [Applause.]

From the Ragged-Edge Letter.

If my destruction would place him [Tilton] all right, that shall not stand in the way. I am willing to step down and out; no one can offer more than that. That I do offer. Sacrifice me without hesitation, if you can see your way to his safety and happiness thereby. I do not think anything would be gained by it. I should be destroyed, but he would not be saved. Elizabeth and the children would have their future clouded. In one point of view I could desire the sacrifice on my part. Nothing can possibly be so bad as the horror of the great darkness in which I spend much of my time.

From the Prayer-Meeting Talk.

Under God's providence I am going to work out my life; now let me see the man that is going to stop it. It lies with God and me. Nobody is allowed to vote on that subject.

The resignation prepared to be sent if Tilton published the letter of contrition.

MAY 31, 1873.

To the Trustees of Plymouth Church:

I tender herewith my resignation of the sacred ministry of Plymouth Church. For two years I have stood with great sorrow among you, in order to shield from shame a certain household. Since a recent publication makes this no longer possible, I resign my ministry and retire into private life. HENRY WARD BEECHER.

From the Prayer-Meeting Talk.

I did not stay here because I had planned it myself. I was kept here by the divine purpose that sent me here. I shall stay as long as God's Providence keeps me here. I shall go when God's Providence takes me away. I shall die when God decrees me to the other life. Living or dying I am the Lord's. My future is in his hands. I will do it though the thousand devils are in the road. I leave for him to judge. That is my future. His name is God, and his other name to me is Father, and I have day by day to say, "Dear Father, what wilt thou have me to do, that I shall do," and hell and the devil cannot stop it. [Cries of "Amen," and loud clapping of hands.]

From the letter to Moulton, June 1, the Sunday following the letter of resignation.

The whole earth is tranquil, and the heaven is serene, as befits one who is about to finish his worldly life. I could do nothing on Saturday; my head was confused. I have determined to make no more resistance. Theodore's temperament is such that the future, even if temporarily earned, would be absolutely worthless, filled with abrupt changes, rendering me liable at any hour or day to be obliged to stultify all the devices by which we have saved ourselves.

Letter to Mrs. Tilton.

When I saw you last, I did not expect ever to see you again, or to be alive many days. God was kinder to me than my own thoughts.

From the Prayer-Meeting Talk.

Heaven cares for us. Heaven is mine. Just men made perfect—they are in my company if they believe in the Lord. Heaven thinks more of me than I think of heaven. Heaven yearns over me.

Letter to Moulton.

Many, many friends has God raised up to me, but to no one of them has he ever given the opportunity and the wisdom to serve me as you have. My trust in you is implicit. You have also proved yourself Theodore's friend, and Elizabeth's. Does God look down from heaven on three unhappy creatures that more need a friend than these? Is it not an intimation of God's mercy to all that each of us has in you a tried and proved friend? But only in you are we three united. Would to God, who orders all hearts, that by your kind mediation, Theodore, Elizabeth and I could be made friends again. Theodore will have the hardest task in such case; but has he not proved himself capable of the noblest things? I wonder if Elizabeth knows how generously he has carried himself toward me. Of course I can never speak to her again, except with his permission, and I do not know that even then it would be best.

From the Prayer-Meeting Talk.

In the first place, just so soon as a man believes that God loves him, and watches over him, he has got one refuge.

This is no mere reasoning, no mere argument. It is a conviction as large as the capacity of my life. Do you suppose that anything can reach us so as to disturb the peace of the heart that believes in God, and ever loves God—a God that gives strength to the weak, that gives power to the weary? It is not mine because I preach; it is not mine because I have any special charter; it is from God.

Letter to Mrs. Tilton, Answering her Bird-Singing, Nest-Hiding Letter.

Your note broke like Spring upon Winter, and gave me an inward rebound to life. . . . Your hope and courage are like medicine. Should God inspire you to restore and rebuild at home, and while doing it to cheer and sustain outside of it another who sorely needs help in heart and spirit, it will prove a life so noble as few are able to live, and in another world the emancipated soul may utter thanks. If it would be a comfort to you now and then to send me a letter of true inwardness—the outcome of your inner life—it would be safe, for I am now at home here with my sister, and it is permitted to you, and will be an exceeding refreshment to me, for your heart experiences are often like bread from heaven to the hungry. God has enriched your moral nature. May not others partake?

From the Prayer-Meeting Talk.

Now, Christian brethren, I have said these things to you, and I wish I could have said them with closed doors and windows, and without their being reported. . . . Notwithstanding, it was in me to say these things to you; it was in me to say I admire you; I honor you, I love you in your fidelity, in your piety, for your trust, and I am your leader and friend, not perfunctorily, but by the grace of God. And the hold that I have had upon you is received from your confidence in my Christian life. I am a Christian; I am a manly man. I love to honor God. I shall see you there. You shall not be able to shun me, nor I you; but you and I journeying together in this life may rise from the earth sons of righteousness; we shall stand together and meet our congregations.

Letter to Mrs. Tilton.

The friend whom God sent to me has proved, above all friends that I ever had, able and willing to help me in this terrible emergency of my life. His hand it was that tied up the storm that was ready to burst upon our heads. The past is ended. But is there no future—no wiser higher, holier future? May not this friend stand as a priest in the new sanctuary of reconciliation, and meditate, and bless you, Theodore, and my most unhappy self.

Letter to Moulton, June 1, 1873.

The pain of life is but a moment, the glory of everlasting emancipation is worldless, inconceivable, full of beckoning glory. O! my beloved Frank, I shall know you then, and forever hold fellowship with you, and look back and smile at the past.

Friendly Correspondence.

MERRILLS BARTON, Harlan, Iowa, writes: Enclosed I hand you the price of THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year. I consider it the best paper in the land. I find it impossible to get along without it.

LARS POULSON, West Dayton, Iowa, writes: I am well pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is just such a paper as every Liberal should feel it his duty to support. It fills a vacuum long felt in the Liberal ranks.

AUGUST J. NOERENBERG, St. Paul, Minn., writes: I was so well pleased with the sample copy of the paper you sent me, that I could not stop reading it till I had read it all. Please send it to me now regularly.

ALMON MALTBY, Brighton, Mich., writes: I like your lecture on the Gods of superstition very much. I wish every Christian in the land could read it. Put me down for a copy of your proposed new work.

J. M. COOK, Lake Village, N. H., writes: Please send me one dollar's worth of your tracts. I tell you, your paper makes our clergy squirm and chafe, but there is no help for them. It shows up their true colors, so that they don't even appear respectable.

MR. KERSEY GRAVES, Richmond, Ind., writes: Your lecture in the last number is truly a masterly production, and should be circulated by the million. It is hard to beat. Let me know what the price will be in pamphlet form.

C. LETOUREAU, Waterville, Maine, writes: Please send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year to the enclosed three names. I think your paper will do as much towards healing the soul as any other paper or any other thing I have yet met with.

JOHN H. CARPENTER, Mt. Moriah, Mo., writes: I consider THE TRUTH SEEKER the best Liberal paper in the country, and it is my wish, that it may live long, and that by its irradiating influence dispel the fog and mist of superstition which is so detrimental to freedom and progress.

THOS. L. JACKSON, Saginaw City, Mich., writes: Go on with your good work; the wedge has entered, and every blow of the maul of Liberty sends it nearer the center of false religion, which in time must give way to that religion of nature which is the same all over the boundless Universe.

P. V. WISE, St. Joseph, Mo., writes: It is with great pleasure I read THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is clear, bold, but not boisterous. It goes to the center, and eats dirt to please no one. Go on in your good work. You are one of the saviors—the real saviors of mankind; dispensing light and knowledge among the children of men.

A. W. TAYLOR, Ossawatimie, Kansas, writes: Please send me THE TRUTH SEEKER another year. I am a Spiritualist, but I find not one among the papers devoted to the advocacy of Spiritualism, the fair, outspoken, gentlemanly candor that pervades the pages of our TRUTH SEEKER. Now, as I want the truth and that only, I settle on THE TRUTH SEEKER as being the paper for honest Liberals to support. No creedalism for me, under any disguise. Go on Brother; "hew to the line, let the chips fall when they may," even though a great (?) Beecher and his fitting allies; God, Christ & Co., be smothered beneath the pile.

J. H. JACOBS, Carbondale, Kansas, writes: Never am I more pleased than when reading THE TRUTH SEEKER; nor never do I feel as if I had not obtained the worth of my money. I will not be without it so long as I can raise the subscription price, which is mere nominal, considering the amount of interesting matter it contains.

JOHN H. HASLAM, Lower Bayou, Ark., writes: It is rumored here that Henry Ward Beecher gets $100,000 for kissing Elizabeth. Parson H., not far from here, and who is in good standing, says if Plymouth church has any more such jobs to let out, he would take a limited number at half price.

B. BEHYMER, New Palestine, O., writes: I am well pleased with your paper and am glad you are going to make it a weekly after January. Fogyism and superstition are strongly rooted in this section, but so long as Catholics and Protestants hate each other so supremely, we Infidels will probably be permitted to live.

CHAS. HYDE, Frankfort, N. Y., writes: I have been a reader of your valuable paper now, long enough to be able conscientiously to recommend it to my friends, and I must lay, right here, that I have gained more solid knowledge from the perusal of its lecture reports and its contents generally, than from any other source whatever.

SOLOMON FISHER, Rock Grove, Ill., writes: I am much pleased with the copy of "Darwin's Descent of Man" you sent me. It is well bound and is richly worth the $3.00. I am glad you are going to make your paper a weekly and hope your enterprise will be duly appreciated and patronized. Yet Egyptian darkness be illuminated, even if it should cost an additional sun.

CHARLES STEPHENSON, Rock Island, Ill., writes: You deserve a vote of thanks and a gold medal for your lecture on the Gods of superstition, &c. It is the best thing I have ever read. Put me down for a copy of your proposed work. I think such a work is greatly needed. I don't see why any Infidel should object to paying the price you ask for it, for such a work.

A. BEARD, Brooklyn, N. Y., writes: I am well pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is just the paper I have been in search of for two years. The few numbers I have had the opportunity of reading have perfectly assured me that my own thoughts which I have entertained of orthodox theology were correct. I am no longer in doubt; your paper, therefore, has done me a deal of good. Please send it regularly.

B. F. UNDERWOOD, from his home at Thorndike, Mass., writes: I have just finished reading your maiden effort, and I pronounce it good—decidedly good, and were you not greatly needed in the position you at present occupy, I should urge you to enter the lecture field in the interest of Free Thought. Please send me another copy of your paper containing your excellent discourse on "The Gods of Superstition."

D. JENKINS, Hannibal, Mo., writes: Your TRUTH SEEKER is much liked here. No one that can reason has a moral reason for not liking it. Ingersoll's inspired utterances are making their mark. You are writing yourself up into eminence. The future will recognize your services in the cause of truth. Persevere, good Brother. We are few, I acknowledge, but the ignorant fools have always had the majority.

A LEGAL FRIEND in an Illinois village, writes: Your determined efforts deserve the appreciation of all Liberals, and I certainly hope your success will be assured. We are a mere handful here, but we have the determination to act well our part and to do our full duty in behalf of your acceptable paper. It has been our custom in years past to get speakers to come here occasionally and speak to us. We now intend to reach the people by spending the money that went for that purpose for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and believe it will be quite as effective. I assure you, you have a small number of friends and admirers in this part of the country.

Mrs. MARY E. BROWN, Noank, Conn., writes: My husband has a large sail boat and has named it "THE TRUTH SEEKER." I invite you to come and spend a few days with us. We are going to have a Connecticut peace meeting, Aug. 13 and 19th, and would be glad if you can make it convenient to attend, and then to take a sail in "THE TRUTH SEEKER."

(Many thanks to our kind friend for her friendly invitation. We would be happy to accept it and be with them a few days, but our duties require us to be at our post and preclude our enjoying much pleasure. Ed. T. S.)

R. J. LAMBORN, Glen Hall, Pa., writes: Your paper comes promptly, but not as frequently as I would wish. I am pleased to see that 1876 will commence with it a weekly. I hope Liberals and seekers after truth will respond to your moderate terms and reasonable request to pay up promptly. When we think of the amount that is spent to promulgate and sustain a false theology, there should be no difficulty in procuring abundant funds to sustain such a paper as THE TRUTH SEEKER, freighted with common sense and truth. Liberals should be prompt, punctual and free, in assisting to disseminate light and truth by the circulation of papers and tracts, and a firm maintenance of honest convictions and opinions, not yielding as too many do, for the sake of public approval.

JOSEPH NOYES, Richmond, Vt., writes: I like your paper very much and hope it will never fail till sham religion is banished from the earth. The people of the United States are paying some $200,000,000 yearly to be flattered with the notion that they individually will live eternally in a happy heaven after they are done with this world of shame. We are so be-fooled by priests that we do not stop to think that we have no knowledge or good evidence how our Universe got into existence, or that we shall ever know anything after we are dead. All we know about God, is to repeat a priest-fabricated name, made when the English language was made. [Dr. Adam Clark.] In the Jewish sacred books, the sacred names were crowded out, the Christians' forged names crowded in. Our Christian names do not mean what the Jewish names did. In Genesis the noun and pronoun are repeated forty times in the first chapter and changed in the second chapter—the basest lie ever printed and done by villainous Christian priests and fastened to the minds of the ignorant by the scare of an endless hell and damnation if we believe not.

Dr. D. ARTER, Cairo, Ill., writes: Enclosed I hand you the price of your paper up to Jan. 1877. I am an old man past three-fourths of a century, and having passed through various scenes of life, none of which I regret more than my early training. I was bound by the shackles of superstition and orthodox bigotry, a revengeful God, and an endless hell, rendering me miserable and unhappy; and even after I became convinced of the fallacy of my early teachings, it required years before I could cease being a moral coward enough, to publicly avow my honest convictions. But thanks to the light of science, the progress of common sense, now with one foot on the brink of the grave, I have no fears in regard to the future, and enter it, if there is one, without the slightest apprehension.

S. C. ROGERS, Charming Dale, Arizona, writes: When I commenced taking your paper, which was at its commencement, I lived quite isolated in this new country, my principal neighbors being hordes of thieving murderous Indians. Now they have gradually disappeared, and my charming little valley is fast filling up with a population of families of the right tone. My pioneer family now have the right kind of associates and we will soon erect a school-house, and if I can have my say, it will be dedicated with a Liberal lecture.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is hailed with delight, and many wait to borrow my copy which I cannot lend, but aim to keep on file to read and re-read myself and for the benefit of my visitors.

Z. SHED, Fremont, Neb., upon sending in the names of nine subscribers, says: "The Jesus business is becoming more and more transparent every day. Free presses, free discussion and the dissemination of Liberal thought are fast wiping out the old land marks of bigotry, intolerance, priestcraft and fanaticism. Day by day the attendance on places of so-called divine worship grows beautifully less. Men heretofore pretending to expound the so-called word of God, are finding their level, to wit: hoeing cabbages and chopping wood. The thread-bare tales of gods, devils and immaculate conceptions, concocted to disseminate by hypocritical frauds in sacerdotal garbs, fall now to frighten even babes and sucklings in humble submission, as in days of yore. The fagot, rack and other instruments of torture once used by prelates, popes and other pious tyrants to make men love their Jesus, have lost their terror, save as a fitting monument to that withering curse—religion—that for centuries has deluged the world with blood."

S. G. GATES, East Wallingford, Vt., writes: Your discussion with Elder Shelton and the coarse vulgar language he used towards you, looked as if he was short of words, such as he desired to use, but could not think of anything mean enough to suit him. I wonder he did not use some such language as a certain Elder Adams of Boston once used, when Rev. Sylvanus Cobb, a Universalist minister, once visited his Church, and as Cobb walked up the aisle, Adams pointed his finger towards him and said: "Thank God, the day is not far distant when you will be chained down to hell's brazen floor, and the Devil with his three-pronged harpoon will pierce your reeking heart, and pile the cinders of black damnation upon you as high as the pyramids of Egypt, and pry out the pride of your soul to grease the gudgeons of hell." Poor Elder Shelton lacks language to express himself as this Elder did. He has exhausted the Bible, and now if he will study the Arabian Nights he will probably find something new. Let him enjoy his idol, poor soul—let him go.

JESSE MUNN, Anderson, Ind., writes: THE TRUTH SEEKER continues to be well-received here, and it is read with both pleasure and improvement by our young men; and were it not for the woeful hard times that appear to be crushing out the nation's life, your list from this quarter would increase much faster. Many who would like to become subscribers in this cornucopia of America, have positively not the means to do it. Such is the state of things in this—our centennial birth. It appears to me but a measure of time, to be cyphered by the school boy, when the insatiable maw of capital will have absorbed every mark of glory by which we are distinguished from European governments. So firm are the teguments of the umbilical cord that unites the two monsters, religion and capital, we are left no choice of discrimination. The destruction of one will be the destruction of the other. The well pointed javelins of an enlightened press are our only resource; failing in that, we are gone. I hope a due appreciation of your labors on the part of the Liberal public, will enable you to still wage an untiring war against superstition, fraud and tyranny, until the last vestige is destroyed, and the dawn of a brighter day, the harbinger of the good time coming shall no longer be the ignis fatuus alluring us to a fatal spot, but a living reality in the dispensation of happiness to the whole human family.

* WM. CHESTNUT, Ossawatimie, Kansas, writes: Your readers here think there never was such a paper as THE TRUTH SEEKER, and are pleased to think they will receive it weekly after the present year. I hope you will be ably sustained and encouraged by the Liberals of the country in your heroic efforts to overthrow the dark and gloomy superstitions in the shape of an over-ruling Providence and bleeding savior that continues to send "one to heaven and ten to hell, all for his glory and for no good or ill they have done before thee." We have just had a very impressive evidence of the wisdom and goodness of their God, in the grasshopper affliction, that came near starving out many a poor family in this section of Kansas. "The throne of grace" was besieged night and day by the "priests of the bloody faith;" but nary a grasshopper would stir until their wings lengthened out in the common course of nature, when they took Greeley's advice and went West. I am much pleased with the copy of "Draper's Conflict," you sent me. I believe it will open the eyes of many that have hesitated in making an open declaration of their convictions and will hasten along the time predicted by Shelly, "when war with its million horrors and fierce hell shall live but in the memory of time; who, like a penitent sinner, will start, look back and shudder at his younger years."

R. M. CASEY, Pendleton, S. C., writes: I am sorry to inform you my health has been bad, and that of my wife still worse, so that I have done no work for more than eight months, consequently I have not been able to work any for our great cause of mental freedom; and I often fear that my friends abroad, who know nothing of my indigent circumstances and my distressed condition, may conclude that I, like too many others, have become lukewarm and careless in the great struggle between truth and error. To all such I beg to say, I am still in the field, and although wounded, my wound, I hope, is not mortal; and I feel no fears or inclination to yield one inch of ground already gained, and as proud as ever when a chance presents for me to send a telling shot into the puny ranks of superstition. My only regret is that I am so weak a soldier and have such vast numbers to contend with almost single handed; but odds or no odds, I am in "during war," for nothing gives me more pleasure than working in my humble way in behalf of truth. As old Brother Tuttle says, "I will go any length for truth, but not one inch for popularity at the expense of truth." I see my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER is out. I am not able to renew at once, but I beg you to continue sending the paper, and I will not cause you to wait very long. I would rather live on two meals a day and sell the third to pay for the paper than go without it. And if old Providence ever laughs at me again, I shall be up and doing all I can for THE TRUTH SEEKER.

WM. F. PORTER, Philadelphia, writes: I have now read twenty-four numbers of your paper, and I feel in writing you, as if I were addressing an old cherished friend. I had never read any books on Free Thought before perusing your spicy TRUTH SEEKER, and it seemed as if the hoodwinks of ignorance had suddenly dropped from my poor blinded eyes, and that I had suddenly waked up in some enchanted life. Before, through early education, the sword of Damocles seemed to be continually hanging over my head. I always seemed to be in dread of some impending punishment in the future life; but now, thanks to your invaluable little champion and instructor, I feel—as the Christian would say, "glorious."

The Christian may praise the "old romance of Jewish history," but give me the earnest sober thoughts of the correspondents of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and they may take the old "gospel book," for I can do without any more of its nonsense. Oh, I wish your fearless little paper was in every household of the land. Wouldn't there be a "waking up." Keep on, Bro. Bennett, and you will come out first in the end. You shall not lack my support while I have hands to earn the requisite amount. Though I am but a mechanic, I look for my little visitor, THE TRUTH SEEKER, as eagerly as the young bird looks for its food. It is a true feast to my hungering mind to drink of its pure, clear waters of truth. Please set my name down as one who will take a copy of your proposed book—"The Lives and Deaths of Noted Infidels."

E. C. WALKER, Florence, Iowa, writes: I have but one thing to regret in reference to your paper, and that is, that I sooner did not become acquainted with it. It is just the paper for the masses, cheap, sharp, pungent and fearless. It should be in the hands of every progressive man and woman in the land. You have done wisely in deciding to make it a weekly. It has not come often enough—too long to wait for the messages of truth. Speed the day when all shall learn to seek the truth—where alone it can be found, in the domain of reason and science. A man who once has fed upon the substantial and nourishing diet of Rationalism, will not readily turn again to the fire-fanged chaff of theological dogmas and fine-spun plans of salvation. The world needs to know more of science—more of physiology—a better acquaintance with the laws of health, that half the world's population may not die in childhood, and half of the remaining portion drag out a miserable life of invalidism. How often at the funeral of a man whose death was caused by his own outrageous violation of the laws of nature; how often, I say, have I heard the ignorant "minister of the gospel" prate of "the mysterious dispensations of divine Providence?" When will the world have done with such teachers? They are of no use to the world; they can tell us nothing which we need to know—nothing but what we can learn just as well without them. The Press, to a great extent, has taken the place of the pulpit, and it is a better educator than ever the pulpit was in its palmy days. To my mind, the material philosophy is the best every way—success to THE TRUTH SEEKER and its editor.

S. H. PRESTON, West Winfield, N. Y., writes: To give you the opinion of one "little Infidel" (such being the synonym some of the godly give your humble servant) of your "say" on the Gods at Plimpton Hall, I will observe that it does not equal Ingersoll's Oration in elegance and eloquence, since that is unequalled and incomparable. Everybody must take a back seat on god-talk while Robt. G. Ingersoll flourishes. It does not come up to Joseph Treat's great oration on God, Religion and Immortality delivered in Cincinnati, in 1860; for in logic and exhaustive argument that was overwhelming. Both those are masterpieces, unanswerable and unmatchable. But for clear, candid, concise, straight-forward reasoning, and for Thomas Paine-like terseness and strong simplicity of style, your production will unquestionably go farther and be better understood and appreciated by the general reading masses than anything now in circulation upon the subject. Issue it in tract form as soon as possible, and if the people don't call for it faster than anything you have ever got out yet, I'll confess myself mistaken for once. It is a perfect little sweepstakes on any kind of god that any brain in theological delirium tremens ever conjured up. As Treat says, "God is the central superstition round which all other superstitions cling." Therefore we will go for the gods. Live Infidels and dead gods should be the motto. In a subsequent letter he says:

The more I study your lecture the better I like it, and if you got it up in a day's time, as you wrote me, I am led to think you perhaps can do the best when under pressure. You must have had a full head of steam on to have got that off in a single day. It has been circulated all through our village, and however, much, some are inclined to differ from the sentiments you set forth, all agree that it is a great production. I think many who may not appreciate Ingersoll's style, would be set to thinking on the god business more by reading yours than his.

C. W. HALL, P. M., Rock Rapids, Iowa, writes: With pleasure I acknowledge the receipt of the duplicate of Vol. I. of THE TRUTH SEEKER: where the original went to I cannot say; perhaps Elder Shelton has got it. If so, I do hope it will penetrate to his very marrow, and so truly enlighten his whole bodily bundle of superstition and error, that we may, in the language of the poet, find in his case as we have in many others, that "Truth crushed to earth shall rise again."

When Brother Bennett yields the pen,
Though hard the crust of Calvin's Shelton,
The little SEEKER yet will melt them.
Oh blessed truth, thou radiant king,
What glorious tidings thou dost bring
From North and South, from East and West,
Believing souls find peace and rest.
Old mists creeds have had their say,
Now dawn for us a brighter day,
All hail the little "TRUTHFUL SEEKER."
We bless the bold and fearless speaker;
Great superstition's mantle's fell Into John Calvin's yawning hell,
And John should stay there yet a while
For burning men so free from guile,
The Devil with his forked tail
That made Rome howl and Greece bewail;
That ran with pulleys and belt on
And fired up with Elder Shelton
Is "busted up" and lost its power,
And truth will enter every bower,
Good-bye, old hopney, we'll let this pass
Thou omnipresent Hebrew ass.
TRUTH SEEKERS come to give us rest,
And all that heed them shall be blest;
Then hover near, sweet dove of peace,
And may thy lovers fast increase,
Until the aged, manhood, youth,
Shall nothing love as well as truth,
Then all shall know and feel and see
That man's redeemed when he is free.

PRESS COMMENTS.

"One of the sharpest, most satirical poems ever brought before the American public. Logical, witty, and mirth-provoking. The subject of the rhymes is the great Woodhull-Tilton-Beecher scandal."

A rough, wide-awake Yankee, by the name of "Jonathan," a kind of a John Hay of a fellow, hauls all the characters over the coals in a sensible manner. There is more stern logic in his off-hand hits, than is often found in such rough-clad phraseology. The one who reads this pamphlet will never regret the investment."
—Crucible, Boston.

"Davis' new poem is in his best vein.
Racy, trenchant, suggestive, it will help people to a knowledge of the truth of the Beecher scandal, and more sensible views regarding love and marriage."—The Word,

A NEW AND VALUABLE WORK.

Christianity and the Bible

AGAINST

Philosophy and Science.

DR. J. PILKINGTON, of California, has written a striking Pamphlet with the above title. A perusal of its mass of facts will better post and fortify the Liberal mind as to ecclesiastical pretensions, and the persecutions of the Church in all ages, than a more bulky and ambitious work. Liberal friend, no finer work can be selected to hand to your bigoted neighbor of the Church than this instructive pamphlet.
Anxious to spread the truth, we have reduced the price of this work, (which is elegantly printed in clear type, on fine white paper,) to twenty cents, postage 2 cents.

THE

New Gospel of Health:

AN EFFORT TO TEACH PEOPLE

The Principles of Vital Magnetism;

OR,

How to replenish the Springs of Life without Drugs or Stimulants.

BY ANDREW STONE, M.D.,

Physician to the Troy Lung and Hygienic Institute; Inventor of the "Pulmometer, or Lung Tester;" Author of a "Treatise on the Curability of Pulmonary Consumption by Inhalation of Cold Medicated Vapors, Natural Hygiene," etc.

Its aim is to set before the general public the principles of vital magnetism, whereby the springs of life may be replenished without the use of drugs or stimulants.
The subject matter is divided into thirty-eight sections, and purports to come from physicians who, ranking among the highest when in earth-life, have now made the attempt from the spirit sphere to communicate through an earthly medium knowledge which shall be even more powerful for good among the masses than their former labors in mortal. The ground gone over by these various contributors is wide and varied, and the hygienic hints given for self-cure are worth many times the cost of the volume.

The book is illustrated with over 120 engravings, among them being a steel plate likeness of Dr. Stone. Also a magnificent steel plate of engraving of the Goddess Hygiea.

SECOND EDITION.

Startling Facts in Modern Spiritualism.

BY N. B. WOLFE, M.D.

The constant and regular demand for this book exhausted the first edition some months ago, although a very large edition was worked off. For the second edition the plates have been carefully revised under the immediate supervision of the author. The publishers have had the paper made expressly for the second edition and the united efforts of the Author and Publishers have placed on sale a very fine and attractive appearing book. Although no expense has been deemed too great that would add to the perfection of the book; the price has been reduced one-fifth.

"STARTLING FACTS IN MODERN SPIRITUALISM" embodies some of the most remarkable and wonderful facts, ever published, and of the deepest interest to all. The truth of the history herein set forth in such graphic and absorbing style, is clearly established by the most indubitable evidence. Among the witnesses are some of the prominent members of the press, and others equally well known.

The book is a large 12mo., 543 pp. Bound in extra heavy cloth, illuminated with four elegant steel portraits and numerous fine wood engravings.

PRICE, $2. Postage, 25 cents.

THE BHAGAVAD-GITA;

Or, a Discourse on Divine Matters, between Krishna and Arjuna.

A SANSKRIT PHILOSOPHICAL POEM,

TRANSLATED. WITH COPIOUS NOTES, AN INTRODUCTION ON SANSKRIT PHILOSOPHY, AND OTHER MATTERS.

BY J. COCKBURN THOMSON,

MEMBER OF THE ASIATIC SOCIETY OF FRANCE, AND OF THE ANTIQUARIAN SOCIETY OF NORMANDY.

This work contains curious details of the Manners, Customs, Mythology, Worship etc., of the Hindus. The principal design of these dialogues seems to have been to unite all the prevailing modes of worship of those days: the Brahmins esteem it to contain all the grand mysteries of their religion, and have exercised particular care to conceal it from the knowledge of those of a different persuasion.

The spirit of the age prompts thoughtful people to inquire into the traditions of the past. In doing so, it is found that Mythology has played her part well. The traditions of the fathers have been systematized by thoughtful men, from time to time, in different ages of the world. Later generations have believed such traditions, so systematized, to be nothing less than divine commands. Imaginary gods have been constructed, to whom the world has paid homage and divine honors.

If we receive as truth all that is believed by credulous devotees, the world has had numerous incarnate deities.

Those who have been educated to belief in the Christian religion, and to regard the gentle Nazarene as the only Son of God, take a very limited view of the various religious systems of the present and of the past ages.

Among the incarnate deities that different systems of religion have recognized as having existed, through omnipotent love for fallen humanity, by the overshadowing of females of vestal purity, Krishna was a character as important in the Brahminical system of religion, as Christ is in the plan of salvation instituted by the Jews' Great Jehovah, believed in by Christians.

His coming was foretold, even as was Christ's.

At the age of sixteen Krishna began to preach, and was, like Christ, the founder of a new religion.

Prior to the great Chicago fire, the Religio-Philosophical Publishing House published the Bhagavad-Gita, from a translation of the Sanskrit by that celebrated scholar, Charles Wilkins. Nearly two editions of that work were sold when the fire-flood came and destroyed the stereotype plates. The demand for the work being so great, we were induced to send to England for a copy of a more recent translation, by J. Cockburn Thomson, member of the Asiatic Society of France, and the Antiquarian Society of Normandy.

The translator accompanied the work with copious notes, which are doubtless of more or less value, as explanatory of the text, but the reader will take them for just what they are worth—nothing more is expected.

The text, as correctly translated, contains gems of thought, transmitted from antiquity, which are of real intrinsic value to the thoughtful people of the age, and to them he work is most respectfully recommended by the American publisher.

PRESS COMMENTS ON THE BHAGAVAD-GITA:

"More than ordinary care and trouble have been spent upon this work. It is in every way creditable to the scholarship and enterprise of the west."—Inter-Ocean.

"This curious volume purports to give a full and accurate compilation of the tenets taught by Krishna. . . . The text contains many brilliant thoughts, well worth the attention of the thoughtful student of history, literature or science."—Our Fireside Friend.

"This translation of a Hindoo poem, dedicated by Mr. Thomson to his sometime instructor, Professor Wilson of Oxford, is one of a class of works demanding all the consideration and assistance that scholars everywhere can afford. It belongs to a class of books believed by great numbers of our fellow-men to have been supernaturally inspired, and trusted by them for their guidance in the ways of this life, and for light to pierce the dividing darkness between death and a future existence. No such book can, in the nature of things, have been thus esteemed by rational beings without having in itself much that is intrinsically valuable for comfort and instruction in righteousness, or at least, considered at its lowest, much that is curious and suggestive, as affording insight into the desires and needs of the souls that found therein their bread and water of life."—Overland Monthly.

"This is an unusually interesting publication. Mr. Thomson has rendered good service to the more thoughtful class of readers. There is a peculiar charm about ancient literature of the profound sort. The old Hindoos were an intellectual people. The poem before us is probably older than the time formerly fixed in Christian chronology for the creation of the world. It breathes a lofty spirit of unselfish devotion to good objects. We cannot refrain from complimenting the Religio-Philosophical Publishing House, upon giving to the public so excellent a book. . . . Grandly useful, especially as it is thoroughly indexed."—Chicago Evening Journal.

"A rare work from the ancient Sanskrit, in which will be found many of the religious ideas and notions which the Christian Church adopted long after. . . . It contains some 275 pages, printed on beautiful paper, and richly bound. . . . It is profusely supplied with notes, definitions, and explanations."—Truth Seeker.

"This is a rare book, which sheds more light upon the subjects of which it treats than any we have ever read. We heartily recommend it to those who wish to look into antiquity in regard to the religious views of a most remarkable people."—Samuel Watson, D.D., Editor Spiritual Magazine.

The book is a 12mo. of 278 pages, and the mechanical part is finished in a superior manner, being printed on heavy tinted paper, and bound in extra heavy cloth with richly illuminated back, borders and side title.

PRICE, plain, $1.75; - - - - - Gilt, $2.25. Post free.

A New Work by Dr. Hall.

How to Live Long;

OR,

HEALTH, MAXIMS, PHYSICAL, MENTAL AND MORAL. By W. W. HALL, A.M.,

M.D., author of "Health by Good Living," "Bronchitis and Kindred Diseases," "Health at Home," "Sleep," "Coughs and Colds, etc.,

In his preface to this new volume the author says:

"To live long, is to live well, by eating and drinking abundantly of all the good things of this life in their season, in their freshness, in their perfection; not only of the fruits of the orchard, the vegetables of the garden, and the grains of the field, but of the birds of the air, the fish of the sea, and the cattle upon a thousand hills; by gathering about us the comforts, conveniences, and luxuries of life; by cultivating the higher tastes of our nature; by cherishing the affections and by the promotion of all that innocently enlivens, exhilarates, delights, and enraptures.

"How to do these things in such a way as to preserve and promote the highest health and thus double their value, is the object of this book. The aim is to make the lessons short, concise, specific, and to the point, in the fewest possible words, to compel the reading of them and so impress them on the mind by fact and warning and incident and example and anecdote, that they cannot be forgotten in a life-time.

"It is hoped that some who would not spend the time to hear a lecture or read a book may be enticed to peruse a paragraph now and then in reference to the care of the body, which, in being put into practice, may have an important bearing in the prolongation of life: thus teaching the reader 'How To Live Long.'

The following are a few random maxims from the Doctor's book:

"In warm weather, the longer you can put off drinking water in the forenoon, the better you will feel at night."

"Acids always injure the teeth, pure sweets never do."

"The most valuable part of the common potato is immediately under the outside skin, which is peeled off and thrown to the pigs; if baked or boiled and only the very outside skin is peeled off, all the nutriment is saved."

"We should go to sleep on the right side, then the food descends through the outlet of the stomach by gravity; otherwise, stomach power is wasted in drawing it up, as from the bottom of a well; after the first sleep, let the body take care of its own position."

"Persons are not very sick who want to be read to."

"If thrown into the water and the strength is failing, turn on the back with only the nose and toes out of the water, hands downward and clasped. This should be practiced while learning to swim, as a means of resting from great fatigue in swimming."

Odds and Ends.

"HEAT generates motion." Illustration—A small boy sitting down on a hot coal.

A BLIND mendicant wears this inscription around his neck: "Don't be ashamed to give only a half-penny; I can't see."

"No, ma'am," said a jeweler to a beautiful lady, "I don't trust anybody these days. I would not even trust my feelings."

If any gentleman has lately lost a leg he will perhaps be pleased to hear that it has been found by a party of steamboat men near St. Louis.

A YOUNG man, searching for his father's pig, accosted an Irishman as follows: "Have you seen a stray pig about here?" To which Pat responded, "Faix, and how could I tell a stray pig from any other?"

"WHAT do you know of the character of this man?" was asked of a witness at a police court the other day. "What do I know of his character? I know it to be unbleachable, your Honor," he replied with much emphasis.

"How's business now?" inquired one merchant of another, the other day. "Dull, fearfully dull," was the reply. "The fact is, nobody buys anything now but provisions and whiskey—the bare necessities of life, as it were."

A SCOTCH peddler completely cowed an irascible Welshman, who insisted on fighting him in an inn kitchen, by going down on his knees and imploring pardon for having killed "two men already, and being about to kill another."

ELDER sister (condescendingly)—See, Ethel, you had better come and walk in my shadow. It will be cooler for you. Younger Sister (who resents patronage)—You are very good, Maud; but I have a shadow of my own, thank you!

A SOUTH Boston lady was recently interrogated by a Benedict as to why she did not get married. She replied: "I prefer to be an old maid." He said he did not believe it, as he felt sure she envied his wife. "O, no! that would be breaking the commandment—Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's ass."

JUDGE PERRIN, of Falmouth, Ky., performed a marriage ceremony for Clay Ashton and his sweetheart. A week later the husband called again. "O, I see," said the Judge, "you have come after the certificate." "O, you don't see," was the reply, "I haven't come after the certificate. What I want is a divorce."

At a recent examination of one of the schools in Washington, the question was put to a class of small boys: "Why is the Connecticut river so called?" when a bright little fellow put up his hand. "Do you know, James?" "Yes, ma'am. Because it connects Vermont and New Hampshire, and cuts through Massachusetts," was the triumphant reply.

SIZE NO PROOF OF LEARNING.—A young boot-black observed a neighbor poring wisely over a newspaper, whereupon he addressed him thus: "Julius, what are you looking at that paper for? You can't read!" "Go away," cried the other, indignantly; guess I can read; I see big enough for dat." "Big enuff!" retorted the other, scornfully; "dat ain't nuffin. A cow's big 'nuff to catch mice, but she can't!"

A SCHOOL boy being requested to write a composition upon the subject of "Pins," produced the following: "Pins are very useful. They have saved the lives of many men, women and children—in fact, whole families." "How so?" asked the puzzled teacher. And the boy replied: "Why, by not swallowing them. This matches the story of the other boy who defined salt as the stuff that makes potatoes taste bad when you don't put on any."

SHE tried to sit down in the street car, but was pinned back so tight she couldn't. Old lady peeped over her specs and asked her, "How long have you been afflicted in that way?" The young lady blushed and made "a break," sitting down sideways, and holding her knees together so tight that she looked as if she had on a one-legged pair of breeches. Old lady noticed her sitting in this sideways, cramped position, and whispered, "Bile, I s'pose; I have had em thar myself."

A WIDOW'S GRIEF ASSUAGED.—The other day a tall, thin woman from over the river hunted around Vicksburg until she found Coroner Blessing, whose retiring disposition and prompt attention to business are certain to make him famous all over the State within the coming year, and when she was certain of her man, she inquired: "Business ain't driving now, is it?"

"Well, nothing to brag of. I get a floater or a nigger now and then, but it isn't anything like old times."

She heaved a sigh, and continued: "Sam is missing."

"Sam, Sam," he repeated, "Yes, my ole man. It's nigh on to twelve weeks since he started to cross the river about six miles above here, and I'm getting anxious. I thought I'd drop down and see if you remembered of having set on such a man."

"About twelve weeks ago—less see! I believe I did pull in a floater some ten or eleven weeks since."

"Was he a tall man?"

"Yes, I think he was."

"Have a long nose and brick-colored hair?"

"Yes—I remember now."

"Cowhide shoes and a yaller coat on?"

"Yes—I got that very man!"

"Ariz to the surface and was pulled in here, sat on according to law, and duly buried?"

"He was, madam. And do you believe that the body was that of your missing husband?"

"I know it! He could drive mules or paddle a dug-out with any man in Louisiana, but he couldn't swim worth cobs. His canoe flopped over, he went under, and that's the reason he didn't come home."

"And do you want the body exhumed so as to make sure?"

"Was he put down to stay?"

"He was well buried, madam."

"Well, it's 'bout as well to let him stay there. He's probably fell away so that I wouldn't know him, and I don't feel like having my narves strung up!"

"Well, I'm sorry for you, madam. If I could have identified the body I would have sent you word right away."

"It's all right. I've felt it in my bones for more'n two months that I was a widder, and the shock don't stagger me like it would at first. I'm sorry, for Sam was kind."

"Yes, it was too bad."

"But he ought a knowed better, when he couldn't swim. I told him and told him and told him, and that day I told him again, and he hollered back, 'Shut up.'"

"He did?"

"Yes, he did; and now he's under the sile and I'm here! I'm 'bleeged, Mr. —; I know where he is now, and when I wake up in the night I shan't worry so much. Is there anything to pay?"

"No—nothing."

"Well, I'll go home feeling better. It's kinder hard to have the old man go under that way, but I s'pose the Lord knows best. The Bible says we cometh up to be cut down, and I suppose that means drowning as well as shooting."

And she felt to see if her spectacle case was all safe, and started for home.—Vicksburg Herald.

DOG LAW.—A citizen of Gratiot avenue called on the Chief of Police one day, and without skirmishing around, he inquired: "Isn't dere zome law about dot?"

"What is that?" asked the Chief.

"Can dot be dot a veller shall call his dog 'Bismarck'?" replied the man.

"Why, a man can name his dog any name he wants to, I suppose."

"He can?"

"Yes."

"And dot man schall call his dog Bismarck?"

"Yes."

"And ze law ish no goot?"

"No."

"Hi! ha! yes! I schall go mit my house and name my dog Shorge-Vhashington Sheneral-Grant-Bostmaster Shewell—pooty quick!"

And he was red in the face as he left.—Detroit Free Press.

rang, and the servant handed a card to Jones' wife.

DOC. OWSLEY, of Jacksonburg, Ind., has been sued for $10,000 damages by Gilbert Cox for seduction of Mrs. Cox.
He has gone West, it is supposed, to set up another shop.
He was Superintendent of the Sunday-school at Jackson-burg, and made great pretensions to piety.

THE Index has a good anecdote of a young miss who, upon being enlightened as to the truth of there being no such person as "Santa Claus," and that all she had heard about his carrying around presents for children was mere fiction, when she tartly replied: "Then I suppose what you have told me about Jesus Christ and the Devil is all false, too."

In a lecture on coal, Prof. Brewer, adopting the theory that the sun is the fountain-head of all forces on this earth, argues that when coal is burned we are merely receiving the heat and light shed by the sun on vegetation in by-gone geological eras, the fact being that force is never destroyed, but simply changed from one kind of force to another. He defines coal as a substance of vegetable origin, made perhaps of swampy material, or of vast forests, and consisting principally of carbon, with which are united hydrogen and oxygen, together with some earthy matter, its hard or soft character depending on the amount of volatile matter present.

ANOTHER FRAIL CLERGYMAN.—Rev. P. H. Brittain, pastor of the Methodist church at Beverly, N. J., has been forced to abandon his church and leave the place for trying to corrupt two young girls in a family where he and his wife were boarding. His wife was very indignant, and demanded a separation from such a guilty man. He confessed before the parents of the girls to the baseness of his designs upon them. He went to Vineland; and the people there will do well to watch the Reverend gentleman, and not trust their daughters in his care.

IN the course of a Baptist doctrinal sermon delivered in Greensboro', Ga., the reverend colored preacher illustrated the difference between the Baptist and Methodist churches by relating an anecdote. "Some years ago a man 'fessed 'ligion and 'plied to jine de Baptist church.
He gin his 'sperience and was 'jected. So he went right straight and jined de Mefodis'. Some time after dat a brudder Baptis' axed him: 'How dis? We wouldn't hab you, an' de Mefodis' dun tuk you.' 'Oh,' says he, 'you ol' Baptis' want to make me pay cash down, but de Mefodis' gin me six months' credick.'"

ANOTHER CHRISTIAN SEDUCTION.—R. M. Pomeroy, of Morning Sun, Iowa, President of the Young Men's Christian Association, and President of the bank at that place, has been following Beecher's example of "nest-hidipg."
For some time he has had a widowed lady and her daughter keeping house for him, and all went well until a few days ago, when the young woman became the mother of an heir, which she claimed belonged to Pomeroy. For a while there was trouble in the Christian camp, and the erring Pomeroy was made to walk up to and "acknowledge the corn. He got off, however, by paying the unfortunate victim of his lust $850, and then departed for a more genial clime. Had he been a poor man, the court would have settled the affair by assessing four or five thousand dollar's damage and sentencing him to a term of years in the Penitentiary, but his wealth and the church saved him, while the poor girl is cast adrift almost penniless.

STILL ANOTHER.—His name is Julius Wittrup. He is a Methodist preacher living at Winfield, N. Y. He is full of grace, and is greatly given to pious exhortation; but Julius has not entirely overcome the lusts of the flesh.
Not long since his wife's niece, an estimable young lady, aged sixteen, was placed by her parents, previous to a journey to Europe, in charge of said Wittrup and wife.
One day when the rest of the family were out, this pious man went to the young lady's room, locked the door, and made an indecent exposure of his person and attempted to seduce her. The young lady resisted him, and upon the return of her aunt, made known the facts to her.
Notwithstanding every means was used to keep the affair private, it soon became known; but the lecher is recognized and fellowship by the church, and he still "breaks the breerd of life to hungry souls."

"MR. BEECHER has conducted himself since his trial in a manner so offensive to decency, so inconsistent with his sacred calling, and so out of relation to the character he claims for himself and his partisans ask the public to believe in his innocence, that we are not surprised to hear startling reports as to his actions. The following, however, from the White Mountains correspondence of the Express is almost too disgraceful for belief:

"The Beecher excitement is quite died out. At first there was a great rush to see him, and hear him, but now the fun is over, and last Sunday his entire audience did not exceed 2,000 people. He is to return to Brooklyn this week, much to the displeasure of the Barrons, who keep the hotel where he is staying. They have given him his board and $50 a week to stay and preach at their house.
He thinks they are making too much money out of him, and demands that they pay him $200 a week. The Barrons say this is too much, and Beecher says, 'All right, gentlemen, I go home this week.' 'If you do, we will sue you for breach of contract; for, Mr. Beecher, you agreed to stay till the third Sunday in September.' Beecher coolly replies, 'Sue away, if you like. I should think after what you have seen of my success in the law business, that you would know better than to undertake a suit against me.'"

The Barrons are furious. They say they have done everything for Beecher; that they defended him in the newspapers, and have petted him always. But they can't help themselves. When Mr. Beecher makes up his mind to go, he will start if a whole regiment opposes.'

The previous report that Mr. Beecher was a deadhead at the Twin Mountain House, paying his way by exhibiting himself there, was discreditable enough; but the above is an outrage to honor and decency that we are not able to believe even of Mr. Beecher.—N. Y. Sun.

ERNEST RENAN, the author of the "Life of Jesus," is waging war on the University of France, which, he maintains, under its present name and organization, is bereft of half the usefulness a university should have. He advocates free chairs and free teaching, and all the improvements introduced in the universities of Germany.
Renan, while believing that it is quite legitimate to learn from one's enemy, contends that the changes he proposes were already in vogue in the time of St. Louis, and as to the question of copying, it is Germany that copied them from France.

THE opinion is now entertained by some geologists that the earth is shrinking—chiefly about its Equatorial region—and is being thrust out near the poles; and the distribution of this force may, it is thought, be correlated with that of terrestrial magnetism. It is to a great extent proved that volcanoes are not found in areas of upheaval, but are indicative of areas of depression. They are most numerous in the equatorial regions, and are found to constantly increase in numbers as the equator is approached from the poles. It is also a remarkable fact that the two volcanic groups of the Antilles and the Sun-da Islands are situated exactly at the antipodes of each other, and also in the vicinity of the two poles of flattening, the existence of which on the surface of the globe has been proved by the recent calculations of astronomers. Many instances are known of magnetic disturbances coinciding with earthquakes, hence the supposed probable connection between the two phenomena.

A PARAGRAPH from the Pall Mall Gazette shows the peculiar arts resorted to by the Jesuits in France to secure a hold on the public, and especially on the women and children. Among these is the erection of a splendid altar in the Cathedral of Nevers, in commemoration of the saving of that town from the Prussians by the interposition of the "Sacred Heart of Jesus," whatever that particular deity may be. The cost of the altar was subscribed in great part by women in the names of their husbands, though the latter may have looked with contempt on the ridiculous imposture. It was also contributed to by the Count of Chambord. Certainly any idolatry more gross or more debasing was never known, and the worship of the classic deities of field and stream was elevating in comparison with it. The Jesuits in France, it is reported, are actively engaged in opposing primary education—as in logical consistency with the teachings of their infallible Master all Catholic priests would seem obliged to do, openly or otherwise.

A PIECE of oak fossilized, which had evidently when in condition of wood been artificially cut with square edges to a shape some twenty inches long by fourteen wide and five deep, has recently been found in the South Fork Tunnel, near Forest City, Sierra county, Cal., 1,800 feet from the mouth of the tunnel, with 800 vertical feet of the mountain above it. This relic of human artifice in the prehistoric period was found in what was the west bank of the great river which ran across the present course of the Sierra river system. How many thousands of centuries have passed since it was shaped, and for how many it has lain undisturbed in its deeply covered grave, is a suggestive subject of study and conjecture. Other discoveries, indicating the existence of man in very remote ages, have been made in various sections of this old river course; and in 1858 a number of fossilized pine logs, seven feet long and four in diameter, that had been neatly sawed and piled up together, were found in the Alleghany Tunnel, under the bed of the "Old Blue River."
The recently found relic has been forwarded to the California State University.

The Pro and Con of Supernatural Religion; or,

An Answer to the Question: Have We a Supernaturally Revealed, Infallibly Inspired and Miraculously Attested Religion in the World?

BY E. E. GUILD.

WERE THE WRITERS OF THE FOUR GOSPELS INFALLIBLY INSPIRED?

The affirmative of this question is often asserted in the most positive terms, and it has been accepted as truth very generally in the Christian world. It only requires the statement of a few facts to show that it is a wholly gratuitous assumption.

1. There is no proof that either God or Christ, ever directed or authorized them to write the books in question.

2. There is no proof that they had the most distant idea that these books would be collected, compiled in a volume, and transmitted to succeeding generations.

3. They nowhere assert or intimate that they possessed such inspiration.

It may be said that if they do not make this claim for themselves, Paul makes it for them, where he asserts that, "All scripture is given by inspiration of God." We reply that Paul's declaration has nothing to do with the question before us, first, because it says not one word about infallible inspiration, and second, because when he made the declaration the gospels had not been written, and were therefore not in existence. We may be told that Christ promised to his disciples the aid of the "Holy Spirit," which would direct them what to say in all emergencies, and "lead them into all truth." Without questioning whether Christ made such a promise or not, and taking it for granted that he did, we proceed to inquire; was the promise fulfilled to the extent of making the disciples infallible? The Holy Spirit we are informed in the gospels was bestowed upon the disciples between the time of Christ's crucifixion and his ascension into heaven. From this time forward were the disciples infallible? The numerous contradictions, discrepancies, and mistakes contained in the gospels, some of which we have pointed out in this book, prove either that they were not written by the disciples, or if they were, they were not infallibly inspired. Besides, when the questions came before the disciples of whether the gospels should be preached to the Gentiles, and whether the Gentiles should observe the ceremonial law of Moses, they settled them not by authority of infallible inspiration, but the first question was settled in Peter's mind by a special vision, and the other by calling a Council of the disciples to consider the question, to deliberate upon it, to discuss it, and after different opinions had been expressed on it, it was finally decided in accordance with a proposal made by James who occupied a middle ground on the subject. Now, if the disciples were conscious of the possession of infallibility, or if they believed themselves to be infallible, here was a fine opportunity for them to assert it, and to make a display of it, but they seem not to have thought of any such thing.

The failure in the fulfilment of this promise said to have been made to the disciples, is paralleled by the failure of other promises of a similar nature. The writers of the gospels, state that Christ promised in the most emphatic and unequivocal manner that after his ascension into heaven he would return to earth during the life time of some at least of his disciples, that then he would be seated upon "the throne of his glory, and his disciples should also be seated" on twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel. The generation then living was not to pass away before this promise was to be fulfilled. (Matt. x, 23, xiv, 29-35; Mark xiii, 28-31; Luke xxi, 27-32; Mat. xvi, 27, 28; Mark viii, 38 and ix, 1; Luke ix, 26, 27; Matt. xix, 28.) In the Epistles of the New Testament this coming of Christ is often alluded to, and the belief expressed that it was to take place during the natural life of the writers. (See 2 Thes. i, 6-10; 1 Cor. xi, 6; 1 Tim. vi, 14; James v, 7, 8; 1 Thess. iii, 13, and v, 23; 2 Thess. iii, 5; Heb. x, 25, and 37; 1 John ii, 28; 1 Thess. v, 1-4, and iv, 13-17; 1 Cor. xv, 51, 52; 1 Peter vii, 7.) It is a well known fact that the early Christians lived in the constant expectation of the speedy return, or second advent of Christ to this world, at which time the dead were to be raised, the living changed from mortality to immortality, Christ's kingdom established here on earth, and the saints to rule and reign with him in his kingdom.

Another promise said to have been made by Christ was that the believers in his gospel should be endowed with the power of casting out devils, of speaking with new tongues, of being invulnerable to the poison of serpents, or even of the most deadly poison drunk by them. They should also be able to restore the sick to health by the laying on of hands. See Mark xvi, 17, 18.

Now as there has been no such personal second advent of Christ, as the dead have not been raised, nor the living changed, as no thrones have been established for the occupancy of the disciples, and as believers in the gospel have not the power to do the things which were predicted, therefore these promises have not been fulfilled. It follows that either Christ made no such promises, or if he did, he was mistaken in his predictions. Take whichever horn of the dilemma we may, it follows that the gospel writers were not infallibly inspired. Either they were mistaken in attributing these promises to Christ, or they were mistaken in believing that they would be fulfilled.

WHAT WE DO AND WHAT WE DO NOT KNOW ABOUT THE BIBLE?

The Old Testament is a collection of Jewish sacred books. The number of them is 39. They were written by different authors and at different periods of time. At what particular time the collection was made, and who the writers were, as also, the precise time when they were written we do not know. We are equally ignorant in regard to the persons by whom the collection was made. Some of the books are more than 2500 years old. During the times of Samuel, David, and Solomon, literature began to flourish, records were made, histories and narratives were written, and songs and hymns were composed. The first four books of the Pentateuch originated in the time of Solomon, 1019 years before Christ, but the Pentateuch was not completed until the time of Josiah 641 before Christ. It was commenced 432 years after the death of Moses, and finished in the form in which we now have it 810 years after his death. The whole five books are in great part compilations from previously existing documents of the writers of which nothing is known. The last book of the Old Testament was written 397 before Christ. The Hebrew Bible abounds in repetitions of history, narratives, genealogies, laws, oracles, proverbs, sentences, and thoughts. If these repetitions were expunged from it, it would reduce the volume to nearly one-half its present size. The style of composition of these books is very different. In some of them it is pure, grand, and beautiful, in others it is low, vulgar, mean, and poor. During 2551 years these books existed only in manuscript and during the entire history of the Jews as a nation the care of them was committed to the priests. After the return of the Jews from the Babylonian captivity 518 years before Christ, they ceased to speak the Hebrew language, and from that time until 130 before Christ, a period of 388 years these books were locked up in a dead language, and could be read only by a very few of the Jewish people. The books were originally written in continuous letters and lines, without any division into chapters, sentences, or words, and without punctuation. The work of copying them was a difficult and laborious task and even the reading of them was attended with great difficulty. Only a few copies were extant and these were held to be of great pecuniary value, placing them beyond the reach of the mass of the people. In regard to the preservation of these books and the prevention of them from corruption the Jews have a variety of traditions some of which are fabulous, others contradictory, and none of them reliable. The first mention of the collection of these books, as a whole, was by Jesus, the Son of Sirach, 130 before Christ. The first translation of the books into another language was commenced about 286 before Christ, and finished 130 before Christ. This was a Greek version called the Alexandrian, or version of the Seventy. It was the one in use in the time of Christ and his Apostles, and quoted from by them. This version was followed by several other Greek versions. In the year 405 of the Christian era Jerome finished a Latin translation from the Hebrew. From this time we will consider the Old Testament in connection with the Christian Scriptures.

The New Testament is a collection of books written during the first two centuries of the Christian era. They are in number 27. Some of them are historical but most are epistolary. They were written by different persons at different times and places. But excepting most of the epistles attributed to Paul, and a few attributed to other writers, we do not positively know the precise time when, place where, nor persons by whom they were written. Most if not all the epistles were written before the gospels. In regard to the origin, authorship, and history of the historical books, i. e. the four gospels, but little is known with certainty, up to the time when they were separated from a number of writings relating to the same subject, which was near the end of the second century. As Mr. Foulde well observes, "there exists no ancient writings whatever, of such vast moment to mankind of which so little can be authentically known." We may add that there is no part of human history of equal importance that is involved in so much obscurity as that which relates to the birth, life and death, of Jesus Christ, and the life and death, of his Apostles. Notwithstanding the vast amount of time and labor which learned men have expended in endeavoring to clear up the subject, their efforts thus far have been unavailing. It is known, however, that as Moshem says, "not long after the ascension of Christ, several histories of his life and doctrines, full of pious frauds and fabulous wonders, were composed by persons whose intentions perhaps, were not bad, but whose writings discovered the greatest superstition and ignorance. Nor was this all; productions appeared which were imposed upon the world by fraudulent men, as the writings of the holy apostles." It is equally well known that at a very early period in the history of the Christian church differences of opinion sprung up among Christians, occasioning the most fierce and bitter controversies, and that the defenders of their respective opinions did not scruple to forge whole books and ascribe their authorship to Christ or some of his apostles, in order to prove their doctrines.

The books of the New Testament were selected from a number of other gospels and epistles, but at what particular time or by whom, is not certainly known. Irenæus who lived A. D. 182, is the first of the Fathers who mentions the four gospels by name. In the year 368 the Council of Laodicea gave a catalogue of all books in the New Testament. In 397 at the third council of Carthage the books of the Old and New Testament, as they now stand in the Bible were pronounced canonical, and the reading of the apocryphal books in the churches was forbidden. At the council of Chalcedon in 401 the New Testament was used as the ultimate standard of appeal, and a decree of Pope Innocent I, about that time, confirming the selection which had been previously made, established the canon as it now stands.

Most of the original manuscripts from which our New Testament books were selected have long been lost. All that are now extant have been collected and published in a book called the Apocryphal New Testament. This book is about the same size as the one supposed to be genuine.

During 1200 years or until the art of printing was discovered the books of the New Testament were in manuscript only and mainly in the hands of the clergy. The first translation of the Bible into English was by Wickliffe in 1360. This was not printed except the New Testament part, and that was not done until 1731. The first printed Bible in English was that of Lindal and Coverdale in 1526. Our present English version was made by order of King James I and printed in 1613.

The Bible as a whole has been frequently copied, numerous translations have been made of it and it has been printed in all the principle languages in the world.

The division of the Bible into chapters was made by Hugo, who lived about A. D. 1240. The division of the chapters into verses was by Mordecai Nathan, a Jewish Rabbi in 1475.

Our English Bible was translated not from the original manuscripts of the writers, but from copies of the original, none of which in the Old Testament were older than the 9th century of the Christian era, and none of the New Testament older than the sixth century.

Notwithstanding the opinion which for a long time prevailed, that in a mysterious and miraculous manner God had taken care to preserve the inviolable purity of the text of the Bible, or if not that, at least the purity of the original, the investigations of learned men have proved that among all the copies of the original Hebrew of the Old Testament, and those of the Greek of the New Testament, there is not one that is perfect, or any two of either that exactly agree. And among all the translations and versions, whether of private individuals or of authorized bodies of men, there is not two that are alike. Kennicott and De Rossi spent thirty-six years in collecting ancient Hebrew and Samaritan manuscripts of the Old Testament. They obtained and compared more than 1200 copies, and De Rossi published four quarto volumes of various readings found in about 400 manuscripts which he examined. The variations amounted to over 130,000.

The New Testament contains seven books the authenticity of which was disputed for a long time by many in the early Christian church, and Dr. Lardner says, they are "not fit to be alleged as affording sufficient proof of any doctrine." These books are Hebrews, James, 2nd and 3rd John, Jude, 2nd Peter, and Revelations. It also contains passages which by some learned men are deemed to be spurious. Such as Matt. i, 17-25, and whole of 2nd chapter; the 1st and 2nd chapters of Luke, except the four first verses, and many other accounts and verses which are regarded as interpolations into the original text.

In our common English Bible there are a great number of additions which are not contained in the original, some of which at least are liable to mislead the reader. Such are all the words printed in italics. These were supplied by the translators. So also the headings of the chapters, and in the upper margin of the pages.

Finally, the work of collecting, arranging, copying and translating the books of the Bible has been done by human hands, by uninspired and fallible men; and by human authority alone it has been pronounced infallible in its teachings.

OBSCURITY OF THE BIBLE.

That the Bible is very obscure in its teachings is generally admitted by those who know most about it. No book was ever published to which such a variety of interpretations have been given. Thousands of commentaries have been written upon it, by men of equal talent and learning, no two of which give it the same exposition. Out of the millions of believers in the infallibility of its inculcations, it is not probable that any two could be found who would agree in their understanding of its contents. This is not wonderful if we consider that the books were composed by some forty different authors, who lived in different ages of the world, and if we allow that the writers, like all other men, were liable to entertain conflicting views and to be mistaken in their opinions. But on the supposition that they wrote as they were directed by unerring inspiration, it is truly surprising that they have not written, so as to be clearly and definitely understood. What kind of revelation is that which requires thousands of elaborate tomes to explain it, and them when the explanation is given requires a whole library of books to explain the explanation? A few of the Biblical writers seem to claim some sort of inspiration, but precisely what they meant by it we do not know. We have plenty of men in our day who talk very much as the ancient prophets did. They tell us of what the Lord has said to them, and come to us with messages which they claim to be direct from God. They seem to attribute their impressions, concerning religion to the special agency of God. In this they may be very honest and yet be mistaken, and so might the Scripture writers, referred to.

The Bible has been very aptly compared to a box of lettered wooden blocks. These blocks by being properly arranged can be made to express anything the manipulator desires to have expressed. So by arranging certain texts of Scripture, the Bible may be made to teach nearly all of the conflicting creeds of the numerous Christian sects. The style of the Bible is often highly figurative. It abounds in hyperboles, tropes, similes, parables and symbols. This makes it susceptible of a variety of interpretations, and renders the real meaning of the writers difficult to ascertain. The celebrated John Leland was a distinguished and very successful Baptist clergyman for more than sixty years. During all this time he was a close student of the Bible. He availed himself of all the means in his power to ascertain the true import of its teachings. He counted every book, chapter, verse, word, and letter between its lids. When eighty-six years of age he made the following candid confession; "If God formed me with talents to be an expositor of the holy scriptures, I have criminally neglected to improve the talents which he gave me, for now when I am eighty-six years old, I have not the least understanding of the last nine chapters of Ezekiel; and the same is true of a great part of the Bible. I read commentators, but remain ignorant. My prayer is that I may know and practice the truth, but I remain under the cloud, groveling in the dark." See the writings of Elder John Leland, page 783.

WHAT SHALL WE DO WITH THE BIBLE?

Select from it all that is valuable, especially the grand and glorious, theoretical and practical truths which it contains; bind these into a volume, publish an immense edition of the same, and put a copy into the hands of every human being. Treasure up the remainder and carefully preserve it as a relic of the folly and superstition of past ages.

BIBLICAL FACTS WORTH REMEMBERING.

1. The Bible contains but two definitions of God. These are, "God is a spirit," "God is love."
2. The word inspiration occurs but twice in the Bible. Once it is applied to the human understanding, and once to the Jewish sacred Scriptures.
3. The word religion is not contained in the Old Testament, and occurs but three times in the New. The word religious occurs twice, and only in the New Testament.
4. There is but one definition of religion in the Bible, and that is in James i, 27.
5. The phrase "born again," occurs but three times in the Bible. It was used twice by Christ and once by Peter.
6. The Jews had no definite ideas on the subject of a future state of existence, nor of the existence of a Devil, and had no proper names for any of the angels, until they were carried captive to Babylon. They derived their opinions on these subjects not from their sacred scriptures but from the Magian religion.

A CHAPTER OF DEFINITIONS.

GOD. The Power that controls the universe of matter and mind. The magnum bonum, or sum of all power; the summum bonum, or sum of all good; the self-existent cause of all causes and effects.

DEVIL. That which stands in the way of human happiness.

HEAVEN. A state or condition of the mind and feelings consequent on the consciousness of moral rectitude.

HELL. Self reproach and condemnation for doing intentionally what we know, or believe to be wrong.

MORAL AGENCY. The power of choosing to do what we believe to be right in preference to doing what we think to be wrong.

FREE AGENCY. A self-determining power claimed by some to be possessed by man by which he is enabled to act in opposition to the strongest motives and contrary to his strongest inclinations.

SELF INTEREST. The main-spring of human action. When unenlightened and misdirected it tends to misery. When properly directed it produces the highest good. Not until men learn that their best interest and chief good consists in promoting the interest and happiness of their fellowmen will they know how to happy themselves. Man is necessarily a selfish being, but to human selfishness manifested in this way certainly no one can object.

CONSCIENCE. A feeling which inclines us to do what we believe to be right, and reproaches us for doing what we think to be wrong.

WISDOM. The knowledge that the order of Nature is such that the consequences of well or ill doing follow by an immutable law and that this order cannot be departed from, even by God himself, without his ceasing to be God.

FOLLY. The belief that God's moral government is based on contingencies, so that the consequences of wrong doing may or may not be experienced by the wrong doer.

RELIGION. Knowledge of the relation which man sustains to God, and of the duties which grow out of that relation, and the proper direction of the religious faculties.

FALSE RELIGION. Imperfect knowledge of man's relation to God, and misdirection of the religious faculties.

MORALITY. Knowledge of the relation which man sustains to his fellowmen and faithful discharge of the duties which grow out of that relation.

MIRACLE. An effect without a sufficient cause. Various definitions have been given of this term. If it is defined to signify a wonder then the world is full of miracles, for surely it abounds with wonders on every hand. If it signifies a suspension or counteraction of the laws of Nature then miracles are plenty, for the laws of Nature are being counteracted every day. It is a law of nature that water should seek its own level and run down hill, but by applying sufficient force it may be prevented from doing either. Nature's law makes all heavy bodies tend to the centre of our earth, but any of us can take hold of a pebble or a piece of iron and force it to go in a horizontal or perpendicular direction contrary to its natural tendency. Do we in all such cases work a miracle? If by miracle is meant a special act of Divine power, without the intervention of law, we are involved in an inextricable difficulty; for how can it be proved that any event occurs without law? The time has been when all the phenomena of nature were regarded as special acts of Divine providence. This view is now admitted to be erroneous. May it not be equally erroneous to suppose any event to occur without law? If we say of any given phenomenon that it is miraculous simply because we do not know the cause of it what is this but asserting that we know the cause of it when at the same time we admit we do not? Besides, if all phenomena of the cause of which we are ignorant is miraculous, then again the world is full of miracles, for there is plenty of phenomena of which we know not the cause. The truth is that nothing is miraculous that is produced by an adequate cause, and therefore if miracles exist at all, they must consist of effects without sufficient cause. It has been well said that the greatest conceivable miracle would be that any intelligent man should understandingly believe in miracles. So far as we know anything about the system of Nature the Universe is governed by an order which is uniform and invariable, and no deviation from the unchangeableness of this order can be admitted without more and better proof than has even yet been adduced.

FAITH. Confidence or trust in a thing or being based on what we know or think we know of that thing or being. There can be no faith that is not founded on real or supposed knowledge.

BELIEF. An opinion produced by evidence either real or imaginary. From the nature of the mind evidence amounting to proof and perceived to be such must necessarily produce conviction. Men are passive in the reception of their opinions; they can by no means believe or disbelieve just what they will or wish contrary, to the evidence as it appears to them. The utmost they can do is to deny their convictions, or profess to have convictions when they have not. Rational belief cannot be induced by bribes or threats by promises of reward for believing, nor by threats of punishment for unbelief. To undertake to gain the belief of men by bribes or deter them from unbelief by threats is at the best only to make of them hypocrites and slaves.

NATURE. The universe of matter and of mind. The aggregate of everything that exists.

TRUTH. A fact in Nature. When stated in human language it is a statement in conformity with fact. Truth in the aggregate is the aggregate of all the facts that ever did, do now, or ever will exist in the Universe.

MATTER. A form of Spirit tangible to the human senses.

SPIRIT. A form of Matter not cognizable by the senses. All cognizable forms of matter are incarnations of the infinite spirit of the universe. As forms they are finite and perishable, but the material of which they are composed is indestructible, and when these forms are destroyed, enters into the composition of other forms. Thus the infinite is being constantly resolved into the finite and the finite into the infinite. This is the real work of creation which never had a beginning and can never have an end. Nothing is lost in nature. Only two things can be annihilated, one is form, the other is phenomena. The form of the human body or of any other body which exists today must ultimately be decomposed and resolved back into its original elements to enter into the composition of other forms. The lightnings flash and thunders roar so visible to our senses for a moment, in a moment ceases to be, and although a similar phenomenon may appear the same one can never be reproduced. That the infinite Spirit of the universe possesses intelligence is proved from the fact that intelligence exists in all animated beings. What nature does not contain could never be derived from nature. The whole question of the immortality and personal consciousness and identity of the human mind may be settled by simply deciding the question, is mind an entity or a phenomenon. The arguments usually adduced to prove the immortal personal consciousness of man are merely inferential, and however logical they may be they do not demonstrate but only render it probable. All that relates to the future beyond the present moment relates to the unknown and is a mere matter of opinion. For wise and good purposes Nature has so ordered it that we can have no positive knowledge of the future. Every human being knows or believes just as much about the future as in his present state of development he ought to know. He who cannot be thankful to God for all that is past and trust him for all that is to come is "without hope and without God in the world." However real the future may be it is unknown to us. The present is real; we live in the present, and if we were more solicitous to discharge with fidelity the duties of the present and less disinclined to trust God to dispose of us as he in his infinite wisdom and goodness deems best it would be far better for the interest and happiness of us all. The reality of a future state of existence for man can be demonstrated positively only by the reappearance in proper person in a spiritual but tangible form of some person with whom we were well acquainted and knew him to have been beyond the possibility of doubt. Some men in our day claim to have this evidence. We will not dispute if the fact be so let it be proved.

NATURAL. Any event or phenomenon which occurs in the established order of events or which constitutes both an effect and a cause in the interminable chain of causes and effects which never had a beginning and can have no end.

SUPERNATURAL. That which is above or beyond Nature. As Nature, or the universe of matter and mind is infinite, boundless, and illimitable, there can be nothing above or beyond it. The power that controls our bodies resides in and not outside of the body. There can be no outside to that which is boundless in extent. The infinite power of the Universe pervades every part of it and is present in every phenomenon of matter or of mind. No event can be supernatural.

REVEAL. To make known to the mind.

REVELATION. That which is made known to the mind of which the mind was previously ignorant. As all our knowledge is obtained through the medium of the senses whatever is communicated to the mind must be communicated through that medium. Whenever men claim to have knowledge which they have derived through some other channel we way set them down as self deceived or imposters.

INSPIRATION. The voluntary or spontaneous action of the inherent powers and faculties of the human mind. All men are inspired but not all to the same extent. The highest inspiration is found in those men whose various faculties are harmoniously developed to the greatest degree.

Damnation Eternal.

"Eternal plagues and heavy chains,
Tormenting racks and fiery coals,
And darts to inflict immortal pains,
Dipped in the blood of damned souls."

In this country, no ordeal, perhaps, is more severe than that of maintaining a position which freely allows each one to do his own thinking. But it is the Christian whose creed is expressed above that forbids to others, the freedom of thought under penalties of

"Tormenting racks, and fiery coals."

Educated Freedom says—"Think—think, yourself." That is the legitimate function of human brains. The mind is an apparatus, made on purpose to elaborate ideas. But the Christian says, "No! you must think as I do or be damned." Belief is a matter of necessity. Faith is volitional; and what is called "saving faith" is that act of credulity, that creates "the evidence of things unseen" (Heb. 12:1). Faith, therefore, is exercised in respect to "things unseen," or assumed, without proof; they are taken for granted "by faith." And this faith is the authority by which we are threatened eternal damnation.

ELIJAH THE TISHBITE.—CONTINUED.

After Elijah had put to death the four hundred and fifty prophets of Baal, Ahab returned and informed his wife, Jezebel, what the good man had done, and as the murdered men were her friends, she naturally was much offended, and she sent word to the Tishbite that she would have his life within twenty-four hours. This alarmed the prophet greatly, and he fled for his life, evidently having more confidence in Jezebel's enmity than in his God's protection.

He went a day's journey into the wilderness, and in a gloomy state of mind took a seat under a juniper tree, and "even wished he were dead." He asked the Lord to take his life; but instead of dying, he took a nap, from which he was awakened by the touch of an angel, who invited him to partake of a repast provided for him of cake, freshly baked, and a cruse of water. This was not brought by ravens, but by angels of another color. The prophet ate heartily and laid down again, doubtless wearied with his day's walk. After this sleep, the angel prepared another repast, to which he invited the prophet. That must have been a hearty, refreshing meal, for, upon the strength of it, Elijah walked forty days and forty nights, unto Horeb. This great feat of pedestrianism surpasses anything the world has known in that line. It leaves Weston and others far in the shade. They have walked six days and nights consecutively by stopping three or four hours each day for refreshments and sleep; but this Tishbite man kept it up forty days and forty nights—and all upon the strength of that one meal. Not knowing the distance to Horeb, we cannot say how that walk was for speed, but in point of long continuance without food or rest, it is most astonishing, and taxes our utmost credulity.

If God had special need for Elijah at Horeb, it would have been kind in him to have transported him thither in a more pleasant manner than walking without intermission for forty days and nights. If he had sent around his carriage, in which he afterwards transported his servant to heaven, it would have saved the old man many weary days and nights.

Elijah must have been greatly in fear of Queen Jezebel to thus hasten away from her. Why did he not go back to the widow where he lived in such safe seclusion, and where he had been so well treated? It certainly would have been preferable to a ceaseless walk of forty days and nights without food or sleep.

On arriving at Horeb, the prophet took up his abode in a cave, and singularly enough, God came by in a still, small voice and asked him what he was doing there? The prophet answered by asserting the zeal he had felt for God, and that he had fled from those who sought his life; whereupon God commanded him to go and anoint Hazael, king of Syria, and Jehu, king of Israel, and to look up Elisha, the son of Shaphat, and anoint him to be prophet in his own place. Elijah left to perform this mission. He found Elisha plowing with twelve yoke of oxen—a pretty good "plow-team," at all events, and one that ought to have turned a good furrow. Elisha seemed to enter very readily upon his new mission, after slaying two of the oxen, boiling them with the harness and plows, and gave the flesh to the people to eat. This done, he followed Elijah to learn to be a prophet.

After King Ahab had been slain at Ramoth-Gilead, in consequence of taking the word of four hundred lying prophets which God sent to deceive him, that he might be slain, and his son Ahaziah had succeeded him, it so happened that the son fell through some lattice work and injured himself considerably and was obliged to go to bed. Wishing to know the result of the injury, and whether it would terminate in death, he saw fit to send messengers to consult Baal-zebub, the god of Ekron, relative to the matter. This seems to have aroused God's jealousy, and he sent Elijah to intercept the messengers, and ask them if there was no God in Israel of whom they could enquire. The Tishbite told the messengers that the king should not recover, and they returned back to their master, who enquired of them why they had returned. They told him about meeting Elijah, and what he had said. The king then sent a captain and fifty men to go to Elijah and make further enquiries, and to bring him to the king. They found the prophet on the top of a hill, and the captain spoke very respectfully to him, calling him "man of God," and saying the king wished to see him. Elijah's amiable reply to this was: "If I be a man of God, then let fire come down from heaven and consume thee and thy fifty," and immediately the fire descended and consumed them. The king sent another captain with fifty more men, and they met the same fate; Elijah called down fire from heaven and consumed them.

In thus burning to death these one hundred and two men for merely asking the prophet to come down, was a punishment which in severity was out of all proportion to the offense. If the king erred, the men surely were not at fault, and it was a hard fortune that they should be burned to death for rendering simple obedience to the command of their king. Divine justice, however, according to many parts of the Bible, is so different from our highest conceptions of human justice, that we are often shocked at its unmerited severity, as in this case.

The king, being still solicitous, sent the third captain with fifty men, and this captain fell upon his knees before Elijah and implored him to be merciful and not slay them with fire as he had the two other companies who had visited him, and begged him to go and see the king. An angel just at that moment spoke a low word to the prophet, and told him to go down and see the king, and be not afraid, and he went. Had he done this sooner, the lives of one hundred men might have been saved. Elijah, after all, gave the king very little satisfaction, and told him that in consequence of his presuming to send to Baal-zebub, he should not recover, and he soon died.

It now appears that the good prophet had done so much to please his God, that the latter had decided to take him up into heaven unto himself in a most peculiar manner. We are left to suppose the killing of four hundred and fifty prophets of Baal, and the burning of two captains and one hundred men had rendered him a special favorite with God for which he should be rewarded in a remarkable way. Elijah and Elisha started together from Gilgal, and the former being aware his time had about come, seemed to wish to get away from the latter, and tried to get him to tarry at a number of places and let him go on by himself; but Elisha stuck to him like a brother, and swore he would not leave him. They went first to Bethel, when Elijah said God had sent him to Jericho, then they went to Jericho, from which place Elijah said the Lord had sent him to Jordan.

When they arrived at that river, Elijah took his mantle and smote the waters, and they were divided hither and thither, so that the two went over on dry land. This was truly a great feat to perform, and one all the prophets, priests, bishops and popes now in the world combined, could not perform. It is so unnatural for the waters of a river to pile up like a wall on either side, and so unusual for the bed of a river in a few minutes to become dry ground, so men could walk over dry shod, that it is very difficult for us to believe this was done in the case under consideration. It is entirely opposed to the laws of nature; water is ever quick to seek its level, and will not stand up like a wall unless it is frozen, neither will the beds of rivers, which abound in soft deposits of mud, if the water could be removed, suddenly become dry, firm ground.

It would seem the waters of the river Jordan had almost become familiar with being parted and piled up like a wall. They parted that way for Joshua and his army, in this case for Elijah, and on a subsequent occasion for Elisha. They may have got used to it, but if they are keeping it up to this day, the world has no account of it. We know that the waters of our rivers will not perform in this way, though they be smitten with all the mantles, cloaks, coats and pants in Chatham street. If the power to divide rivers could have been conveyed to posterity, and the secret transmitted to us of modern times, of what immense utility it might have been to the world in the movement of armies and in the common business of life. What numbers of ferries, bridges and pontoons it would have saved; but somehow these wonderful feats were all performed a long time ago, and the secret has been lost, or God has not so much leisure time to attend to them as formerly, or has less inclination to exhibit his skill in that direction, and people have been compelled to use ferries and bridges to cross the streams.

After they had crossed over the river, dry shod, and were walking along, chatting together, a chariot of fire and horses of fire came in between them and carried Elijah up to heaven. The account is confused, and says he went up in a chariot of fire, and also that he went up in a whirlwind. We don't see how it could be both ways. If it was a chariot and horses of fire, it was not a whirlwind, and if it was the latter, it was not a chariot of fire. He could not well go horseback and on foot at the same time.

But take it all in all, this is one of the most remarkable events that ever occurred, and Elijah was one of the most remarkable men that ever lived. He was probably the only man that ever existed that who, without God's help, or with it, could prevent moisture falling to the earth from the air above us in the form of rain and dew for the space of three years. He was perhaps the only man who could produce rain at will. He is the only one who has increased a handful of meal, and a few spoonfuls of oil, so as to furnish food for three persons for nearly three years. He was one of the very few who have raised the dead. In the killing business, he was a prodigy; there may have been individuals who have personally killed more than five hundred and fifty men, but the number of such has been very small. In pedestrianism and abstinence from food and sleep, he surpasses the world; in parting rivers with a mantle, very few have equalled him. In fireworks, he was pre-eminent over all who have ever lived. No other man has been able to call down fire at pleasure, and burn oxen, men, stones, dust, and even water. Could he have lived in this age of the world, he might have made an immense fortune as "Fire King." Such feats as he performed would be hailed with great applause in all quarters of the globe.

His last feat, of riding up into the ethereal blue—we know not how many hundred miles—in a chariot of fire, and with horses of fire, far transcends all his other performances. Of the countless billions of beings who have trod this earth, and who, when the cares and duties of life were over, have died from old age, disease, accident or violence, and the elements composing their bodies decomposed and returned to the fountains whence they came, he is the only one who has been conveyed in his crude material body in a chariot to the regions of ether far above the earth. When the extreme rarity of the upper air is considered; that human beings cannot derive from it enough of oxygen to sustain life, that being in it for a short time only, deprives a person of muscular and physical power; that the pressure of our atmosphere (fifteen pounds to the square inch), being chiefly removed, the tendency of the blood-vessels, arteries and veins is to be ruptured, and for blood to burst from the mouth and nose, so in that way, if no other, life would thus soon become extinct in the thin air above us;—when we remember, too, the intense frigidity of the ether above the earth—estimated by scientists to be over four hundred degrees below zero—in which a human being could not exist a minute; when all these facts are before us, the great improbability of this crowning feat of Elijah is strongly presented to the mind.

The most reasonable conclusion we can arrive at, is that the entire story is a fiction, written by some unknown person, who knew nothing of the laws and forces of nature, and who was ignorant of the truth that everything in the Universe is governed by unerring and unchangeable laws, but who supposed them to be controlled by the notions and whims of a fickle Providence.

Bible reverers of course think these events were special miracles, and were performed to carry on God's work, and to effect great good in the world. In this case, however, it is very difficult to see where any special good was accomplished by the impossible things Elijah was said to have performed. Ahab and his Queen Jezebel, were not converted, they continued to be ungodly while they lived, the worship of Baal was continued, the people did not materially change their course of life. Succeeding kings which ruled over Israel and Judah, continued to do wickedly and to die in their sins; the people were no better, and the efforts and performances attributed to Elijah seem to have produced no permanent good results, and thus the outlay of miraculous power afforded no adequate returns.

In all this business this truth is indisputable. In most cases where the laws of nature were set aside, and natural impossibilities were said to be performed, it was in the ages of ignorance and superstition; and as knowledge and education spread in the world, and as the truths of science illumine the minds of men, such impossibilities as were ascribed to Elijah no longer take place, nor are they believed by intelligent people.

Christianity Examined.

NO IX.

To convince the candid examiner that the Christian religion is made up from religious systems which existed many centuries prior to it; that it had not a divine origin; that it was not a dispensation from heaven, and that it was not only man-made and of human origin, but that in every essential particular it is a mere plagiarism, a reconstruction from the dogmas and superstitions of older heathen nations—no more nor less than a revised variety of paganism—it is only necessary to study the pages of history bearing upon the subject.

I. We find, as we have shown in previous articles, that the fundamental belief in the ministration of the Son of God and of a crucified Savior offered up as a sacrifice for the sins of the world, was old in many nations at the dawn of the Christian era. The world has had not less than two-score of Saviors, one-half of whom were said to have been crucified, and Jesus was the last of the number. It cannot be consistently claimed he was the original Son of God, the original Savior, the original sacrifice and atonement which was offered up for the salvation of the world, when it is so easily shown a large number of Saviors and Redeemers had preceded him, some three hundred, some five hundred, and some twelve hundred years before his time.

II. We find that all the doctrines, dogmas, practices, ordinances, sacraments, ceremonies and observances of the Christian Church, were taught, impressed and enjoined by various pagan teachers centuries before Christianity existed. This being the case, how can its devotees, with any degree of truth, or a semblance of consistency, claim theirs to be the only original Simon-pure religion ever vouchsafed from God to man? Can it be possible, their God or his Son in devising a grand plan of salvation by which the world were to be saved from endless torments, found it necessary to make up a "patch-work" system, taking a little here, borrowing a little there from old pagan errors and superstitions that had existed centuries before? Is it true, that a God of infinite knowledge, power and wisdom could not originate a system of his own, and not be compelled to take the silly inventions and absurdities of ignorant and unprogressed men?

III. We find, too, that the teachings and inculcations of Jesus, which his followers deem so grand, so sublime, so transcendently beautiful and godlike—his moral maxims, which have been pronounced wholly unequalled in the world, as well as other moral maxims equally as good, were uttered and enjoined by other reformers and other demi-gods hundreds of years prior to his time.

These facts can be easily proved, and they conclusively show that Christianity is not an original system, that it had not a divine origin, but that its features and doctrines were all devised by men and borrowed or stolen from the heathen; its boasted claims of originality and heavenly parentage, are completely overthrown and scattered to the winds.

Limited space will not permit our now adducing proofs at length of these propositions. We can merely name the Saviors the world has had at different times, give some of the rites, ceremonies and creeds borrowed from Pagans, and point out a few of the morals and sentiments attributed to Jesus, which were much earlier taught by others, leaving a fuller consideration of the subject for another occasion.

I. The world's Saviors have been numerous; they have been believed in in many different countries, and some run far back into antiquity. Here are the names of a portion of them:

- | | |
|--|---|
| 1. Christna or Christna, of Hindostan. | 23. Hil and Feta, of the Mandaites. |
| 2. Buddha Sakia, of India. | 24. Universal Monarch, of the Sibyls. |
| 3. Zoroaster, of Persia. | 25. Ischy, of Formosa. |
| 4. Crite, of Chaldea. | 26. Pythagoras, of Samos. |
| 5. Baal and Tacet, of Phoenicia. | 27. The Holy One, of Xaca. |
| 6. Thammuz, of Syria. | 28. Divine Teacher, of Plato. |
| 7. Fohi and Tien, of China. | 29. Adonis, of Greece. |
| 8. Thulis, of Egypt. | 30. Alcestos of Euripides. |
| 9. Indra, of Thibet. | 31. Hercules, son of God of Alemena. |
| 10. Devatat, of Siam. | 32. Apollo, son of Isis. |
| 11. Adad, of Assyria. | 33. Hesus and Bremillah, of the Druids. |
| 12. Prometheus, of Caucasius. | 34. Odin, of Scandinavia. |
| 13. Esculapius, of Egypt and Greece. | 35. Alcides, of Thebes. |
| 14. Witoba, of Telingonese. | 36. Thor, son of Odin of the Gauls. |
| 15. Kamolxis, of Thrace. | 37. Salivahand, of Bermuda. |
| 16. Zoor, of the Bonzes. | 38. Gentant and Quexalco, of Mexico. |
| 17. Atys, of Phrygia. | 39. Ixion, of Rome. |
| 18. Bali, of Afghanistan. | 40. Quirinius, of Rome. |
| 19. Jos, of Nepaul. | |
| 20. Mikado, of the Sintoos. | |
| 21. Beddru, of Japan. | |
| 22. Cadmus, of Greece. | |

This list of Saviors can be considerably extended, and not exhaust the entire number, but probably here are enough for all practical purposes to redeem one world from the angry curse of gods, and if this number cannot save it, perhaps it will have to be lost.

Several of these Saviors were said to have been begotten of God and born of virgins. Half the number were crucified for the salvation of the world, dying in great agony; and all were said to have received marked favor from heaven, and were considered special mediators and atoning sacrifices for the sins of man, and prior to the reputed life and death of Jesus.

II. That the traditions, rites, ceremonies and dogmas of Christianity were copied or purloined from older religious systems, is easily seen:

1. The birth of many of the Saviors of the ancients were claimed to have been pointed out by the stars.
2. Several of them were said to have been born in a stable and in a manger.
3. The birth of a number of them were announced by angels to shepherds.
4. Wise men or maji were claimed to have visited them in their early infancy, and to have worshiped and made them presents.
5. The 25th of December was the birthday designated for several of them, and has been a special day for feasts and ceremonies in commemoration and in honor of the Son of God for thousands of years.
6. The titles of the Heathen Saviors were much like those claimed for the Judean Savior. "The Most High," "the Lord of Life," "Holy Living God," "Son of God," "Mediator," "Savior," "Redeemer," "Redeemer of the World," "the Lamb of God," "the Ram of God," "the Holy Lamb," "the True Light," "the Sun of Righteousness," "True Light of the World," "Light of Men," "Guide to the Erring," "Advocate with the Father," are some among the great number of titles given to the pagan Saviors.
7. The legend of the Savior being saved from destruction when all the other infants were killed—as in the time of Herod—was handed down from centuries before that date.
8. The retirement and forty days' fasting of the Savior is an ancient heathen legend.
9. The performance of miracles was attributed to nearly all the Saviors, and greatly dwelt upon. Several raised the dead.
10. The older Saviors had disciples, whom they led about over the country, whom they taught, and whose feet they washed.

11. They taught multitudes in the villages, on the highway, in the fields and in the wilderness.

12. At the crucifixion of some of them, the sun was said to have been darkened and earthquakes to have taken place.

13. Several of the demi-gods were said to have descended into hell after their crucifixion.

14. The claim that they raised from the dead, from the grave and from the sepulchre was accorded to a number of them.

15. The miraculous ascension into heaven was claimed for a part, at least, of the Oriental Saviors.

16. The doctrine of "the Trinity" is a thousand years older than Christianity.

17. The Holy Ghost idea came from India.

18. The belief in a Devil originated in heathen lands.

19. The cross, as a religious symbol, was used hundreds of years before Christ, in India, Thibet, Egypt and other countries.

20. Immortality of the soul was first taught by pagans.

21. The personalized idea of the "word," or "logos," the creator, as used by St. John, was of Oriental origin.

22. Baptism by water was early practiced in India and Persia.

23. The Holy Ghost descending in the form of a dove, is an ancient Eastern legend.

24. The Sacrament of the Eucharist came from the pagans.

25. Anointing with oil was practiced from time immemorial.

26. The worship of demi-gods—as we have seen—was of heathen origin.

27. Belief in saints and the reverence of them dates back many centuries before Christianity.

28. Future rewards and punishments was first taught by pagans.

29. A great and final day of judgment originated in heathen countries.

30. The belief in the resurrection of the dead is much older than Christianity.

31. The belief in angels and spirits was held by many pagan nations thousands of years ago.

32. Fasting and prayer was of Eastern origin.

33. The power to forgive sin was taught by heathens.

34. A belief in bibles being the word of God existed in many pagan countries, and they have several bibles older than the Jewish book.

35. The "second birth" was first taught in Heathendom.

36. Confession and absolution of sin were of pagan origin.

37. Monasteries and monks, nunneries and nuns existed hundreds of years in Central Asia before the era of Christianity.

38. The order of the Priesthood long existed in all pagan countries.

39. Repentance and humility was enjoined by the ancients.

40. The efficacy of prayer directed to the gods, was early taught in all heathen lands.

In view of the fact that the entire system of Christianity was copied, borrowed and appropriated from pre-existent systems, we are led to wonder at the dearth and sterility of the minds of its founders in the line of originality and invention. It would seem that an ordinary intelligence would have been able to get up a few new ideas, at least. If we take from Christianity all that was borrowed from heathen lands, there is literally nothing of it left save its cruel persecutions and horrible bloodshed, which it seems its founders did not borrow from heathen nations, and here their originality and invention became active. We shall examine this feature of Christianity more fully in subsequent articles.

III. We have room for a small number only, of the moral maxims of the pagan Saviors, demi-gods and sages, but probably sufficient to show that they contain the gist of the over-lauded maxims attributed to Jesus, and that they were the originals from which the later productions were copied:

Christians at Work.

BY WM. MC DONNELL.

When one is in a reflective mood it often happens that the most melancholy ideas will present themselves to the mind; and memory seems to be importuned to add link after link to a chain of events solely relating to the sorrows and sufferings of mankind. While Thought, like an angel of hope, has most delight in soaring toward the splendors of heaven, it is sometimes doomed to descend and to flutter like a bat amid the gloom and the ruins of misery.

Nowhere in the annals of cruelty and oppression, can more dreadful events be discovered than those which relate to religious persecution. One tries to make the retrospection more agreeable, but the sad review of the past continues in its sullen course, and the wholesale destruction of human life caused or directed by Dominicans, Jesuits, or Inquisitors General; by Torquemada, by Diego Deza, by Spanish Kings, such as Chas. I and Philip II. and by the monster Alva, who slaughtered thousands in the Netherlands, simply on account of a difference of opinion in matters of religion, induces the most painful reflections, and seems to verify the remark "That Christianity has cost the world over fifty millions of human lives."

Christianity? Impossible! The faith of a true Christian led all to bear reproach, and to forgive enemies, and to be kindly affectionate, one to another; even that faith in its most adulterated form was superior to anything that Paganism has produced; and were the whole world controlled by its inspired maxims, what love, joy and peace might exist among men; and then there would be no more war, no more dissension, no more persecution. Alas! how stern is history in dealing with many of our fondest delusions; and how many thousands are rudely awakened to discover that religious devotion is too often the prolific parent of debasing superstition and cruelty.

Being in a contemplative mood the veil is lifted and one finds himself almost in the centre of a large city—a Christian capital too; for there are a many great churches and tall steeples, and numerous crosses, some of which are up alone among the scattered night-clouds; while others gleam in the clear moonlight of the open sky. It is approaching the hour of midnight, the air is calm and genial, and there are many sleepers in the quiet houses around. There are but few revelers to be seen in the streets, yet occasional sounds of distant music and festivity reach the ear. The city must be gay, for it contains thousands of invited strangers who had come to witness the royal marriage which recently took place; but many of the wearied are now seeking repose; and the proud Parisian metropolis is comparatively still. But why are those armed bands moving around, and whither at this late hour moves that column of soldiers, whose weapons reflect the moonbeams? It is not a time of war, yet armed groups of citizens are to be seen at almost every street corner: and a large number of troops are assembled near the royal palace. But hark! the clock strikes twelve—it is midnight—the bell of the tower of the Louvre quickly tolls aloud in the clear air, and the lone boom of a heavy gun is heard in the distance. There are loud shouts and confusion; there is a rush of armed fanatics into a chamber where a wounded man is seeking repose; he is guarded by several Swiss soldiers who are speedily cut down by the assassins that have entered; the wounded man—the Huguenot leader, Admiral Coligny—is brutally murdered, and his mutilated body tumbled out of the window into the street, to be dragged about by an infuriated populace. Shots and heavy firing, and shrieks and cries of distress are now heard every moment. Huguenots, trying to escape, rush frantically through the streets, but are pursued and slaughtered by the yelling savages that follow, or are shot down from the windows of the houses. Numbers of the pursued, believing the king would surely protect them, hurry on toward the Louvre, but Charles, the monarch of France, is firing on them, his own people, from an upper window of the palace, while several of his attendants are constantly loading guns to enable him to shoot a greater number of his Protestant subjects.

All night long the slaughter continues, and fugitives are hunted from place to place in every quarter of the city. By grey dawn the streets are encumbered with the murdered, and the river Seine is glutted with the dead bodies cast into it; and on the morning of the 25th of August, 1572, the sun shone down upon bloody pavements and upon heaps of intermingled dead and dying, even around the very palace of the Louvre; and as the butchery was over, Catherine de Medici, of pious memory, queen dowager of France, gazed with satisfaction upon the havoc, and the King himself went out to see the hated slain, and to look upon the disfigured body of Coligny, to whom he had promised friendship and protection; and while stooping over his slaughtered people, he expressed his pious felicity by saying that "the smell of a dead enemy was agreeable." Special orders were then given to continue the carnage, and the "Agents of Divine Justice" in their eagerness to advance the True Faith, deluged many of the French provinces with blood, until the exposed corpses of over thirty thousand human beings tainted the air and produced wide-spread infection. The Parliament of France publicly eulogized the conduct of his Christian majesty, and the King and the Court returned thanks to God for his signal aid in crushing out so much heresy.

In great haste a messenger is dispatched to another city. The news of the slaughter at Paris, and in other parts of France, is the cause of much joy and congratulation even within the sacred walls of St. Peters. The welcome words of the king's message which said that "the Seine flowed on more majestically after receiving the dead bodies of the heretics," is received by the Roman Pontiff with expressions of high approval. The joy in Rome is great; and Pope Gregory, the "Vicar of Christ," attended by his cardinals, goes in grand procession to the Church of St. Louis to sing "Te Deum laudamus," and to return special thanks to God for the triumph just gained over the enemies of His holy Church. The Pope's legate in France is instructed to felicitate "the most Christian King Charles," and to assure him that his Holiness, "praised the exploit so long meditated and so happily executed for the good of religion." So important for the advancement of the Faith is the slaughter at Paris considered, that Pope Gregory orders medals to be struck in honor of the happy event.

So far, the sickening remembrances have been of persecution by the Catholic Church, and we would have made a plea for the reformed faith, by trying to imagine that it was free from the contaminations of Rome, and therefore not subject to the abominable charge of fanatical cruelty. We would even have charitably shielded the Popish religion from the terrible accusations brought against it, but we are reluctantly compelled to admit that that religion has almost desolated the earth; and that the whole system of paganism had never equaled the atrocities committed by the so-called "Mother Church." We wished to believe that no creed whatever, emanating from Christianity, could ever be so debased as to punish unto death for opinion's sake, but not being able to escape from historical facts, we hoped to find competent authority to place the burden of that iniquity upon Rome. But what said the same history as to the absurd ideas, the conflicting doctrines, the bitter dissensions, and the fierce persecutions by the adherents of Protestantism? Why that Luther, the great reformer, was so superstitious as to believe that epidemic diseases, earthquakes, and other evils were produced by the direct agency of Satan. He believed that the Devil had often disturbed him at night; he believed in astrology, and that the peculiar appearance of the northern lights on a certain night, indicated the speedy approach of the end of sublunary things. He was an intolerant bigot, and inveterate against those who opposed him; he would have shed the blood of the Pope and the bishops; he even looked upon such reformers as Carlstadt, Erasmus, and Zwingle, as rank heretics, and, judged by his own words, he would, in support of his own crude faith, have taken human life. Luther exhibited great inhumanity towards the Anabaptists, and his disposition against them may be inferred by an extract from a letter which he addressed to his friend Myconius; he wrote: "I am pleased that you intend to publish a book against the Anabaptists as soon as possible. Since they are not only blasphemous, but seditious men, let the sword exercise its right over them. For this is the will of God, that he shall have judgment who resisteth the power." Luther, even Luther therefore wanted only sufficient strength and authority to be a theological despot and persecutor.

And what of Calvin the great French reformer? He was a gloomy fanatic, who, filled with impious zeal, advocated and defended the burning of the unfortunate Servetus for heresy; and he gloried over the infamous deed when he wrote: "Whoever shall contend that it is unjust to put heretics and blasphemers to death, will willingly and knowingly incur their very guilt. This rule is not laid down by human authority, but it is God himself who speaks." Another reformer, the "meek Malancthon" approved of the vile act, and declared that the body of Servetus should be chopped in pieces, and his bowels torn out.

Munzer, a disciple of Luther, a leader and a preacher of the Anabaptists, was a reckless agitator. Dissatisfied with the holy measures of the reformers; he pulled down the images which Luther had left standing in the churches; he proclaimed a community of goods, and incited his followers to plunder the houses of the wealthy; and finally at the head of about forty thousand turbulent fanatics, he ravaged the whole country, and brought destruction upon himself and many of his unreasoning dupes.

Overlooking many other scenes of religious infatuation and cruelty which occurred on the Continent, the spectre of memory moves on and overshadows England; and there, too, the fury of religious strife is producing its blighting effects. The Christian sect has been almost annihilated; and frantic zealots are in the arena. Episcopals, Presbyterians and Independents, are pursuing one another with deadly hostility. Archbishop Laud, like an Inquisitor General in the Star Chamber, is furious against seceders and non-conformists: and in his holy wrath he crops the ears, slits the noses, and otherwise mutilates disaffected Puritans. Whatever sect is in temporary power, and most patronised by rulers or by royalty, is always most oppressive; and during several reigns, according as Prelacy, or Puritanism, or Presbyterianism predominates, the mutual struggle for ascendancy deviates the land; and their deep hatred of one another, as well as their common hatred of Popery is productive of horrible atrocities. There is hanging, and burning, and quartering, and disemboweling, in almost every part of the kingdom, in behalf of what is for the time the "True faith;" and the knife, the axe, and the rack, and the fagot are readily put to fearful use even in Old England.

In Ireland the penal laws against Catholics were most shamefully applied. This terrible code consisted of over one hundred acts of Parliament, solely enacted for the express purpose of enforcing Protestant doctrines. A Catholic schoolmaster dared not teach; and neither Catholic nor Protestant teachers were permitted to instruct Catholic children. A Catholic dared not reside in the country without special permission, and a reward was offered for the discovery of any priest or bishop not registered as having licence as such. A Catholic priest convicted of having performed any religious ceremony, or of having married a Catholic and a Protestant, was condemned to be hanged; and all marriages between Catholics and Protestants were annulled. A wife on becoming a Protestant could take the entire property of her husband; and a son, by a like change of faith, might dispossess his father. There were many other similar enactments, and Catholics of every degree were sorely oppressed; and for the least unfriendliness, or resistance to most arbitrary laws, were liable to ruinous forfeitures or death; and the most inhuman cruelty and slaughter often followed. During the long period of this terrible oppression in Ireland, thousands were sent to bloody and untimely graves, and if the persecutions by Protestants have not been, perhaps, as infamously extensive as those of Catholics, it is only because the venomous power of Protestantism was too divided, or too limited. Protestantism, as well as Catholicity, possessed the genuine spirit, the vicious animus of intolerance, and needed only the requisite strength and domination, to equal, or even to surpass, in oppression and savage cruelty, all that had been done by the imperious ecclesiastical power of Rome.

Were the angel of Destruction required to speak for the many slain of every land, he might say that the most dreadful wars which have taken place in every part of the globe, were caused by intriguing priests, or by the virulence of religious feeling. And were it possible for an angel of Peace to re-animate the myriads of slaughtered men, he might plead that they should be placed in some world where there was no priest, no altar, and no temple; and where it would be considered the vilest blasphemy to assert that the Supreme Being could be influenced and governed by passions alike to those of man—by anger, by hatred, by revenge. And the angel might then, perhaps, reveal an unwelcome truth by announcing to all, to the Pagan, to the Christian, and to the Mohammedan, that priests and their pretensions, and their inspired books, had as yet only misled humanity.—From the Heathens of the Heath.

An Anti-Christian's Views.

It is but a short time, comparatively, since the great physical conflict of civil war which so greedily devoured many valuable lives, and produced such a vast amount of misery with the people. Only ten years have passed over the land, and the people seem to have almost forgotten the event except in their annual Decoration day.

The signs of the times indicate that we are approaching a mental, and perhaps, another physical agitation, ten times as great as the one so recently experienced.

The Catholic and the Protestant Christians are now marshalling their host, and arming themselves with the whole armor of their God for the conflict, apparently with each other. It seems as if this country may yet experience the same devastating and degrading influence, as have all countries where Christianity has had power and sway.

The efforts of the Protestants to put their God and their Bible into the Constitution of the United States, and thereby unite Church and State is the greatest curse to any people.

The Catholics are endeavoring to destroy the public schools of the land, which are the sheet anchor of a Republican form of government, for intelligence, moral integrity, and self control, is the only basis for a Republic to rest upon. "Infidelity" is what Christianity reproachfully applies to all who do not believe and prescribe to its foolish dogmas.

The foremost men in establishing this Government were infidels to this popular Christianity, but faithful to truth, justice, and humanity. Christianity has never accomplished anything for the mental and moral elevation of mankind.

It is humanity that has accomplished it in spite of Christianity with all her pretensions.

The whole object of the former has been, and is at present to obtain civil and ecclesiastical power.

Religion has in all ages deluged the world with misery and blood. That is her record. The only hope of mankind is salvation from ignorance and bigotry. This is the only salvation worth seeking; let Christians howl for Jesus to the contrary notwithstanding.

ANTI-CHRISTIAN.

Questions for Infidels,

And an Appeal to Col. Ingersoll.

BY S. H. PRESTON.

As we enter upon the last quarter of the nineteenth century, and near the one hundredth anniversary of the Declaration of American Independence, would it not be well to ascertain if we are yet assured of that grand prerogative of free thought and speech for which freemen have fought through all the gone by generations? And it ought to be understood by the Infidels of this country before the celebration of our Centennial whether this Government yet guarantees them rights as men and members of society. For if Infidels are to be denied the rights of citizenship, as the Methodist Home Journal would have them, and as some have actually been; if Infidels like Julius Nieland are to be precluded the privilege of becoming citizens; if Infidels like Dr. Treat are to be driven from witness stands, and Unitarians like Thorne from State Legislatures;—then we had much better be agitating the propriety of promulgating another Declaration of Independence for this Century's '76, than in hypocritically honoring that which seems to have survived the spirit of the country, as well as the times, which gave it to the world. Why, is it not a startling fact that American citizens are to day refused political privileges, and denied their legal and constitutional rights wholly on the ground of their being Infidels? Is it not about time that Infidels begun to open their eyes to the fact that free born men "with the universal right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," are being put under ban because of their belief? People are deprived of civil rights on account of creed in these United States, the yet unchristianized charter of which declares that no law shall be made "respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." Is it not time Infidels begun to realize that the nuptials between Church and State were even now being consummated under their very eyes in this Republic? A century has not yet completed its full circle of years since the trenchant pen of Thomas Paine thrilled the world with those lightning words of liberty that brought our Colonial fathers to their feet in rebellion against the "royal brute of Britain." And there is now need of another liberty loving Infidel, another Thomas Paine, to touch the torch of his transcendent genius to the flickering flame of freedom, and rekindle in the slumbering masses to-day the spirit of the Revolutionary years. To day we need a Thomas Paine to reiterate the old grand gospel of equal rights in tones that will ring like the blast of a bugle horn through this land, and stir up such a spirit as shall convert our Centennial celebration into a funeral—the funeral of both Roman and Reformed ecclesiasticism. Many may deem this sensational declamation. Well, is it not about time Infidels become sensational? Have the audacious outrages perpetrated in the name of law and religion against Nieland and Thorne yet been redressed? Are not the highest civil authorities in this government both unable and unwilling to stay the encroachments of Christian power? Do you know how many government officials, how many Supreme Court Judges, and Governors of States, are members of the Religious Amendment Society, all seeking to put man out of our Constitution, and to put God, and Jesus Christ, and the filthy old Bible in? Do you fully apprehend the meaning of giving our Centennial a religious character, or re-lize the pious politics and treason that is Jesuitically being plotted in Christian Conventions and Young Men's Christian Associations? Are you aware that a priestly party to-day is trying to invest Jesus and Jehovah with the spiritual sovereignty of these great States? Do you not know that there are modern Inquisitors who talk about tolerating Infidels only as they would tolerate conspirators; modern Calvinists, like Rev. Mr. Edwards, who declare that "Infidels have no rights we do respect;" modern Torquemadas, like Rev. Dr. Cummings, who assert that "Infidels should be crushed like vipers? Did you not know that John A. Lant lies in Ludlow jail because he is a naughty talking Infidel, and that carrion-hunting Christian, Comstock, are commissioned to run sack the mail bags of the United States?

Ecclesiastical blood hounds are hunting the life of mental liberty all through this great land. The fair young tree of American Republicanism is being slowly but surely poisoned in the slimy coils of that Python of another age, the Christian Church. Bullying bigotry is brandishing his brutal brand over the press and platform, and prostrating people. And to-day the rights of man in this Republic are threatened by a deadlier foe than ever sat on England's throne. And the demand of the times is another Thomas Paine, to send forth a hundred years later edition of "Common Sense" adapted to the exigencies of passing events. Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll, thou art the needed man! Thy sublime Oration on the Gods, has superceeded the Age of Reason. You have paid to Thomas Paine, the highest tribute that the pen can give to mortal man. And now be yourself the Thomas Paine for this later generation. It is yours to give expression to the grievances of your fellow creed bound countrymen, to head the "grand army of deliverance," and be yourself, the "Author Hero" of this century's '76. Already has your matchless pen written the watchword of a coming conflict. "Infidelity is liberty, all religion is slavery." And now write words, write burning, warning words, which will waken all the weary watchmen over mankind's weal in this wide Western world, and put them in a pamphlet for the people. And so shall you merit and receive the love and the honor and the praise of patriots, and your memory shall live enshrined in the hearts of men, associated forever with the memory of him, whose country was the world, whose religion was doing good.

Graduated Atmospheres.

The mean distance of the planet Mercury from the sun is about 37,000,000 miles, and that of the planet Neptune about 2,850,000,000 miles. If, then, the sun is simply a vast, incandescent body, diffusing light and heat like an ordinary fire, it is obvious that, unless there are some modifying circumstances, the degree of light and heat to which Mercury is subjected is immeasurably more intense than that experienced by Neptune, and that the animal and vegetable life of the one planet is utterly impossible to the other. Presuming both planets to be inhabited, this would seem to involve a special creation for each. But here we are embarrassed by the consideration that all the members of our system obey what appear to be universal laws; and, that, with but one exception, they are similarly shaped; while the revelations of the spectroscopic seem to invite the conclusion that their constituents are identical in the main. Assuming these three precise facts as the basis of induction, we ought reasonably to verge towards the conviction that throughout the whole of our system there is a corresponding homogeneity in animal and vegetable life, and something like an equable distribution of light and heat. At this point, however, in steps the commonly-received theory of the great central fire of the sun—a theory that seems to interfere with the unity that should characterize our small family of planets, and that tends to confuse our ideas in relation to the sublime sequences which, most assuredly, bind in one harmonious whole all the operations of the Creator.

If the luminous atmosphere that is said to surround the sun, or the gasses that are alleged to be in a constant, and violent state of combustion within the vast circumference of that atmosphere, are the immediate and only source of light and heat to the individual planets within the sphere of solar attraction, then, as already intimated, Mercury must, in the absence of modifying circumstances, be on fire, to the very core, so to speak, while Neptune should, on the other hand, be little better than a solid ball of ice. But, supposing we venture to imagine that a positive expression of light and heat is evolved within the atmospheres of the various planets only; then, might we not begin to discern the road a little more clearly before us, even though it should still be encumbered with some difficulties?

It is said that an impulse given by the sun to the ether, at a point 95,000,000 miles from us, reaches the earth in something like eight minutes. But, as light or heat seems to have no mission to perform save in the immediate vicinity of the planets, the evolution of either at any vast distance from these bodies would apparently serve no good purpose, but would, on the contrary, seem to indicate a waste of power and a want of design. We should, however, be able to relieve ourselves here if we entertained the proposition that this mysterious impulse, which causes the ether, so sensitive and sublimated is the latter, to vibrate many hundred billions of times in a second, does not express itself in any appreciable degree while traversing the vast impalpable ocean that fills the universe of space, but manifests its existence only when it encounters a dense or foreign body like our atmosphere, where it might be presumed to express itself in a manner widely different from that which characterized its unimpeded course down through what might be termed the silent and mysterious realms of nothingness.

The existence of different media and forces seems indispensable to the production of phenomena of any description. The aereolite sweeps through space in coldness and darkness until it enters our atmosphere, when it becomes a center of light and heat so intense that it is frequently consumed before it reaches the earth. Every condition of being seems to express itself through a conflict of forces, how harmonious soever the antagonism may be. Perfect homogeneity is but another name for non-existence. So that this mighty all pervading ocean of ether, which is sensitive and attenuated beyond the human comprehension, were absolute nothingness but for the forces that antagonized with it. Had it no shores to break upon while vibrating to the impalpable impulse already mentioned—no element differing in nature or density from it to disturb its equilibrium—then were the mighty womb of space empty indeed; for the heavens should virtually be robbed of every radiant point that now studs their azure expanse.

Perhaps it may not be difficult to prove that even directly beneath the noontide, tropical sun, the higher we mount through regions of our atmosphere the colder and darker it becomes. From this, one might be inclined to argue that our earth, with all the other planets, may be regarded as a vast daguerreotype-plate coated with the atmosphere as with chemicals, upon the face of which we find kindled into life and light some of the occult forces brought to bear upon it by our great centre, the sun. Possibly the first feeble impressions of the hosts of heaven, as luminous bodies are photographed faintly upon the outer limits of our atmosphere, and probably these impressions become more powerful and clearly defined as that medium becomes more dense, until at the surface of the earth, they are reflected, as it were, with a maximum intensity of light and heat. Nor does this idea appear less incomprehensible than the fact that neither latitude nor directness of the sun's rays is the truest measure of cold, or light, or heat. The truth of this latter assertion will scarcely be disputed when at the equator, and, consequently on the selfsame degree of latitude, we find within a radius of five or six miles, regions differing widely from each other in fauna and flora, and exhibiting every degree of heat and cold peculiar to the various zones. For example, let us take any point in the very heart of the tropics, where the mountains sweep up from the level of the sea to a height of twenty thousand feet, and we shall meet at their base valleys of endless bloom, teeming with life; while but six or seven thousand yards from those passionate vales, up the mountain-side, after encountering almost every variety of climate, we find ourselves in the midst of regions the most desolate, without a solitary vestige of animal or vegetable life, and buried beneath a savage waste of eternal snow; so that latitude is not the true measure of climate or of heat and cold, inasmuch as we see it exhibiting directly under the line the very same characteristics which distinguish it at the poles. We must, therefore, seek for some other standard to which we can appeal with more certainty, and this it appears is to be found in our atmosphere only where the gradations of heat and cold, if not of light also are as to the difference in density of the various strata that compose it—the measure being true at any given point, and not affected by any local influences.

For the sake of illustration, let us in imagination, project a line perpendicular to the equator for a distance of twenty thousand feet in the direction of the mid-day sun; and let us assume that this line is identical with the course of a single impulse sped through space from that luminary to the earth, in relation to which impulse, or ray of light if you will, the angle of incidence and of reflection shall coincide. Let us now while the vertical sun rests on the top of this line, as it were, philosophize upon some of the strata of atmosphere through which it passes, always remembering that the atmosphere is densest at the level of the sea, and that it becomes gradually attenuated as we ascend through the regions of space. Now, it has been ascertained, beyond peradventure, that at the lower end of this line a man may be dying from the effects of extreme heat the self same moment that, at the upper end which is nearer the sun, another man may be dying from the effects of extreme cold—the one being broiled and the other being frozen to death. Nor is this all; for midway between the two victims, or at a height of eight or nine thousand feet, we find a third person enjoying himself in the open air to the top of his bent.

At no point of the earth's surface are the regions, or rather the extremes, of heat and cold defined so sharply as under the line. This is, doubtless, owing to the fact that the angle of incidence, and that of reflection are coincident on the part of the solar beams. As we recede from the equator this angle becomes greater and greater, with a corresponding diminution of light and heat, until we reach the poles where it falls into one horizontal line, as it were. And perhaps this gradual diminution of light and heat is not so much owing to the alleged fact that as we recede from the line any given number of rays of light are made to cover a greater space, as to the obvious one that the angle of incidence and that of reflection become more obtuse at each successive step. Pencils of what we call light are of infinitesimal proportions. Let us, then, project one of the smallest within the compass of an experiment upon a reflecting surface in a dark room, and perhaps we shall be able to discover that the secondary ray performs a more important mission in the concentration of light and heat than is usually accredited to it; for it is obvious that, the smaller the angle here, the more light and heat are expressed within it; while it appears to be equally true, also, that the gradual shading off of climate, from intense heat to intense cold between the equator and the poles, is owing perhaps more clearly to the gradual augmentation of this combined angle than to any other circumstance. Still, at any intervening point, the vertical admeasuring through the atmosphere holds relatively good—that is, the more attenuated any of the strata, the colder and, doubtless the darker it is.

From these few speculations, it may possibly appear to some that the nearness of a planet to the sun, or the remoteness of one from that mighty orb, has not, after all, so much to do with the degree of light and heat experienced by these bodies. Graduated atmospheres, from Mercury to Neptune, would seem to secure something like an equal distribution of light and heat among all the members of our system. A highly attenuated atmosphere for Mercury, and one correspondingly dense for Neptune, would place both these planets in a more comfortable position, in our imagination than they have occupied heretofore.

1. MENU, nearly a thousand years B. C., said: "Let no man be offended with those who are angry with him, but reply gently to those who curse him." "Endure injuries and despise no one." "Commit no hostile act for your own preservation."

2. PRITACUS taught 650 years B. C., "Do not to your neighbor, what you would take ill from him."

3. CONFUCIUS taught 500 years B. C., "Do unto another what you have him do unto you, and do not to another what you would not have him do unto you. Thou needest this alone. It is the foundation of all the rest." "Desire not the death of thine enemy." "Hold faithfulness and sincerity as first principles." "When you have faults, do not fear to abandon them." "To subdue one's self and return to propriety is perfect virtue."

4. CHRISTNA thus taught: "He is my beloved servant who is the same in friendship and hatred, in honor and dishonor, in cold and in heat, in pain and in pleasure; who is unsolicitous about the event of things; to whom praise and blame are as one; who is of little speech, and is pleased with whatever comes to pass; who owneth no particular home, and who is of a steady mind." "He who can bear up against the violence produced by lust and anger in this life, is properly employed and a happy man."

5. BUDDHA thus taught: "Let a man overcome anger with love; let him overcome evil by good; let him overcome the greedy by liberality; the liar by the truth." "Not to commit any sin; to do good and purify one's mind, that is the teaching of the awakened."

6. THALES, 464 years B. C., said: "Avoid doing what you would blame others for doing." "Cultivate friendship for an enemy." "Be kind to your friends, that they may continue so, and to thine enemies, that they may become so." "Prevent injuries if possible; if not, do not revenge them." "Be to everybody kind and friendly." "Speak evil of no one, not even thine enemies."

7. BIAS, one of the noted seven wise men of Greece, nearly 600 years before Christ, taught thus: "It is a proof of a weak and disordered mind to desire impossibilities." "The greatest infelicity is not be able to endure misfortunes patiently." "Great minds alone can support a sudden reverse of fortune." "The most pleasant state is to be always gaining." "Be not unmindful of the miseries of others." "If you are handsome, do handsome things; if deformed, supply the defects of nature by your virtues." "Be slow in undertaking, but resolute in executing." "Praise not a worthless man for the sake of his wealth." "Do all the good you can, and whatever good you do, ascribe the glory of it to the gods." "Lay in wisdom as the store of your journey from youth to old age, for it is the most certain possession." It is claimed he wrote 2000 verses of similar moral maxims.

8. PYTHAGORAS thus taught: "Every man ought to speak and act with such integrity that no one would have reason to doubt his simple affirmation." "It is impossible he can be free who is a slave to his passions." "To revenge yourself on an enemy, make him your friend."

9. SOCRATES taught: "Return not an injury if you have received one." "Return not evil for evil."
